trict Union of Textile Workers. The employers were represented by Alderman Sir Mark Oldroyd (who presided), Mr. J. E. Walker (Mirfield), Mr. A. Rhodes (Heckmondwike), Mr. W. O. R. Holton (Birstall), Mr. W. France (Dewsbury), Mr. Watson Kaye (Ravensthorpe), Mr. Lee (Earlsheaton), and the secretary (Mr. C. L. W. Nicholson), and the union by Mr. Ben Turner (Mayor of Batley), Mr. A. Gee (Huddersfield), Mr. Benjamin Turner (Ravensthorpe), Mr. A. Wilcock (Dewsbury), and Mr. G. Saville (Birstall).

The first question raised by the union delegates was that of excessive overtime in the mills. It was urged that the long hours worked by numerous operatives had caused an abnormal amount of sickness, this being proved by the increased claims for benefits under the Insurance Act. The delegates therefore asked that the new regulations of the Home Office limiting the overtime of women and young persons to nine hours per week should be applied by the manufacturers to adult males also, and that Saturday afternoon and Sunday midnight to Monday morning labour should be abolished. It was believed, said the spokesmen of the operatives, that additional efficiency of production would result to such an extent as to warrant the change. Another subject discussed was that of wages for night workers, and it was stated that in this connection there had been trouble at several mills in the district.

At the conclusion of the conference Sir Mark Oldroyd intimated on behalf of the employers that the Manufacturers' Association would issue to the members a circular containing recommendations that the two complaints which had been made should be dealt with as far as practicable.

THE PRESSURE OF KHAKI CONTRACTS.

OVERTIME EMPLOYMENT OF YOUNG PERSONS.

Some comment has been occasioned by the fact that young persons under the age of sixteen are working overtime in spinning mills in Bradford in order to enable employers to cope with the pressure of khaki contracts. Mention has already been made in these columns of the resolution on the subject recently passed by the Juvenile Employment Subcommittee of the Education Authority, a body whose function it is through the medium of a large number of visitors to advise children who are leaving school for employment and to keep in touch with them until they are seventeen years of age. In their letter to the Home Office the committee stated that their attention had been drawn to the fact that "many children under seventeen years of age are working from 6 a.m. to 8.30 p.m. in various mills in this city in connection with the manufacture of khaki. The committee are fully aware of the urgent need for the manufacture of khaki, but they view with apprehension the prejudicial effects of these very long hours upon the health of children, and they would warmly welcome any rearrangement that could be made which would obviate the necessity of those under seventeen years of age being engaged beyond the normal factory hours."

A HOME OFFICE EXEMPTION.

It does not appear to be generally realised that under section 150 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, "in case of any public emergency" the Secretary of State may by Order, "to the extent and during the period named by him," exempt from the Act "any factory or workshop belonging to the Crown, or any factory or workshop in respect of work which is being done on behalf of the Crown under a contract specified in the Order."

What has happened is that the Secretary of State, in the present public emergency, under this section of the Act made an Order (which has just been extended for a further period of three months) allowing the working of overtime in the woollen and worsted industries "for work which is being done on behalf of the Crown."

The Order—made after consultation with the representatives of the industries in the chief centres—applies only to factories in which 75 per cent. or more of the output is work on behalf of the Crown—i.e., on behalf of the British and allied forces; and it limits the overtime that may be worked to a total "not exceeding nine hours per week," exclusive of meal hours. Thus employers possessing the certificate of exemption are acting lawfully and within their rights. It is only in spinning, where small, deft hands are needed for the processes of doffing and "bobbin-ligging," that young persons under the age of 16 are employed. The Order, indeed, stipulates that, "except in spinning, no young person under 16 is allowed to be employed overtime without the permission of the Superintending Inspector." The position of the employee is safeguarded by a clause in the Order which provides that "it shall not be made a condition of the employment of any woman or young person in the works that such woman or young person shall be employed in pursuance of this Order beyond the ordinary period of employment."

Yorkshire Post
9.2.16

658/15

658

LEEDS CLOTHING DISPUTE.

A THREATENED DEADLOCK.

THE OFFICIAL CASE.

The suspension of the negotiations between the representatives of the employers and operatives with respect to the rates of pay for work done in connection with the War Office clothing contracts in Leeds is regarded as of serious import. The demand of women operatives was for a flat rate scale of pay, and for a time there had been correspondence and consultations between both sides on this question. Another conference was in prospect, but for the moment this has been abandoned. There are stated to be about 36,000 women clothing operatives in the city, and these are all concerned in the dispute, although the women members of the Leeds Branch of the Amalgamated Union of Clathing Operatives is stated to be between 6,000 and 7,000.

The officials of the Amalgamated Union of Clothing Operatives have issued the following statement:—The demands of the clothiers' operatives for the introduction of equal rates of pay for khaki clothing were formulated at mass meetings of between four and five thousand workers held at the Town Hall and Trades Hall on January 18. On Monday, January 25, the first conference between the twelve representatives of each side was held at the Great Northern Hotel, when the following letter was handed by the masters' secretary to the Leeds branch secretary of the Union:—"I am instructed to refer you to the agreement of April 21, 1913, and to inform you that they cannot see their way to make any alteration of the rates therein mentioned. This Association will, however, ask their members to pay such a scale for all sub-divisions of khaki work as shall yield fully the fourpence per hour as per terms of the agreement, in every process, irrespective of other work made with it. They cannot, however, consent to ask their members to pay higher piece rates simply because some have done so voluntarily owing to the special circumstances of their particular system of manufacture. With regard to the question of payment for overtime, I am to inform you that, having regard to the abnormal position of affairs in the country at the present time, this Association is prepared to recommend its members, without prejudice to the agreement, to pay overtime at the rate of time and a half for work done on Saturday afternoons and Sundays.

Surprise of the Workers' Delegates.

Some discussion followed. and it was ultimately agreed that the Conference should be adjourned until January 27th, and when it met again a joint sub-committee was appointed, which agreed upon resolutions arranging for a committee consisting of two members of each side to visit factories, it being understood that its duties should be confined to inquiries regarding the prices being paid for simplified khaki work and systems under which it was being produced. The result of the investigations were to be reported to the Employers' Association by the end of the week, so that a reply could be sent to the A.U.C.O. by Saturday, February 6. On Wednesday, February 3, the workers' representatives met at their headquarters prepared to accompany the employers' representatives on a tour of selected firms. To the surprise of the workers' delegates, the employers completely ignored the arrangements and negotiations, and the following declaration came to hand:—"I beg to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 3rd inst giving a list of the firms whom you suggest should be visited as to dissatisfaction existing in their factories. At a meeting of our Association, held on Monday last, the proceedings of the sub-committee appointed on the 25th ult. were duly reported, and after fully considering the situation, it was felt that it would be more satisfactory to have any complaints or grievances dealt with by the Conciliation Board. I shall be glad to receive whatever complaints you may have to make, in order that a meeting of the Conciliation Board may be convened and the matter dealt with by them.—R. Hilditch, Secretary of the Employers' Association."

"The workers' officials have had to exercise great patience and tact in endeavouring to arrive at a peaceful settlement," adds the Union's statement. "The issue now rests with the operatives, who will meet in the Town Hall on Monday night next, but the responsibility of breaking off the negotiations rests with the Employers' Association."

Mr. Withey, Secretary of the Leeds A.U.C.O., has stated that the whole answer of the employers to the workers' demand was "the existing agreement." The operatives' reply was that khaki and the war were never thought of when the agreement was made.

THE EMPLOYERS' SIDE OF THE CASE.

The strength of the employers' position in this matter appears to be, writes a member of our staff who had a long conversation on the subject with Mr. David Little, chairman, and Mr. R. Hilditch, secretary, of the employers' organisation, that the workpeople's officials, although they have been repeatedly challenged, have never yet been able to formulate any definite grievances. Even after a letter arrived from the Director of Army Contracts asking for a statement of these alleged grievances, none has up to the present been put into writing. Furthermore, both Mr. Little and Mr. Hilditch state emphatically that, subject to certain small exceptions, which are referred to later, the employees in the clothing trade are now earning considerably more than normal wages, and that therefore on the ground of total weekly earnings no substantial grievance exists. Indeed, they go so far as to say that as things are at present the workers in the best factories in Leeds are better off than ever they were in the history of the trade from the wage-earning point of view. Various motives are suggested as to the cause of the agitation, but it would probably not aid a settlement to discuss them in detail.

The employers attach some importance to the history of the business. The origin goes back to November last, when, in consultation with the Wholesale Clothiers' Federation, the War Office decided to issue contracts for the supply of clothing to the troops at flat rates, i.e., at a fixed price for making-up, plus the cost of material. This was done to protect the taxpayer against any possible combination of manufacturers to exact "famine" or "war" prices. The trade loyally accepted the position, and proceeded to organise itself to meet the needs of the War Office. Having accepted the principle of a flat rate for making-up the garments, it occurred to some of the manufacturers that it would be a good thing to carry the principle still further, and get a flat rate fixed for the labour which had to be put into the garment.

On November 20th a Sub-Committee of the Federation was appointed to consider the matter and work out the details of piece rates operating in the trade. The Sub-Committee went thoroughly into the question—and it must be remembered that at that time they were not influenced by trade union representations, for at that time none had been made—and they came to the conclusion that no flat rate for labour was practicable. They came to this conclusion largely owing to the fact that conditions of work in the various manufactories vary so much. In the wholesale clothing trade there are all grades of factories, from that of the small man with a few sewing machines to that of the highly organised and specialised firm with all the most modern equipment and the most minute and scientific sub-division of labour. The Sub-Committee found on investigation that if a girl was getting, say a shilling for doing a certain job in one factory and only ninepence for the same job in another factory, it by no means followed that the former was the better off at the end of the week. Indeed, the reverse was generally the case, for owing to the better factory organisation, the better supply of material, and the more efficient machine to work with, the girl who was paid say ninepence for doing a certain amount of sewing drew more wages than the girl in a less well-organised factory who was paid a shilling for the same piece of work. It was, in other words, found that the highest piece rate did not necessarily produce the highest weekly earnings.

The next date in the history of the matter is January 18, when there was a mass meeting of the operatives in the Town Hall, at which a resolution was passed asking for uniform rates for making the simplified tunic and trousers for the Army. As a result of this there was a joint meeting of employers and operatives' representatives on January 25. At that meeting the operatives' representatives were told that the employers did not consider a flat rate within the range of practical politics, but the workpeople's representatives promised to submit a reasonable scheme. The result of this was that Mr Withey, the workpeople's secretary, sent his letter containing the schedule of prices for labour. He sub-divided the labour for the tunic into six items, and that for the trousers into five, machining being the principal item in each case.

Absence of a Practical Suggestion.

The employers duly considered the matter, but found it impossible to accept the proposed schedule. In the best factories the single item of "machining" would include perhaps forty or fifty different processes, and this figure would vary downwards according to the degree of organisation prevailing in any particular works. Clearly, therefore, Mr. Withey's proposal was of no assistance in arriving at an acceptable basis of apportionment as between employer and employee. This failure of the workpeople's union to put forward any practical suggestion drove the employers to consider the effect of the agreement between them and the trade union made in August, 1913, under which the clothing trade of Leeds has been working in peace until the last few weeks. The agreement makes the usual provision for a Conciliation Board, and fixes the minimum rate of pay for female workers at 4d. per hour. If a factory is on piece work it is provided that 70 per cent. of the workers must come up to this standard in total earnings. When the state of the clothing trade was examined in the light of this quite modern agreement, it was found that the general rate of earnings was very considerably above the minimum stipulated in that document. Moreover, the machinery of the Conciliation Board was at the disposal of the workers if they had any grievance.

A further joint meeting was held on January 27, at which the workpeople's representatives promised to submit specific cases of hardship, and a committee of two from each side was appointed to investigate such cases when particulars were furnished. The employers made it quite clear that they were willing and anxious to stand by the agreement and would give no support whatever to any manufacturer who did not act up to its letter and spirit. No reply was received from the workpeople by Saturday at noon, and Mr. Hilditch telephoned to Mr. Withey for the promised particulars of grievances. He did not get a reply until February 3rd, when he got a letter from Mr. Withey in the following terms:—

"Enclosed please find list of firms whom we suggest from our side should be visited re dissatisfaction existing in the town."

Then followed the names of ten firms. No particulars whatever were given, and Mr. Hilditch naturally wrote asking for particulars of the wrong-doing alleged against these firms. In view of the fact that this letter from Mr. Hilditch was held by the other side to have "broken off negotiations," it is well to give the material portion of it, which is as follows:—

"It was felt that it would be more satisfactory to have any complaints or grievances dealt with by the Conciliation Board. I shall be glad to receive whatever complaints you may have to make in order that a meeting of the Conciliation Board may be convened and the matter dealt with by them."

Very few independent people will find that this was a breaking off of the negotiations, but on February 5 Mr. Hilditch again wrote asking for particulars of the complaints against the ten firms mentioned, and has received no reply.

In the meantime, the workpeople's organisation, or some one acting in their behalf, appears to have written to the War Office on the matter, because on January 23 a letter was written by the Director of Army Contracts to Mr. Hilditch on the matter. The reply to this was a request for the services of an inspector to investigate the matter. On January 27 the Director of Army Contracts again wrote asking for a copy of the agreement above referred to, the names of contractors not observing it and in what respects the agreement was not being observed. This letter was sent on to Mr. Withey, but up to the present no definite reply to the questions has been given. The employers say that no definite reply has been given because no real grievances can be proved to exist. Owing to the disturbance of trade a few highly skilled tailoresses who were working on the best class of civilian work in normal times may be earning less than formerly, but, generally speaking, the average of weekly earnings in the trade is much higher than formerly. In fact, there have been complaints when workers have been taken off khaki and put on to ordinary civilian work. The main outstanding fact of the situation is that as yet no grievances have been formulated for the consideration of the Conciliation Board.

ARMY CLOTHING CONTRACTS.

How the Fat Men Fatten Upon a National Crisis: Co-operation and the Workers.

[BY OUR SPECIAL COMMISSIONER.]

It is not always easy to write an article in a way that will drive home the points that one has in mind. I have been making inquiries into the khaki contracts which the Government has arranged since the outbreak of the war, and there are one or two features about the business that should be of interest to readers of this journal; nay, they should be of interest to every man or woman who has to work for a living, and, indeed, to every man or woman who loves justice and equity.

It is not possible, perhaps, to say how many khaki suits and overcoats have been made for our soldiers since the war commenced. But the quantity must have been exceedingly great. A few figures may help us to get a fair idea of the matter. Before the declaration of war, we had a regular Army at home, in India and in other foreign stations, which numbered about 254,309. We had a Territorial Force of about 266,820 officers and men. If we say that all the regulars and most of the Territorials had khaki outfits at the time, there would be nearly 521,129 men clothed in khaki-dyed cloth. In addition to the above, there were 138,531 men in the Army Reserve, and 62,586 in the Special Army Reserve. In all probability, these would have no khaki. Now, according to the latest figures (which appear in the new Army Estimates), the British and Colonial forces to-day number 3,000,000 officers and men. This number does not include, however, our force in India. Now, although the regular and many of the Territorials would have khaki rig-outs at the time of the war's beginning, a great number of them, no doubt, would have to be re-clothed when going on active service. Hence, it may be said that since the beginning of last August, we have required for the clothing of the old and the new armies about 2,500,000 new khaki trousers, 2,500,000 new khaki tunics, 2,500,000 new khaki overcoats, and 2,500,000 khaki caps. We will leave out of account other items in a soldier's equipment, such as boots, khaki puttees, woollen shirts, under-pants, under-vests, cardigan jackets, &c.

All these 2,500,000 men have not yet been supplied with khaki. For instance, some hundreds of thousands have been supplied with blue serge suits by the Co-operative Wholesale Society. But they will have to be served with khaki in course of time, and that as quickly as possible. In fact, as the war continues we shall have to maintain over 3,000,000 officers and men clothed in khaki. In times of peace a khaki uniform will last about twelve months. On active service it may last only from three to six months according to the work and circumstances of the soldier. In the trenches, it is worn out in six or eight weeks. It takes nearly three yards of cloth to make a pair of trousers and a tunic; it takes three yards to make an overcoat. Hence, to clothe an army of 3,000,000 we need 18,000,000 yards of cloth, without including the material necessary for the cap, the puttees, and other parts of the equipment. If the war is kept up, we may have to begin reclothing the men as soon, say, as the contracts for the first 3,000,000 suits are run out.

Of course, my figures are not accurate. They may, however, be taken as approximately accurate. Let us look for a moment at the prices. The prices of soldiers' suits vary according to size. We might strike an average, though, and put down each suit of trousers and tunic at 21s. 6d. Each khaki overcoat costs 28s. Hence, 3,000,000 suits and overcoats would come to £6,450,000. This does not include cap and puttees. In fact, it has been estimated that a soldier's complete war outfit works out, on an average, at £7, and an officer's outfit at about £30. But take 3,000,000 at £7, and you get a total cost of £21,000,000. After this £21,000,000 has been provided, it has to be maintained by repairs and renewals.

Nevertheless, we will stick to the khaki. I learn that the Government in securing khaki for this vast Army of men (drawn from fields and factories, and put to fighting), makes its contracts with woollen manufacturers for the supply of the cloth. The khaki-dyed material (when woven and finished), is conveyed to Government centres at London and Leeds, and to one or two other temporary places. There it is tested. If it is not up to the standard, or fully equal to sample and specifications, it is rejected. It has to be good cloth, and is, in fact, very good material.

Having been proved to be sound, it is then distributed to large and small clothiers in London, Manchester, Bristol (these being the big centres), and also to Leicester, Birmingham, Liverpool, Crewe, Colchester, and Nantwich. The Government has large factories of its own for making up the clothing, at Pimlico and Weedon. The clothiers are supplied with full instructions for making the cloth into service trousers, jackets, and overcoats. The Government also supplies the trimmings, buttons, hooks and eyes, &c.

Now, the arrangements made by the Government are straightforward. The clothiers have nothing to do but to receive the material, see that it is made up, and draw the difference on the transaction. The Government supplies all the material at a fixed price; a standard price known as a "flat rate" is fixed, and every clothing manufacturer is paid exactly the same price for the finished garment. The prices for average sizes are 12s. 6d. for a jacket, 8s. 9d. for trousers, and 28s. for an overcoat. The Government debits the clothier with the cost of trimmings and buttons. For the cloth supplied, the Government charges the clothier at the rate of just over 4s. per yard for the jacket, just over 5s. for the trousers, and just under 6s. a yard for the overcoat. Hundreds of manufacturers are engaged in weaving the cloth. For its purpose, the cloth is excellent.

However, it will be observed that the business of making up khaki in the factories of the clothiers is not, to use common parlance, a "competition job." The "flat rate" for making was arranged by Government officials in consultation with a few large wholesale clothiers. The "flat rate" decided upon was liberal in character; it was, indeed, sufficient to permit the employers to pay good wages; even to pay wages higher than would be recognised in Fair Wages Clauses, or under the Trade Boards Act; after paying these good wages, they would have left for themselves a reasonable margin of profit. Another advantage given to them, was that the Government agreed to pay all carriage of goods to and from the factories. Usually, the clothiers pay their own carriage on goods.

You see, the Government did not want any sweating. In one way or another the clothiers exacted a "flat rate" from the Government, on which, after paying ordinary wages in the more or less unorganised clothing trade, they could make a steady, and probably a considerable, profit out of the business. But that was not enough for them. They have resisted any effort on the part of the operatives to bring up some of the backward firms to the standard level of payment.

In many cases, too, clothiers have sub-contracted the work; they have made arrangements with small contractors, individual tailors, and with anybody and everybody capable of making up clothing. The sub-contracts have been made at prices below the "flat rate," the work has also been distributed among home-workers, at prices which, in some cases, God and the sweated victims alone know. Now, if the Government could make this "flat rate" with the employers, why could it not have arranged a "flat rate" for wages? Or, why could it not have laid down some specific rules concerning rates of pay to the workers? When are the workers going to compel Government to safeguard their interests?

Anyhow, many large clothiers are, no doubt, making fine profits even out of the sub-contracting—why do the Government allow this sub-contracting? It leads to sweating. And sweating is the very thing the Government wished to avoid. Surely, if the Government can arrange the employers' profits—

The Co-operative News
13/2/15

FUSION OF FORCES AND THE WAR.

CO-OPERATORS who are now discussing the question of the "fusion of forces" might turn their attention, with profit, to the state of things created by the war. They would probably find that the employing classes are having the best of the game. It is essential that a co-operative journal should deal with the working-class point of view in either local or national affairs. The working classes form the backbone of the movement, and if they are reduced in economic standing, or in general labour conditions, the co-operative movement would doubtlessly suffer in consequence. But the workers are too much at sixes and sevens one with another to be able to safeguard their interests with that security and success which the employing classes and the middlemen have achieved during the great upshot of the war situation. The result is, they are always on the defensive, through not looking after their own affairs sooner. Circumstances of to-day point to the necessity and power of some form of fusion of forces, or some better means of enforcing justice.

There is more unrest at present among the industrial classes than most of us are aware of. But it is being suppressed by the supreme patriotism of the common people. Food prices continue to rise. This is lessening the value of wages. People are suffering the consequences, not exactly quietly, but patiently. There have been outcries by the railway workers, by sections of the engineering trades, by female operatives in clothing factories, by weavers and others in the khaki manufacturing towns of the woollen industry. But it is clear that these dissatisfied workers are prepared to do anything rather than go out on strike at present. They are ready to place their own interests second to the interests of the nation. It is very well known that in most cases the employing classes grasped the opportunity of protecting themselves first of all, and shouting for the country afterwards. On the other hand, the working classes, especially the sound artisan and labouring classes, have acted with true patriotism in two ways: they have readily joined the colours, and those who have remained in the workshops have suffered injustice rather than cause any disturbance of trade, or any interference with the pressing needs of the country. And behind this admirable spirit, employers, middlemen, merchants, transporters, and others have not hesitated to extract undue wealth out of the circumstances. The price of living goes up, and wages relatively go down.

At the same time, the workers are too divided and too indifferent to take time by the forelock. See how the employers unite for that purpose. Take the clothing trade. By placing a united front to the Government, the employers in this industry were able, despite the extremely critical state of the country, to exact a contract rate for making Army clothing that was actually much higher than could be obtained in times of peace in ordinary trade channels. There was to be no competition. All expenses of competition were to be eliminated. By their unity and class influence they were able to secure such rates of pay for their work that they must have known, and the Government must have known, that wholesale clothiers in a large way of business would amass fortunes out of single transactions. (Further details of the contracts are given by our "Special Commissioner" on another page.) The workers had to take pot luck. Many of them are probably earning higher wages on making up khaki clothing than they could do on ordinary work; many we believe are earning less. But when the Government was agreeing to a liberal flat rate of pay for employers, why did it not impose conditions about the payment of wages? Simply because the interests of the workers were not looked after. And whilst the masses remain split up in so many social and political camps, the clothing employers can afford to smile, seated comfortably on their elaborate pile of profits.

The war is evidently going to create great changes in the ranks of labour. The War Office is apparently not prepared to rest satisfied till every man of suitable age becomes a military or naval defender. Cheap and worn-out labour will be employed in the place of skilled labour. Women will be induced to take the place of men in fields, factories, warehouses, and offices. Machinery will be introduced also to replace labour shortage, no doubt, in all trades metal, textile, and others. Machinery means cheap labour, the replacement of skilled by semi-skilled labour, of male by female labour. Doubtlessly, alterations will take place in labour conditions that were never anticipated, and that have never been equalled in such a short period. All this was [illegible] in the speech of the Under-the employers' liberal profits—they can and ought to arrange for a living wage among the operatives. See what the profit-makers are doing. Mr. E. F. Hitchcock has an article on the subject in the "Toynbee Record." He says that on each overcoat, the contractor in East London makes a profit of 7s. 1d.; he also gets sub-contractors to make coats at 3s. 3d. each. The contractor pays 17s. 8d. (about) for material and gets 28s. for the coat from the Government. Hence, when he has paid a sub-contractor 3s. 3d., he supplies the Government with a coat at 28s. for which he has paid only 20s. 11d. If he sub-lets thousands of coats and suits on these conditions, you will perceive that he would net a big sum of money without as much as raising a little finger. Now the sub-contractor has also to make a profit: he pays 2s. 3½d. for the labour on an overcoat, and makes a profit of 11½d. Isn't it a beautiful system? Money for nothing.

The clothing trade, as you may know, is now mainly a female industry. Males only perform the work of cutting and pressing. The rest is machine labour done by females. But that is no reason at all why the Government, or somebody (where were the Labour M.P.'s?) should not have seen to it that these women had a better share of this nation's money. The Government broke into an old tradition, an old shibboleth, by fixing a "flat rate" for profit makers, and dispensing with the glorious doctrine of competition. Could the Government not have gone a step further in breaking through accepted theories and practices (often woodenly accepted), and dictated the price of labour on the same liberal terms as they dictated the price of profits? But perhaps the workers are so hopelessly divided in their political faith in the politics of the upper classes, that the upper classes don't care anything about them—except when the general election re-appears, and the candidate's wife comes round to kiss the babies.

But look at the subject before us from another point of view. Besides seeking [illegible] there is the getting of redress through co-operation. I have been told that in ordinary times a soldier's tunic costs somewhat under 11s.; at present the Government is paying about 12s. 6d. In addition to that, the tunic, being made for war uses, has less hand work put into it. Where do you think the extra profit gets to? Not in the purses of the workers.

Well, I was referring to the redress methods of co-operation. Now the C.W.S. are carrying out khaki suit contracts for the War Office. Like all other clothiers, they get the "flat rate" for making up the clothes. They know what the profit is. And knowing that, they have thought of the workers, and granted them a little extra, despite the fact that they were paying previously higher wages than those generally paid by other clothing firms. This is what co-operation has done voluntarily.

Co-operation has led the way. What is the position under individualism in Leeds and London, and maybe elsewhere? In Leeds 30,000 female workers have failed to bring the low-rated mills and workshops up to the standard level. They have rejected a resolution to strike, probably on account of the fact that their brothers in the Army are waiting for clothing In small workshops and in outworkers' homes, both in Leeds and London, wages and hours conditions pretty near akin to sweating are known to exist.

Meanwhile, the fat men pocket the fat profits. They make fat profits on the contracts they carry out in their own firms. They make fat profits out of the soldiers' clothing they let to sub-contractors. And they have readily used the capitalist press to misrepresent the workers' claims for a fair share of the nation's work. The Government have made a cut-and-dried road to fortune for them—rather they have persuaded the Government to do it. How long—how long are the indispensable workers going to remain silent and indifferent under this wealth manœuvring of the monied classes?

[illegible] At these conferences the following Resolution will be moved:—"That a body such as the Women's Guild is not entitled to speak in the name of the whole movement on a question such as divorce, in which acute differences of opinion among co-operators have arisen, and which question contravenes the terms of neutrality hitherto observed by the co-operative movement."

We desire to point out that the Guild has never claimed that it is entitled to speak, nor has it ever spoken, in the name of the whole movement on the question of divorce. It is especially surprising that such an implication should be made by a sectional board, considering that in March, 1914 this point was dealt with in correspondence with the United Board. In answer to a letter from Mr. Whitehead, we said: 'As regards 'carrying on propaganda of this nature in the name of the co-operative movement,' we would submit that this has never been done. The Guild acts independently, and even in our strictly co-operative campaigns on behalf of anti-credit, extension of co-operation to the poor, minimum wage, it has seemed often as if the official movement preferred us to work apart. It is only when we have received support by resolutions from the Co-operative Parliamentary Committee or other bodies (e.g., on women's suffrage or on our present maternity scheme) that we are able to use publicly the valuable backing of the movement."

We made a further correction of this misunderstanding after the C.C.B. meeting at Dublin. The organising secretary of the Salford Catholic Federation there stated that the Divorce Law Reform Union used the Guild agitation as proof that the organised workers of the co-operative movement were in favour of divorce. The secretary of this union wrote to say the statement was untrue, and that he had quite understood that the Guild acted without committing the movement. We therefore informed the United Board that the charge was unwarranted.

The above resolution further implies that the objection to the discussion of Divorce Law Reform is because there are acute differences of opinion among co-operators" on this question. Are there not also "acute differences" on such questions as fusion of forces, free trade, and even minimum wage and credit trading? and are we, therefore, to suppose that the Midland Sectional Board desires to suppress freedom of speech on all these questions?

A further reason for the objection to free speech on [illegible] proved by the fact that the more enlightened divorce laws of Scotland, Switzerland, Norway, and most other European nations, form no bar to Catholics maintaining their own views. The question has been taken up by the Guild on account of the terrible social and personal evils connected with it, and the freedom from any attack on individual religious views is evidenced by the fact that Catholic Guildswomen in different parts of the country have whole-heartedly supported the right of the Guild to discuss this question.

We claim that Divorce Law Reform should be classed rather as a social reform than as a religious question. In matters of social reform, co-operation cannot be separated from other sides of national and domestic life. This century has seen a complete change in what are accepted as the functions of government. Government now touches the lives of individuals and voluntary associations at every point. Parliament has entered the home, the factory, and the store, and it is for co-operation to use its power in influencing laws in the interests of its members.

Co-operative congresses have discussed and passed resolutions on land reform, education, housing, women's suffrage, trade boards, and many other "political" subjects.

Is the Women's Guild—speaking only for itself and not for the movement—less justified in taking up "political" subjects which affect married women, such as the national care of maternity and the reform of our antiquated divorce laws? It is not always realised that our law is not only behind most other European countries, but that the English law is behind the Scottish law, which recognises the same standard of conduct for men and women before the law, and desertion as a ground for divorce.

The resolution put forward by the Midland Board does not deal, apparently, with the most important point in the present controversy, which is whether the Guild shall retain its self-government, or whether the United Board (on which no woman sits) should control the choice of the Guild's subjects—co-operative and citizen. But while the resolution only mentions Divorce Law Reform, it undermines the self-government of the Guild, and should, therefore, be strenuously opposed.

We earnestly trust that societies will read the statement of the Guild position now being forwarded to them, workers are too much at sixes and sevens one with another to be able to safeguard their interests with that security and success which the employing classes and the middlemen have achieved during the great upshot of the war situation. The result is, they are always on the defensive, through not looking after their own affairs sooner. Circumstances of to-day point to the necessity and power of some form of fusion of forces, or some better means of enforcing justice.

THE CENTRAL COMMITTEE, W.C.G.

There is more unrest at present among the industrial classes than most of us are aware of. But it is being suppressed by the supreme patriotism of the common people. Food prices continue to rise. This is lessening the value of wages. People are suffering the consequences, not exactly quietly, but patiently. There have been outcries by the railway workers, by sections of the engineering trades, by female operatives in clothing factories, by weavers and others in the khaki manufacturing towns of the woollen industry. But it is clear that these dissatisfied workers are prepared to do anything rather than go out on strike at present. They are ready to place their own interests second to the interests of the nation. It is very well known that in most cases the employing classes grasped the opportunity of protecting themselves first of all, and shouting for the country afterwards. On the other hand, the working classes, especially the sound artisan and labouring classes, have acted with true patriotism in two ways: they have readily joined the colours, and those who have remained in the workshops have suffered injustice rather than cause any disturbance of trade, or any interference with the pressing needs of the country. And behind this admirable spirit, employers, middlemen, merchants, transporters, and others have not hesitated to extract undue wealth out of the circumstances. The price of living goes up, and wages relatively go down.

---

At the same time, the workers are too divided and too indifferent to take time by the forelock. See how the employers unite for that purpose. Take the clothing trade. By placing a united front to the Government, the employers in this industry were able, despite the extremely critical state of the country, to exact a contract rate for making Army clothing that was actually much higher than could be obtained in times of peace in ordinary trade channels. There was to be no competition. All expenses of competition were to be eliminated. By their unity and class influence they were able to secure such rates of pay for their work that they must have known, and the Government must have known, that wholesale clothiers in a large way of business would amass fortunes out of single transactions. (Further details of the contracts are given by our "Special Commissioner" on another page.) The workers had to take pot luck. Many of them are probably earning higher wages on making up khaki clothing than they could do on ordinary work; many we believe are earning less. But when the Government was agreeing to a liberal flat rate of pay for employers, why did it not impose conditions about the payment of wages? Simply because the interests of the workers were not looked after. And whilst the masses remain split up in so many social and political camps, the clothing employers can afford to smile, seated comfortably on their elaborate pile of profits.

The war is evidently going to create great changes in the ranks of labour. The War Office is apparently not prepared to rest satisfied till every man of suitable age becomes a military or naval defender. Cheap and worn-out labour will be employed in the place of skilled labour. Women will be induced to take the place of men in fields, factories, warehouses, and offices. Machinery will be introduced also to replace labour shortage, no doubt, in all trades—metal, textile, and others. Machinery means cheap labour, the replacement of skilled by semi-skilled labour, of male by female labour. Doubtlessly, alterations will take place in labour conditions that were never anticipated, and that have never been equalled in such a short period. All this has been foreshadowed in the speech of the Under-Secretary for War in the House of Commons this week. What are the workers prepared to do to meet the effect of these changes? Are they always going to be on the defensive, always too late in seeking remedies? These are matters we need to be thinking about at present.

The Common Cause
2/7/15
In Parliament

658
658/18

Wednesday, June 23rd.

WAR OFFICE CONTRACTS.

MR. CLYNES (N.-E. Manchester, Lab.) asked the FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (Mr. Forster) whether the firm of Hepburn, Gale and Ross, leather manufacturers, Bermondsey, held a contract with the Department; if so, whether he was aware that the wages paid by that firm were much lower than those paid by similar firms in the neighbourhood, and that girls employed on haversack and pack sewing, who have to buy their own thread, wax, and needles, can only earn about 3d. in an hour and a-half; and whether he would make inquiries with a view to the provisions of the Fair Wages Clause being complied with.

MR. FORSTER replied that the firm named held contracts for the War Office. He had no knowledge of the facts alleged in the question, but would have the matter inquired into.

Johnston Osborn - 16.2.15

PAYMENT FOR OVERTIME ON KHAKI CONTRACTS.

BALLOT ON THE EMPLOYERS' OFFER.

A ballot is being taken of the members of the General Union of Textile Workers in the Huddersfield and Colne Valley districts upon an offer made by the employers as to the payment of overtime rates for weavers

It will be remembered that after the Christmas holidays over 1,200 weavers employed on the production of khaki cloth ceased to work overtime in consequence of the employers refusing to concede extra payment. Meetings of the workpeople were held, and it was decided to request the payment of 1½d. per hour and a limitation of overtime working. After a conference the employers refused to grant the terms, and the matter was referred to Sir George Askwith, the Chief Industrial Commissioner of the Board of Trade, with a view to conciliation.

The employers then offered, through Sir George Askwith, the following terms:—

> That men weavers shall be paid for overtime at the rate of 1½d. per hour and women weavers at the rate of 1d. per hour after ten hours' work on any one day, and on Saturday at the same rates after five and a-half hours. Each day would stand by itself, but operatives would not be entitled to claim overtime rates on a day when they lose time of their own accord until such lost time has been made up.

The operatives are being asked to vote for or against the acceptance of these terms.

Yorkshire Observer.
9. 3. 15.

OVERTIME ON GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS.

SIR GEORGE ASKWITH'S AWARD IN THE HUDDERSFIELD DISPUTE.

The award made by Sir George R. Askwith, the Chief Industrial Commissioner of the Board of Trade, in the weavers' overtime dispute in the Colne Valley and Huddersfield districts has been accepted by the executive of the General Union of Textile Workers on behalf of the operatives. Sir George Askwith had reported to him at a conference held in London on Friday last the result of a ballot of the operatives upon an offer of the employers to the effect that men weavers be paid 1½d. and women weavers 1d. per hour extra for overtime. The number of votes cast was 4,350, and there was a majority of 720 against the employers' offer being accepted. The conclusion come to by Sir George Askwith was expressed by him in the following terms:—

> My opinion, after hearing both parties, and in view of all the circumstances of the case, is that the dispute ought to be settled upon the basis of 1½d. per hour for all weavers after ten hours' work on any one day, and after five and a-half hours on Saturday. Time lost by weaver's own accord on any day to be made up before the above rates are paid.

The employers' representatives at the conference intimated that they were prepared to act upon this opinion.

The executive of the Textile Union have since considered a report made to them by their representatives at the conference. In this report it was stated that Sir George Askwith said nothing with regard to the request of the union that overtime hours should be limited to ten per week. The executive passed a resolution recommending the weavers to accept Sir George Askwith's award as to the rates of pay on condition that overtime hours were limited to ten per week for men, and nine per week for women and young persons. It was stated that before the conference some firm had posted notices to the effect that they would pay 1½d. per hour extra for overtime to all weavers, with a limitation of overtime to ten hours per week for men and eight hours per week for women.

Yorkshire Observer.
1. 3. 15.

65

OVERTIME RATES ON KHAKI CONTRACTS.

WEAVERS REJECT THE EMPLOYERS' TERMS.

The result of the ballot taken by the General Union of Textile Workers on the question of overtime rates for the weavers of the Huddersfield and Colne Valley district engaged on Government contracts was reported at the annual delegate meeting of the union held at Huddersfield on Saturday. Mr. Ben Turner (Mayor of Batley) presided. There was a large attendance of delegates.

The members had been asked to vote for or against the acceptance of a "final offer" which had been made by the employers through Sir George Askwith as follows:—

> That men weavers shall be paid for overtime at the rate of 1½d. per hour and women weavers at the rate of 1d. per hour after ten hours' work on any one day, and on Saturday at the same rates after five and a-half hours. Each day would stand by itself, but operatives would not be entitled to claim overtime rates on a day when they lost time of their own accord until such lost time had been made up.

The result of the ballot was a very substantial majority against this offer being accepted.

A long discussion on the question took place, strong objection being made to any differentiation between men and women weavers, the feeling being that the Union's demand for 1½d. per hour all round should be insisted upon. It was also strongly urged that overtime hours should be limited to not more than ten per week, two being worked each night from Monday to Friday, thus dispensing with Saturday afternoon and Sunday labour. It was stated that the Home Office had limited the overtime hours for women and young persons to nine per week.

A resolution was passed empowering the executive committee to take what further action in the matter they deemed desirable.

A motion from the Bradford District suggesting that burlers, knotters, and menders should be put under a Trade Board was referred to the executive, who were also instructed to consider the position of any other underpaid labour in textile mills.

A further motion from Bradford—that the question of appointing a woman organiser be considered—was referred to the districts.

The officers of the union were re-elected, namely: President, Mr. Ben Turner; general secretary, Mr. Allen Gee (Huddersfield), and treasurer, Mr. W. H. Hudson (Huddersfield). The secretary was appointed the union's delegate to the annual meeting of the General Federation of Trade Unions.

The next delegate meeting will be held in August, and the invitation of the Heavy Woollen District to hold the meeting in that area was accepted.

24/8/15

658/20

In connection with the work on war munitions, two cases reported the other day in the Manchester Guardian give glimpses of a side of the picture which is scarcely ever presented to the public. The first was that of a girl under 18 years of age, who had been made to work in an ammunition factory in Leeds for 25 hours continuously, at the end of which time she, not surprisingly, met with an accident. The number of hours permissible under the Factory Act have been considerably extended, but not, needless to say, to this amount. The Home Office thought fit to prosecute the employer, but the magistrate adjourned the case sine die, and declared that if he were compelled to proceed with it he would endeavour to deal with the offenders under the Probation Act. The second case was that of a workman at the Enfield Small Arms Factory, who died last week of overstrain caused by prolonged exertion. He had worked 80 hours a week for eight months. It is not unreasonable that men should be asked in war time to take the risk of dying for their country in this way, but it is both unreasonable and ungenerous in the face of such facts that employers should ignore the effects of overstrain on time-keeping and ascribe lost time solely to alcoholic excess. As regards the case of the girl, we hope the proceedings will be continued, by mandamus if necessary. The state of mind of a magistrate who thinks that the nation can gain anything even momentarily by working young girls for 25 hours at a stretch ought not to be encouraged; there is more of panic than of patriotism in it.

The Yorkshire Observer
17/4/15

THE URGENCY OF GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS.

LEEDS WOMEN'S LONG HOURS.

Greenwood & Batley, Ltd., the well-known Leeds firm, were summoned at the Leeds City Police Court yesterday on a charge of having contravened the Factory and Workshops Act by allowing women to work longer than the Home Office regulations permitted. Mr. C. P. Wright, who prosecuted, said that in one case a young girl had worked from 6 a.m. on Friday until 11 a.m. on Saturday, and in another a woman had worked four hours longer. These hours were in excess of the emergency regulations issued by the Home Office.

Mr. Arthur Willey, for the defendants, submitted that as the War Office had insisted upon a minimum output which kept the workers going at full pressure any breach of the Home Office regulations should not be made the subject of such a prosecution. It was likely to be a serious matter, he said, if that Court were to overrule the War Office on the eve of the Prime Minister's Newcastle speech urging workpeople to greater energy. The firm of Greenwood and Batley manufactured cartridges, and in the making of one cartridge there were sixty-seven processes. All the girls had to do was to feed machines by passing cartridge-cases into slots. The processes advanced steadily, and on a Friday there was a risk, if the girls did not work overtime, of the whole of the processes coming to nothing. The girls were well cared for in every way. They earned from £1 to £2 a week; they had a magnificent mess-room, and a trained nurse and a housekeeper tended them. If unduly fatigued a girl could have an hour or so of rest. Every effort was made to secure their comfort.

Mr. Horace Marshall (Stipendiary Magistrate) adjourned the case sine die. Even if a mandamus were secured, he said, he would consider the possibility of dealing with the defendants under the Probation Act.

The Textile Mercury
11/4/15.

Cardroom Workers and War Conditions

In the most recently issued report of the Amalgamated Association of Card and Blowing Room Operatives, reference is made to the attitude of the Amalgamation upon the question of overtime working in mills in which Government contracts are being dealt with. Mr. W. Mullin, the general secretary of the Association, favours the working of additional hours in order that the men at the front may be kept well supplied with clothing and munitions of war. This attitude is in striking contrast to that of the operative spinners, who have adversely criticised any request to work overtime. Of the total number of cardroom operatives about 82 per cent. are females; and although these women may not be able to stand the strain of overtime like men (who have no domestic duties to perform), they are willing to put in longer hours, provided that they are properly compensated for the extra work. The report states that no restrictions should be put upon the production of war equipment—a declaration which is not very original but which is very sensible, and one which is worthy of serious thought by those trade unionists who have not realised, even at this late day, the importance of the task on which the country and her Allies are engaged.

Mr. Mullin also makes comment upon the increased prices of foodstuffs and other commodities since the commencement of the war. The cost of living has been increasing for a number of years, but the advance of prices of necessaries of life has naturally been more particularly marked since the commencement of the war. Compared with other leading industries, the cotton trade has, unfortunately, been in the least favourable position to consider proposals for increased wages or war bonuses to workers. This must have been clear to the operatives' officials, who have recently been seeking to help the members of their organisation by pressing for more remuneration. The inflation of food prices is not caused by men who have much (if any) connection with the textile industries. But, as Mr. Mullin remarks, the consumer has to pay, and he endeavours to obtain compensation from his employer. Most requests for increased wages in recent years have been based on the higher cost of living, and since this higher cost lessens the real value both of wages and profits of industry, employers and workpeople might see whether anything could be done by joint action to lessen the pernicious influence of middlemen and speculators in the raw material and the distributive trades.

Mr. Mullin appears to think that the recent applications for a war bonus might have received more favourable consideration by the employers, irrespective of the five years' wages truce in the cotton spinning branch of the industry. He suggests that if some elasticity cannot be shewn at a time like the present, lengthy periods of wages agreements are not likely to be willingly accepted in future. It is well known that, for the past twelve months or more, the condition of the cotton trade has not been such as would justify the granting of any advance in wages. The truce to which allusion is made in the Cardroom Amalgamation's report ends on August 8th next, and there are signs that the operatives are hopeful of securing a reconsideration of the wages rates when that time arrives. The workers would do well to restrain themselves in their castle-building, for it is hardly to be expected that the employers will be able to concede any advance—even in August next.

658/21

Evening Standard, May 13th. 1915.

War-work and Overtime.

Attacks are from time to time made upon one or other Government department, and the man in the street is seldom backward in offering his advice free of cost. Sometimes criticism is justified, though in many instances examination proves it baseless.

So much, however, can scarcely be said about the case heard at Leeds, in which an engineering firm was summoned for alleged contravention of the Factory and Workshops Act. Two girls had been kept at work beyond the legal hours, with no complaint on their part.

The additional hours had been occasioned by a breakdown on a previous day. The Home Office argument was that extended hours do not produce satisfactory results in the supply of munitions of war. At the same time, as counsel for the defence pointed out, every possible cartridge is required.

The whole affair in itself was small. Only two persons were involved, and they made no grievance of the matter. The principle of guarding against bad results from overwork, it is true, was involved. But to what extent?

The dismissal of the case by the Bench will be generally endorsed by public opinion.

John Bull, May 22nd. 1915.

Mr. McKenna Again.

An Army officer, writing with full knowledge, asks us to register "another indictment of Mr. McKenna, who refuses to relax the regulations concerning overtime of young men and women, by which alone can firms complete Government orders." Last week, Mr. Marshall Hall, K.C.—defending at Leeds a firm summoned for contravening the Factory and Workshops Act by employing girls on war work beyond lawful hours, the Magistrate refusing, in the circumstances, to convict—gave the Home Secretary a verbal dressing down which he will probably long remember. "It was," said he, "Mr. McKenna who was responsible. He had always tried to shelter himself behind other people, and now he tried to shelter behind the War Office. According to Mr. McKenna, when there was a breakdown Mr. Barker (the manager of the firm) had to run to London for permission to work these girls a few extra hours. Did they ever hear of such folly except from Mr. McKenna or the Home Office? His incompetence was nearly equal to his conceit." We leave it at that.

Drapers' Record, May 22nd 1915.

Mr. McKenna's Folly.

If the matter was not serious, there would be something distinctly humorous about the case before the Leeds magistrate last week, in which a firm of War Office contractors were summoned for a breach of the Factory Act. We are being told constantly that the nation is fighting for its life, and that munitions are urgently needed. Whilst the War Office thus urges employers and employed to put in "every ounce," the Home Office promptly prosecutes them if they exceed the working hours laid down by law for times of peace. The factory inspectors, apparently, lack all sense of proportion, and are unable to realise that in the present emergency supplies are of greater importance even than the provisions of the Factory Act. In the case under comment, the firm were defended by Mr. Marshall Hall, K.C., who indulged in some scathing criticism of Mr. McKenna and the Home Office. It seems that owing to a temporary breakdown of a machine two girls engaged on cartridges worked in excess of the legal hours, quite willingly. Counsel said instead of being prosecuted, the girls ought to have been given a medal, and at a time like this, when we knew that every possible cartridge was required, it was a piece of fatuous folly to bring such a case before the Court. Most people will agree, and the magistrate evidently did, for he dismissed the summons. It is right to observe the law, but there are some laws that must be relaxed in war-time. Mr. McKenna perhaps has not yet realised that fact.

Daily Mail, May 13th. 1915.

ATTACK ON MR. McKENNA.

WAR WORK OVERTIME.

Strong criticism of the Home Office and Mr. McKenna was made during the resumed hearing of a case at Leeds yesterday in which Messrs. Greenwood and Batley, engineers, were summoned for alleged contraventions of the Factory and Workshops Act by having kept two girls at work beyond the lawful hours.

Mr. Shepherd, for the Home Office, said that long experience had convinced the Home Office and the War Office that extension of hours of labour did not produce very satisfactory or constantly increasing supplies of munitions of war.

Mr. Marshall Hall, K.C., M.P., representing Messrs. Greenwood and Batley, said that to him it was inconceivable that any officer of the State except the present Home Secretary could have adopted a course such as had been adopted here. At a time like this, when we knew that every possible cartridge was required, it was a piece of fatuous folly to bring such a prosecution, which was only justified by a supreme ignorance.

MEDALS, NOT PROSECUTION.

If the Home Office had instituted a special medal for these girls who were willing and anxious to work it would have been better on the part of Mr. McKenna than to bring this prosecution. The extra hours had been occasioned by a breakdown on a particular day. No complaint had been made by the girls.

It was Mr. McKenna who was responsible. He always tried to shelter himself behind other people and now he tried to shelter behind the War Office. According to Mr. McKenna, when there was a breakdown Mr. Barker had to run to London for permission to work these girls a few extra hours. Did they ever hear of such folly except from Mr. McKenna or the Home Office? His incompetence was nearly equal to his conceit.

The magistrate said he did not think the slur of a conviction should be brought against the firm, but they must work according to schedule. He dismissed the case.

The Common Cause, May 14th. 1915. 658/22 658

Army Clothing Contracts.

Sub-Contracting and Profits.

[It is necessary to remind our readers that there is no editorial responsibility for opinions expressed in signed articles.]

Since the Sweated Industries Exhibition of 1906 and the agitation which preceded the passing of the Trade Boards Act of 1909 a popular impression has gained credence that sweating in the tailoring trade is the result of the greed and unscrupulousness of small employers in the East End of London known as sub-contractors, or more popularly as middlemen, generally of foreign or Jewish extraction, who exploit women's labour "because it is cheap," thereby making large profits at little exertion, save of bullying, to themselves. That picture, though simple in its explanation and helpful in propaganda among people who are without knowledge or are apathetic, is nevertheless an illusion. Whilst it persists there is little hope of anything being suggested which will be helpful in solving a problem which is still, in spite of the Trade Boards Act, untouched by legislation or public opinion.

First of all, I wish emphatically to say that, save in very exceptional cases, there has been no "sweating" as technically defined under the Trade Boards Act (i.e., the payment to adult workers of piece rates which yield less than a minimum time rate of 3½d. per hour to women and 6d. per hour to men), on military khaki clothing in East London. When the writer of an article in The Common Cause of April 23rd says that "the labour of unorganised females has been reduced to the lowest subsistence level in connection with the making of clothing for the soldiers now fighting the battles of the nation," he makes a statement for which I think he will find no support if he examines the facts. Far from being reduced, wages in the lower grades of the tailoring trade have rather increased, owing to the pressure of Government orders for khaki clothing and the scarcity of labour. Wages of 5s. for a week's work (quoted by your contributor) are not paid in East London to home-workers or any other class of workers on khaki clothing. It is necessary, of course, in this connection to distinguish "learners" from ordinary workers. If investigators hear of ordinary women workers receiving less than 13s. 6½d., free of all deductions for sewings, &c., for a fifty hours' week on such work, it is their duty to report the cases at once to the Office of Trade Boards, and, if they are substantiated, prosecution of the employer will speedily follow. We now have a weapon to combat sweating in the tailoring trade. We must learn to use that weapon.

The London tailoring trade is very varied and complicated, ranging as it does from the making of expensive West End bespoke work to cheap slop clothing for export to the South African Kaffir market, and from the factory system mainly employing woman labour to the highly organised sub-divisional system of the Jewish master tailor employing chiefly men, which successfully competes with it. Comparisons of rates of wages and methods of work are impossible within the limits of a short article, but it is safe to say that the rates of wages paid on Government khaki clothing are on the whole higher than those normally paid for more or less similar work in the ready-made and the wholesale bespoke trade. The words put into the mouth of the woman worker by your contributor, "But, thank God, mister, I ain't on khaki," misrepresent the facts. The letter from the Honorary Secretary of the Homeworkers' League, which appeared in The Common Cause of last week, states very emphatically the point of view on this matter of one whose chief interest lies in bettering the wages and conditions of women homeworkers.

Considerable profits have, of course, been made by manufacturers and persons who in some cases have acted as little more than middlemen. These persons have not been sub-contractors, nor sub-sub-sub-contractors, but in the majority of cases contractors. For this state of affairs the War Office Clothing Contract Department in the first months of the war was directly to blame. It displayed at a very critical period an extraordinary incompetence and lack of foresight, though it is only fair to add that it has since been re-organised. It is true that of the margin left after deducting the cost of material from the price paid for clothing by the War Office, a comparatively small proportion has gone in wages and a relatively large proportion in profits. If we compare the wages bill of the small employer or sub-contractor with that of the factory occupier or contractor, we find that the comparison is by no means to the disadvantage of the former. The Jewish master tailor, having his small workshop in East London, employs mainly male workers. He knows that women's labour is not necessarily "cheap" labour. Although he probably knows nothing of economics, his practical experience warns him against what was once a popular theory of wages —that of the Wages Fund. He knows that wages do not come out of a fixed fund or "pool," but from a "stream," the volume of which depends directly upon the efficiency of the instruments of production, of which labour is one. His practice, indeed, supports the view held by modern economists and stated by Adam Smith, that "the produce of labour constitutes the natural recompense or wages of labour."

If we compare the relative profits of the contractor and the sub-contractor, it is obvious that the contractor, because of his strategic position in the industry, easily takes the lion's share in the profit on each garment, not because of what he contributes to its making, but in his capacity of middleman. In the first of a series of "Studies in the Minimum Wage,"* published by the Ratan Tata Foundation, Mr. R. H. Tawney discusses at some length the alleged exactions of the sub-contractor, or middleman as he is popularly called. The following quotation from that book applies with as much force to tailoring in London as to chain-making in Cradley Heath, to which it specifically refers :—

> "The exactions of the middlemen are not the cause, but a symptom, of the general disorganisation of the industry, and we must hasten to point out that what is said does not imply that he has any special responsibility for the bad condition of this or any other trade. In the denunciations sometimes launched against the sub-contractor, there is a good deal of ignorance and a certain amount of hypocrisy. The desire of society to find a scapegoat for industrial brutality without impeaching wealth, position, and respectability, has in the past led the more romantic of the writers who have described 'sweating' to personify it as a sinister figure, swollen with profits made by taking out work at a high price from the employer, and getting it done at a low price by the worker. That such monsters exist is probably true, though they are not numerous at Cradley Heath. That sweating is a 'system' which depends on the malpractices of 'sub-contractors' is wholly untrue—most unfortunately untrue, for, if it were, it would be comparatively easy to abolish it."

With a repetition of the warning that the sub-division of work and other complications of the tailoring trade make the quoting of figures in this trade extremely difficult, let us consider concretely some of the points indicated above. At the beginning of the war, the War Office and the Wholesale Clothiers' Federation fixed the following flat rates for military clothing :—

Great-coats (drab mixture, dismounted) ...	28s.	each.
Jackets (Service dress)	12s. 6d.	,,	(later 12s. 8d.)
Trousers (Service dress)	8s. 9d.	pair	(later 8s. 11d.)

The materials (including all fittings and trimmings) were supplied to the contractors at certain fixed rates by the War Office. The sewings, i.e., silk and thread, have never been supplied by the Government (your contributor has been misinformed on this point), and it is a normal practice of the trade for these to be supplied by the sub-contractor, who fixes his workers' piece rates inclusive of these sewings, or else expects the worker to find her own, for which, of course, an allowance is made in the piece rates paid.

Of the contract undertaken by the contractor, part is done in his own factory, but a considerable proportion is given out to smaller employers (sub-contractors) after the cloth has been "cut" to pattern by band-knife machines. The sub-contractors are generally without the up-to-date machinery found in the larger factories, and few of them use power in their workshops. Owing to their lack of organisation, they must generally take work at the price fixed by the contractor, and they have little opportunity of bargaining. They work hard themselves, and have in most cases a considerable knowledge of the trade. Like the factories, they employ both "indoor" and "outdoor" workers, though the proportion of women employed in the factories is generally considerably greater than in the smaller workshops. The method of work adopted and developed by the small master Jew is known as the sub-divisional system, and this system has been brought to such perfection by him that he is still able successfully to compete with the factory in most grades of work. His expenses of production—maintenance charges, supervision, &c.—are probably lower than those of the factory, and his personal supervision prevents "leakages," such as take place in most large factories. As a general rule, of course, unless the sub-divisional method of work is very scientifically developed (and it is capable of much development), the smaller the employer below a certain scale, the greater is his cost of production, until one comes to a point where hand and individual workers are unable to compete with machine and sub-divisional work (e.g., to make the buttonholes in a military great-coat by machine costs 2¾d.; by hand it would cost 1s. 6d.)

P.T.O.

* Minimum Rates in the Chain-Making Industry. G. Bell & Sons.

4 M. 1915. 658/22 658.

But to return to our concrete example. Below is an example showing how the money paid by the War Office on military garments is distributed in the case of orders which are sub-contracted.

	Great-coats.	Tunics.	Trousers.
Cost to contractor of	s. d.	s. d.	s. d.
Materials	17 0	6 8	5 11
Cutting	0 4	0 3	0 1¾
	17 4	6 11	6 0¾
Paid to sub-contractor for making up ...	3 6	3 0	1 0
	20 10	9 11	7 0¾
Paid by War Office for made up garment	28 0	12 8	8 11
Gross profit per garment to sub-contractor	7 2	2 9	1 10¼
Cost to sub-contractor of
Wages	2 5⅓	2 2¾	0 8½
Received from contractor	3 6	3 0	1 0
Gross profit per garment to sub-contractor	1 0½	0 9¼	0 3½

Higher prices than those quoted above have of course, been paid by some contractors (especially when the delivery of contracts was overdue), but even lower prices have also been paid. In these cases the sub-contractor has most of the responsibility of turning out the work, but his net profit, owing to his establishment expenses, are proportionally lower than is represented by the comparative gross profits shown above. Wages in the wages bills quoted above, which are higher than in pre-war times, would vary from 16s., for women finishers, to £3 to £3 10s., for men fitters and machiners for a 54-hours' week. In cases of sub-contracting, the middleman is not the sub-contractor, but the contractor whose profits are out of all proportion to the services which he renders. The wages paid on military clothing, though small, are not "sweating" wages, though they form but a small proportion to the profits made by the contractor. On the basis of the above figures, the profit made by the contractor who obtained an order for 3,000,000 garments must have approached a quarter of a million pounds. The total wages bill was probably not half of that sum. On army clothing the proportion between profit and wages has been absurd, but the proportion is almost as absurd in peace times on civilian work. The underpayment of the sub-contractor by the contractor is a normal practice in the tailoring trade. The sub-contractor bears the responsibility; the contractor takes the bulk of the profits. The problem of how this can be readjusted cannot be dealt with here. It is sufficient if I have been able to indicate that the solution of the problem of underpayment in the tailoring trade requires more consideration and knowledge than the public has yet given to it. There are many forms of sub-contracting which should be abolished, and the conditions under which sub-contractors sometimes work are objectionable; but let us first consider the facts of the case before we criticise. The solution of the problem is certainly not assisted by sensational exhibitions and articles.

ELDRED F. HITCHCOCK (Secretary of Toynbee Hall).

N.U.W.S.S. SCOTTISH WOMEN'S HOSPITAL.

SERBIA.

The Serbian Legation in London has received a telegram from Nisch to say that the new Scottish Women's Hospital Unit will work at Pozarevay. For the present, however, as we reported last week, this Unit, under Dr. Alice Hutchison, is to help nurse our own men wounded in the severe fighting in the Dardanelles, having been detained at Malta for this purpose.

FRANCE.

The work at Royaumont goes steadily on. A special request has been sent from the Military authorities that the Unit should take the most serious cases, and discharge them immediately they are convalescent.

LIST OF DONATIONS.

	£	s.	d.
Forward, as per list of April 30th, 1915	25,572	9	7½
Miss A. M. Houston	5	0	0
A. W. Ralston, Esq. (Serbia)...	2	2	0
D. C. Davidson, Esq., Supt., City of Glasgow Police, Marine Division (Serbia) ...	1	0	0
Village Choir Fund of Wanlockhead, per J. Edmond, Esq., Hon. Sec. & Treas., War Relief Comm., Wanlockhead (Serbia)	2	0	0
"A Red Cross Member" (Serbia)		6	0
Per Mrs. Soddy (further contribution):—£75 from Committee of the Patriotic Sale at Ellon for three "Ellon" Beds, £125 for "Aberdeen" Beds	200	0	0
A.S.N.C. (Serbia)		1	0
Miss Findlater (Serbia) ...	6	0	0
Jas. Brown Esq. (£10 for France; £10 for Serbia) ...	20	0	0
Proceeds of Miss Train's Private Class Demonstration, per Miss E. D. MacGillivray (Serbia)	3	10	0

The Nation, May 22nd 1915.

its decision already taken. The sinking of the "Lusitania" has produced a great impression in Italy, and has done much to increase the indignation against Germany, even in circles which hitherto had been of Germanophil, or at least not Francophil, tendencies.

There still remains the problem of this immediate ground of intervention. It seems, however, as though one had been supplied by Germany, or at least by her vassal Turkey. The defection of the native irregular levies during the engagement with the Arab rebels at Syrte, on April 29th, when some 2,000 of them went over to the enemy and caused the Italian and Eritrean troops a loss of 600 men killed and wounded, seems to have been organized by the Turks, acting under German instructions, and financed by German money; numerous Turkish officers in uniform were seen among the rebel ranks. Such an act constitutes a flagrant violation of the peace treaty at Lausanne, whereby the Turco-Italian War was brought to an end. In this connection an article by Count zu Reventlow is of peculiar significance. "The revolt in Tripolitania," writes the eminent German statesman, "occurred because the Mussulman command regarded Italy as an enemy of Germany and Austria, for having forsaken her two Allies who are fighting on the side of Turkey." The admission is very valuable, for it is tantamount to a confession that the "Mussulman command" takes its orders from Berlin and Vienna, viâ Stamboul. There is, indeed, a general feeling in the air that Italy's first act of intervention will be a denunciation of the Treaty of Lausanne, and a declaration of war against Turkey. This will consequently involve the country in war against Turkey's protectors. But events march so rapidly that such a decision, or another different one, may have been taken by the time this article reaches England; never has prophecy been more dangerous.—Yours, &c.,

A Correspondent in Rome.

Communications.

WHAT ABOUT THE FACTORY ACTS?

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Some time after the outbreak of war, the Home Office was induced to relax the regulations governing factory life. For instance, the rules were relaxed (in certain urgent cases) so far as to permit women and girls to work on night-shift. It is impossible, however, to say how far the suspension of the Factory Acts has gone, or, indeed, exactly what powers have been given to the administrators of the law with regard to the altering of conditions and the lengthening of hours. But it is certain that all over the country advantage has been taken of the Home Office permission—advantage unwarranted alike by the relaxations and by the needs of the national crisis. Women and girls are being worked outrageously long hours; the authorities are being openly defied; Trade Unions are finding their actions hindered by the magistrates; convictions under the Factory Acts are hard, if not impossible, to obtain. Gradually, but surely, a great part of the Factory Legislation, the boast of social reformers, is being made of no account. Indeed, unless drastic action be taken by the Home Office and by the organized workers, backed by independent opinion, one of the legacies of the war will be a shattered and ineffective code governing the conditions of labor in this country.

The culmination of the attempt to abolish all rules and regulations is to be seen in the case of Messrs. Greenwood & Batey, Engineers, of Leeds. About a month ago, this firm was prosecuted by the Home Office for contravention of the Factory Acts. The case was tried before the Stipendiary Magistrate at Leeds, and the facts were not denied. None the less, the magistrate dismissed the summons on the plea of "national urgency," and added that "should a writ of mandamus be given, he would deal with the matter under the Probation Act." Last week the Home Office again prosecuted the firm—this time with the support of the War Office—and the Stipendiary, acting on his former promise, refused to register a conviction against the firm. He merely dealt with the case under the Probation Act, and warned the defendants that they must "work according to schedule."

The Nation, May 22nd 1915:

Such in brief are the main points in the history of this case. Now we come to the charges brought against Messrs. Greenwood & Batey, and the amazing statements of the defending Counsel, Mr. Marshall Hall, K.C. The Home Office took action because of the following gross cases of overworking two girls. The firm, taking advantage of the extension order granted to them in view of the fact that they were engaged on munition making, were allowed to work their employees from 6 a.m. to 8 p.m. on weekdays, and 6 a.m. to 2 p.m. on Saturdays. No further extension was asked for, and none was granted. Despite this, the girls went to work at 6 a.m. on a certain Friday, and one of them remained there until 7.30 the next morning—25½ hours—whilst the other girl was employed for no less than 30 hours at a stretch. One of these girls was a non-adult, of under eighteen years of age. Incidentally we might add that the girl who "got off" with 25½ hours' work was incapacitated from further exertion owing to an accident—which, in itself, is not surprising.

The defendants' Counsel declared that the Home Office prosecution was "a piece of fatuous folly, and only justified by supreme ignorance." Instead of attacking the firm, the authorities ought to have "struck a special medal for these girls." Mr. McKenna was to blame, and his action in summoning Messrs. Greenwood & Batey was unpatriotic. As for the claim that the War Office agreed with the course taken by the Home Office, the Counsel was inclined to doubt the reliability of the statement. The firm was turning out 2,000,000 cartridges a week, and now was not the time to talk about Factory Acts.

The Magistrate's decision has already been mentioned.

During the hearing of the case a very important pronouncement was made by the Home Office representative with regard to long hours and efficiency in production. He declared, on the authority of the Master-General of the Ordnance Department, that "long experience had confirmed in both these departments"—the Home Office and the War Office—"that the extension of hours of labour did not produce very satisfactory results or increase the supply of munitions of war." By making this statement through their counsel, the Government have at last admitted what has been urged both in THE NATION and elsewhere, that to increase production other measures than overtime were needed. They have added great strength to the claim put forward in various quarters for the recognition of the status of trade unions in their rôle as partners in industry. But, for the moment, that is not the main issue.

The speech of Mr. Marshall Hall—even if we recognize the fact that he is a barrister and speaks to a brief—and the attitude adopted by the firm show two things. In the first place they prove that there is a section of the community ready to sacrifice the social legislation of the past century in order to win a war of liberty. A cynic could be pardoned for pointing out the contradictions in this attitude; and he might well remark that once again, as in the Napoleonic wars, England "was winning a victory over militarism by women and child labor in the fields and factories, unrestricted and unashamed." And it is certain that a continuance of this policy of attacking the workers' safeguards can do no earthly good to the country in its war against Germany. Only by securing the loyalty of the working-class can this war be won, and to attempt to secure this loyalty by working girls 30 hours a day, or men 100 hours a week—quite regardless of fatigue—is suicidal. The workers will put their backs into their jobs more vigorously if they feel that the Government is with them. The very fact that the War Office and the Home Office have prosecuted Messrs. Greenwood & Batey will act as a spur—but their inability to secure a conviction will tend to dishearten. As for the speech of Mr. Marshall Hall, and its attack on Mr. McKenna, the less said about it the better. In the second place, this prosecution has shown how easy it is for employers to take advantage of the law and the workers. No talk about "patriotism" and "national needs" can cloud over the fact that an armament firm had been "given an inch and taken an ell." It should serve to show too how essential it is for the Home Office to watch the firms to whom extension orders have been granted, and how necessary it is for public opinion to be awakened on this question.

Finally, it is perhaps worth while to re-emphasize the considered judgment of the War Office that production is hampered by excessive overtime, and to point the obvious moral. The soldiers in France will receive an adequate supply of munitions of war, of shells and cartridges, not by the suspension of the Factory Acts, but by a reorganization of industry, even in the midst of war, which will recognize the truth that the worker is really a partner, and not a wage-earner.—Yours, &c.,

W. MELLOR.

658/23 658

The Outlook,
May 29th. 1915.

It has been pointed out that at a time when overtime is the rule in factories working for the Government, it is, to say the least, somewhat anomalous that the Home Office should allow indiscriminate prosecutions under the Factory Acts. It is true that in most instances the magistrates before whom these prosecutions have come have dismissed the case or imposed merely nominal penalties. None the less the prosecutions have been ill-advised, and should be discontinued, except in special cases, for which official sanction should first be obtained. No one would wish that factory inspection should cease, or that any gross instance of neglect or ill-usage should be condoned. But pettifogging insistence on rules that were made in normal times to meet normal conditions is a preposterous nuisance at such a time as this. It is a poor reward for the energy with which employer and employee alike are meeting Government requirements to be haled before a magistrate to answer for doing precisely what the Government has asked to be done.

Manchester Guardian 1.3.15.

OVERTIME RATES ON WAR CONTRACTS.

EMPLOYERS' OFFER REJECTED.

The result of the ballot taken by the General Union of Textile Workers on the question of overtime rates for the weavers of the Huddersfield and Colne Valley districts while engaged on Government contracts was reported at the annual delegate meeting of the union at Huddersfield on Saturday.

The members had been asked to vote for or against an offer made by the employers through Sir G. R. Askwith in the following terms:—"That men weavers shall be paid for overtime at the rate of 1½d. per hour, and women weavers at the rate of 1d. per hour after ten hours' work on any one day, and on Saturday at the same rates after five and a half hours. Each day would stand by itself, but operatives would not be entitled to claim overtime rates on a day when they lose time of their own accord until such lost time had been made up." The result of the ballot was a very substantial majority against this offer being accepted.

A long discussion took place. Strong objection was taken to any differentiation between men and women weavers, the feeling being that the union's demand for 1½d. per hour all round should be insisted upon. It was also strongly urged that overtime hours should be limited to not more than ten per week, two being worked each night from Monday to Friday, thus dispensing with Saturday afternoon and Sunday labour. It was stated that the Home Office had limited the overtime hours for women and young persons to nine per week.

A resolution was passed empowering the executive committee to take what further action in the matter they deemed desirable.

A Woman Organiser.

A motion from the Bradford district suggesting that burlers, knotters, and menders should be put under a Trade Board was referred to the executive, who were also instructed to consider the position of any other under-paid labour in textile mills.

A further motion from Bradford—that the question of appointing a woman organiser be considered—was referred to the district.

The officers of the union were re-elected:—President, Mr. Ben Turner; general secretary, Mr. Allen Gee (Huddersfield), and treasurer, Mr. W. H. Hudson (Huddersfield).

The next delegate meeting will be held in August, and the invitation of the Heavy Woollen District to hold the meeting in that area was accepted.

658/24 658.

The Yorkshire Observer,
May 26th. 1915.

Mr. McKenna and "The Morning Post."

"The Morning Post" has been very severe in its comments upon the attacks made by the Northcliffe press upon Lord Kitchener; but unfortunately it is not at all averse to undertaking a Minister-baiting campaign on its own account. Yesterday was the turn of Mr. McKenna, and an article two-thirds of a column long appeared on the leader page, professing to give, "in greater detail" than they had previously been published, the facts of a recent prosecution of a Leeds firm of engineers for overworking a girl and a woman. There are a good many interesting facts in the article. We are told, for example, that the workshop in which the girls are employed is well ventilated, that the girls are well paid and treated with consideration, and that they are working harmoniously and with the greatest possible zest. "They have started a competition between departments, that which turns out most work having the honour of holding a shield, which they have provided for themselves, while each winning girl and woman is given a shilling additional pay and each male hand two shillings by the firm." This is admirable, but it is not very relevant to the case. "The reward for such zeal in the nation's service," continues the writer, "is not one prosecution but two, in spite of magisterial disapproval. At this crisis of the country's fate the governing thought of the Home Secretary is that the regulations of the Factory Act should be observed first, and that the troops should be supplied with ammunition afterwards." There is much more to similar effect.

The Facts of the Case.

In an article which professes to give the facts in detail we might expect to find stated the hours actually worked in the cases which were the subject of the prosecution; but there are only vague references such as "the little overtime necessary to make up for a breakdown of machinery"—references which would lead the reader to believe that the overtime worked was only slightly in excess of normal factory hours. The truth is, however, that the hours were greatly in excess of the special allowance of overtime granted by the Government's Emergency Order to firms working on War Office contracts. According to the solicitor for the prosecution, one girl under 18 was kept working from 6 a.m. on Friday till 7 a.m. on Saturday, when she met with an accident—a fact which has its own significance; and a woman was kept working from 6 a.m. on Friday till 11 a.m. on Saturday. One wonders whether the writer of the article in "The Morning Post" has ever attempted to work twenty-nine hours at a stretch? The kindest explanation of his attitude is that he is ignorant of the facts that made the prosecution abundantly justified. He further omits all mention of the statements made by the prosecuting solicitor, that the War Office concurred in the prosecution, and that he had the authority of the War Office for saying that "they would not tolerate for a moment at Woolwich Arsenal the working conditions mentioned in the case." Finally, we note that the case was dismissed under the Probation Act, and that all that the firm have suffered is a warning against repeating the offence. Really, if attacks must be made on Ministers, it should be easy to find more promising material than this case.

The Yorkshire Post. Leeds.
10/9/15.

658.
658/25

OVERTIME WORK BY WOMEN.

A general order was made by the Secretary of State last December, allowing women and young persons to work overtime in woollen and worsted factories, in order to accelerate the work being done for the British and Allied forces. This order has now been succeeded by another order, which only allows overtime on a much reduced scale. No overtime is now permissible for weaving. The overtime allowed in other processes is reduced to six hours a week, which much be arranged as follows:—Either two hours overtime on three nights a week, or one and a half hours on four nights a week. No overtime is now permissible on Saturday. Overtime is only allowed in factories which devote at least 75 per cent. of their output to the British or Allied Governments.

658.
658/26

Evening Express.
Liverpool.
November 4th - 1915.

WORKER AND HER PAY.

SIR,—For making one dozen khaki drill military coats the large sum of 4s. 3d. is now being paid in Liverpool. These coats have four pockets, and must be made complete (excepting buttons and buttonholes), with two rows of stitching on each seam. From this sum of 4s. 3d. is deducted 6d. per reel for cotton used and one halfpenny for each needle broken

My sister, who is an expert machinist, worked from 8 30 until 4 30 (less one hour for dinner) and managed to make three of these coats. She found she was entitled to 1s. 0¾d., less 3d. for cotton, making her wages 9¾d. for seven hours.

H. P.

Liverpool, Nov. 3.

The Morning Advertiser
25/11/15

658

658/27

WEST HAM.

GIRLS IN A GLASS FACTORY.

The owner of a glass factory was summoned, before Mr. Gillespie, for five infractions of the Factories and Workshops Act.

Irene Whitworth, one of the Home Office inspectors, said that the defendant had employed girls between 14 and 15 years on some occasions as long as 16 hours continuously, and during the night. They were engaged in the factory where annealing was done, and this class of employment for young persons of the female sex was prohibited. The girls employed had not been certified as fit by a doctor, nor was there a register of their names, and each of these things should have been done.

The defendant said that the scarcity of labour in the glass trade was appalling, and these infractions arose through a glass-blower introducing his daughter. They were engaged on Government work, and he thought perhaps the infractions of the Act would have been overlooked there, as was done in other factories.

Mr. Gillespie imposed a fine of 5l., or 13 days.

The Defendant.—If I had time I would "do" the 13 days.

Standard
22/1/16

Yorkshire Observer
10-7-16

658

658/28

WAR INDUSTRIES.

EVILS OF SUB-CONTRACTING AND OVERTIME.

Details of the reorganisation of the industrial world to meet emergencies created by the war are given in the chief inspector's annual report of factories and workshops for 1914.

Complaints made by a local representative committee to the Home Office of "sweating" in the carrying out of certain Government contracts were investigated by Miss Squire and her staff. All evidently arose directly or indirectly from the combined effect of temporary relaxation of the prohibition of sub-contracting (apparently rendered necessary through the sudden overwhelming rush of contracts) and of the separate placing of contracts by numerous Territorial associations in addition to those by the Government departments. The complaints were well founded, and sub-contracting was repeatedly found to the third, fourth, and even fifth degrees, some of the small sub-contractors suffering nearly equally with the homeworkers to whom they gave the work. Fortunately some outworkers in London, as well as other parts of the country, after trial refused any more work at the same price.

In one case, which related to the provision by a firm of blouse makers of some body belts for the troops, the price offered was so low that the firm could not give the work to their own inside workpeople, and therefore gave it to outworkers in the East-end. One after another these outworkers took back the work and refused to do it, the price paid being 8d. per dozen, providing their own cotton at 3½d. a reel. The firm received 1s. 2d. a dozen, but had to pay for cutting, machining, carting, and a percentage to the sub-contractor "for the introduction." This sub-contractor received 3s. 3d. a dozen for these belts, which he merely passed on to the blouse manufacturer.

Mr. G. Bellhouse, in a chapter devoted to "Emergency Overtime," deals with the latitude that has perforce been allowed to manufacturers with regard to overtime in order to supply the hundred-and-one needs of the Army. There has been no increase of sickness as a result of the overtime worked, but in many cases overtime has had to be reduced because of the strain imposed by long spells of extra work. He sums up thus:—"The whole experience of these last months leads unquestionably to the conclusion that while long and even excessive hours can be worked with advantage for short periods, continued overtime, if not kept within proper limits, soon fails in its object and ceases to aid production."

Overtime in Woollen and Worsted Industries.

After consultation with the Army Contracts Department, the Home Secretary has decided, in view of the urgent Government requirements, to renew until August 4 next (the Friday before the August Bank Holidays) the order allowing the overtime employment of women and young persons in woollen and worsted factories which was made on April 10 last. The order fixes a maximum of six hours' overtime a week, and no overtime is permissible—(a) for weaving, (b) on Saturday, (c) for girls under 16 years of age. The Home Secretary considers it most desirable that all women and young persons should have a complete rest from overtime at any rate during the remainder of August and the first two weeks in September, and (unless unforeseen circumstances should arise in the meantime) overtime will not be allowed in any mill during that period. All occupiers in the woollen and worsted industries should accordingly make arrangements to discontinue overtime for women and young persons after August 4. This decision does not apply to the arrangements which have been sanctioned in some mills, by special orders, for employing women and young persons in shifts. Such arrangements may be continued in each case so long as the order authorising them remains in force. The question of allowing a resumption of the overtime during the autumn will be considered by the Home Office early in September.

Hardware Trade Journal
17/3/16.

658

658/29

A Walsall Query.

Mr. Anderson asks the Under Secretary of State for War whether he has received complaints regarding the rate of wages paid to women workers by members of the Harness and Saddlery, Furniture, and Hardware Manufacturers' Association, Walsall, contractors to the War Office; whether he is aware that these firms are paying adult women as little as 10s. per week, and that the association have refused to accept arbitration offered by the chief industrial commissioner on the differences which have arisen with regard to wages between them and the women concerned; and what steps it is proposed to take to ensure that women engaged on Government work in this area shall receive a living wage.

Manchester Guardian.
18. 10. 16

658.

658/30

THE ARMY CLOTHING SCANDAL.

To the Editor of the Manchester Guardian.

Sir,—Dr. Barbara Tchaykovsky asks the hospitality of your columns to reply to my letter of October 9, but she does not reply to it. My statements and figures (unlike her own) are irrefutable; they have been seen by Board of Trade and R.A.C.D. inspectors, whereas Dr. Tchaykovsky's ancient and borrowed figures were disproved at once by two influential trade papers—"Men's Wear" and "The Outfitter." Both these papers have seen the correspondence in the "Manchester Guardian," and last week again spoke some very plain truths on the matter, which are much too lengthy for inclusion in this letter. May I quote one paragraph from "Men's Wear"? After copying my letter from the "Manchester Guardian" in full, it says:—

> "It is a pity that such well-meaning people as Dr. Tchaykovsky should still go out of their way to falsely condemn members of an industry which has served the nation well and which earned the well-merited reward of the late Earl Kitchener. Apparently Dr. Tchaykovsky has fallen into the usual habit of discovering a few home workers who, by reason of incapacity or home duties, are unable to do much work, and consequently cannot earn much money."

Your correspondent says "this is news to me" that the figures quoted by her were immediately disproved and that subcontracting was abolished. It ought not to be news to her. Before she takes it upon herself to indict a whole industry she should be sure of her facts. I have taken from an old contract—and ask you to publish it—the conditions demanded by the Secretary of State for War in all contracts since early in 1915, and still severely in operation.

> Condition 3 [in thick black type]. All articles of Clothing under a War Department Contract shall be cut out and made up in Contractor's own factory and no work shall be done at the homes of the workpeople.
>
> Condition 4. This notice must be put up prominently in Contractor's workshops and factories where work for the War Department is carried on.—By order of
>
> THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR.

Dr. Tchaykovsky says, "I understand that early in 1915 Manchester trade union officials alleged that in many instances women were employed on army clothing for sixty hours a week at a wage of little more than 10s." But trade union officials are not likely to allow the Minimum Wages Act of 3½d. an hour (14s. 7d. on a fifty-hour week) to be transgressed without making capital out of it and getting the culprits punished. Such statements injure her cause, and are unfair to all employers, who have to keep a register of the hours worked against the wages earned for the inspection of the Board of Trade officers at any moment, and who go among the workers and verify the figures by their own wages books.

One final word to dispose of the "gigantic profits" charge. We recently tendered for khaki trousers at 4 per cent gross profit, and our tender was "declined with thanks." I know successful tenderers who get 1d. and 2d. profit on the job, and my experience is that it is the manufacturer who is "sweated" and not the worker.—Yours, &c.,

WHOLESALE CLOTHIER.

Manchester, October 17.

658/31

ARMY CLOTHING CONTRACTS

WHEN the great European War broke out, the weaving districts of Yorkshire were involved in the industrial upheaval. It was at once perceived that an army unprecedently numerous would have to be clothed as quickly as possible. Orders came pouring in for khaki for our regular troops, and the vast new army that was to be organized. Representatives of the French Government visited the industrial and commercial seats of the northern county in search of enormous quantities of their light-blue cloth; Belgian agents came to purchase fabrics for their warriors; and buyers for the Russian Government were seeking huge supplies of greenish-grey clothing for their countless soldiers. Some of these foreign orders were accepted, whilst others could not be executed in time. A great and sudden change had come over some of the Yorkshire factory towns, which otherwise had been settling down to a state of depression. All past records were to be broken, not forgetting the rapid fortunes that were made out of the contracts for the German and French Governments during the Franco-Prussian War of 1870–71. Agents of the Allies were buying up all kinds of fabrics, to be utilised until suitable materials could be provided. Stocks were cleared out that had been lying in warehouses for many months without the sign of a demand for them, as also blankets, hosiery, and woollen and worsted 'pieces' in tremendous quantities. The prices were highly satisfactory. In the midst of what threatened to be one of the great industrial crises of history, Yorkshire woollen towns had become the busiest places in the world. From there, orders for new cloth spread to Scotland and the old woollen and worsted area of the West of England.

It must not be thought that the war brought unprecedented industrial activity to the whole of the Yorkshire factory towns. Khaki can be properly manufactured only in certain places which are included in the 'Heavy Woollen District': Huddersfield and district, the spacious Colne Valley, Batley, Dewsbury, and one or two small places on the outskirts of Leeds and Wakefield. Leeds itself is mainly concerned in the making up of the cloth, and, besides males, employs for this purpose about 30,000 female workers of all ages. There are about 50,000 woollen and worsted looms in Yorkshire; less than 20,000 of these are adapted to the production of khaki. These were incapable of completing the orders by working ordinary hours. The mills were put on day and all-night work. An arrangement was made whereby the males above the age of sixteen were to work in two shifts. In the case of women and 'young persons,' this system could not at first be adopted, because night work and overtime were prohibited by the Factory Act. Later, it was decided by employers, employees' trade union officials, and the Home Office, that for purposes of the war requirements, the clauses relating to females and young persons should be relaxed. Permission was given to all mills doing 75 per cent. of war contracts to work women and young persons from 6 a.m. to 8 p.m., and to four o'clock on Saturday afternoon. Hence, the heavier industrial burden fell upon the women and the children, as men, working in two separate shifts each day, worked individually a less number of hours daily than women and young persons. Considering the tediousness of weaving khaki, owing to its colour, and the strictness of the War Office in demanding exactness, the burden was too much for them, and a new order was made to restrict their overtime hours to nine per week.

658/32

It is to the conditions and wages of the women in khaki-weaving, and the making up of the clothing, that I wish to devote my space. The cloth's dusty shade, derived from a mixture of green-olive, yellow-olive, light indigo, and light grey dyes, is trying to the eyes of the weavers and clothiers. One cannot say how much khaki will be needed before we come to the end of the European hostilities. A calculation, however, can be made from the fact that, in round figures, it takes six yards of cloth to provide a soldier with trousers, tunic, overcoat, and cap. This does not include puttees, and other textile details of his clothing. It has been estimated that about three hundred or four hundred miles of cloth are produced weekly. It will be seen that for every million soldiers we shall need over 6,000,000 yards of khaki. In addition, renewals will have to be attended to. The uniform of a soldier in the trenches becomes useless in six or eight weeks; in other forms of active service the clothing lasts from two and three to six months. In time of peace, a soldier can, with repairs, wear a khaki suit for twelve months, and with two pairs of trousers, for eighteen months. In addition to khaki, over 500,000 blue serge suits were made during the first three months of the war for the clothing of some of the new formations whilst in training. Many of these have been since replaced by the regulation uniform.

658/33

When the Government first circulated their specifications for cloth, its officials were too long in coming to a decision in distributing the orders. The result was that dealers in raw wool had time to inflate prices; they made a golden harvest out of the demand. I was told in November by a manufacturer that he was paying 25 and 30 per cent. more for his raw material than three months before. Khaki yarns were also sent up in price; they rose rapidly from 1*s.* 10*d.* to 2*s.* 7*d.* per lb. The demand for cloth was so pressing that rags were utilised in the manufacture; they leaped up in price, in some cases enormously. Dyes became scarce, and the market quotations for khaki colours rose. All this made it awkward for the manufacturers, and those who had not 'bought well' in respect to raw material, had to work on diminishing margins of profit. For this the War Office officials were largely to blame, and there is now a strong contention in Yorkshire, both among labour leaders and employers, that in regard to Government contracts similar to those dealt with during the war, there should be an advisory committee of military and civilian experts to regulate prices, to determine the details of the required goods, and to arrange the distribution of the manufacture.

658/34

However, the Government representatives fix the prices for khaki, and provide full instructions as to the materials, and the way in which they must be used. The finished fabric is handed over to the wholesale clothiers at the following rates: for trousers at 4*s.* per yard, for tunics at 5*s.* per yard, for overcoats at a trifle below 6*s.* per yard. In the case of the trousers and the tunics, the prices are slightly above those I have mentioned, in respect to most of the suits. I was informed by a large wholesale house of excellent repute that it was impossible to make better cloth for the purpose.

The Government Department provides the clothiers with trimmings, buttons, and hooks and eyes, and debits the contractor with the cost; it pays all carriage of goods from the manufacturer, and afterwards to the military depôts to which the uniform has to be dispatched. All that the clothier has to do is to receive the cloth and see that it is made up in strict accordance with the specifications. If there is any fault in the manufacture or in the making up, the manufacturer or the clothier has to bear the loss. The main places where khaki and khaki clothing are made up are the War Office factories at Pimlico and Weedon, at a variety of establishments in London, Leeds, Manchester, Bristol, and also to a smaller extent at Leicester, Birmingham, Liverpool, Crewe, Nantwich, and Colchester. The cloth is distributed to makers in large factories, in small workshops, in diminutive tailors' shops and in the domestic dwellings of outworkers: almost every Jew and Gentile who can make up clothing has been requisitioned for the work. The wages and conditions of the workers are as variable as the places in which they labour.

An outstanding feature of the clothing of the Army in khaki is the nation's dependence on the skill and endurance of female workers. Women operatives have not been altogether satisfied with the conditions that have been hurriedly thrust upon them, but they are performing their task as cheerfully as possible in the belief that it is as important and necessary to the welfare and security of the nation as any other duties in connection with the war. But too many of them have been taxed beyond their strength. It has been a case of long hours in the mill, and increased domestic demands at home. I repeat, men are working in two shifts. Many of those who leave off at teatime occupy the beds of those who work at night: the night operatives utilise the beds of the day operatives. Hence, domestic labour in one way or another—in cooking, washing, cleaning, &c.—is going on for most of the twenty-four hours of the day.

658/35

Women who are working overtime at the mills take a fair share of the duties at home. The call is altogether too great, and the trade union officials assert that the labour in the factories could be lessened, if the matter were properly considered by the employers and the Government representatives. At present, the domestic and mill conditions in many parts of Yorkshire resemble those of the worst days of the factory system.

The strain has been great upon the women. It has led to sickness and lassitude, and will, no doubt, end in increased physical inefficiency. But, knowing the object of this high pressure, the women have stuck manfully to the task; at the same time, the returns of the National Insurance Societies in connection with the trade unions show that there has been an excess of sickness. Accidents have also increased. But the full tale of the women's part in the national struggle will not be known yet. The most articulate complaint they have made so far concerns the rate of pay for overtime. No application has been put forward for an advance of wages for ordinary hours, as the operatives are bound by an agreement in which rates of pay were fixed for two years in July of 1913. But it is declared that that agreement does not apply to the extraordinary circumstances of overtime among women and young persons. Hence general application has been made for an increase of three-halfpence per hour for overtime. In one or two instances it has been granted; in other cases the employers have consented to allow one penny per hour; but in most districts the request has been refused. The General Union of Textile Workers in Yorkshire, which is not as strongly organized as the women's unions in the cotton industry of Lancashire, has, consequently, much greater difficulty in enforcing its demands.

658/36

But let us see to what extent the manufacture of khaki, and the making up of khaki clothing, is dependent upon women workers. According to the Census of 1911, there were 127,148 females and 95,531 males employed in the woollen and worsted industry of the United Kingdom. There were 67,499 female weavers and 24,419 males, the bulk of these being in Yorkshire. The percentage of females was, therefore, 73·4. In wool and worsted spinning there were 45,310 females and 25,391 males, the percentage of females being 64·1. In the tailoring section of the clothing trades of the United Kingdom there were 127,115 females and 122,352 males. Among women workers in wool, 35·5 per cent. were married, and 8·8 per cent. widowed; in woollen and worsted mills combined, the percentage of married women was 16·88, and of widowed 3·57. Among tailoresses, 16·78 were married, and 6·99 per cent. were widows. The dependence upon women of all ages is clear. In the area of Yorkshire where khaki is being manufactured, the female operatives are greatly in excess of the males. In Huddersfield, male and female weavers are about equal in number. In the remainder of the khaki area all weavers are women; a large percentage of them are married women and mothers of families. The weaving of this material is more trying to the operative than are the usual coarse cloths woven in this district; it is more difficult to weave. The result is that, even with over-time work, the women are not earning much more than they would when working usual hours on ordinary cloth; it is contended by trade union officials that the output and the wages per hour are less than would be the case if the operative was employed on fabrics customarily manufactured in the district. In several places females have been exploited by manufacturers to a degree which is surprising in these days of labour organization. In localities where women workers have not been well organized, employers have been paying rates of wages 50 per cent. less than they ought to have been allowed to do. They have employed the skilled Yorkshire weaver at scandalously low rates; they have employed Belgian refugees at similar prices. Whilst the cotton trade was depressed, they might have obtained many weavers from Lancashire, who could have readily adapted themselves to khaki requirements, except that Lancashire weavers would not stoop to work for such low rates. About 8*s.* per piece for weaving khaki may be considered a fair rate. Many employers have honourably paid this.

658/37

But other Yorkshire mill-owners have taken advantage of the circumstances, and the weak organization of the workers: the result is that at some firms women are being paid as low as 3*s.* 4*d.* per piece of sixty yards. That is very near to sweating. Others are being paid at the rate of 3*s.* 8*d.* for fifty-eight yard pieces; others, 4*s.* 1½*d.* for pieces of seventy-five yards; another price is 4*s.* 9*d.* for pieces of seventy-nine and eighty yards. The highest rates are 7*s.* 9*d.* and 8*s.* But why this disparity? Usually, the wages of Yorkshire woollen weavers (females) vary from 15*s.* to 18*s.* per week, compared to 24*s.* and 25*s.* for cotton-weaving in Lancashire. Some of the women are now earning above their old averages, but those on the low-rated prices are not earning that average, even with overtime included. It is a scandal, considering the tediousness of the work, the exhausting long hours, and the willingness of these stout-hearted Yorkshire lasses to clothe their brothers in the Army as quickly and as warmly as possible. To clothe a common soldier fully costs 7*l.* or 8*l.* per man; for an officer, the cost is from 30*l.* to 37*l.* Out of these charges, the woman weavers, the most useful of all the workers necessary to the equipment, get only a paltry share.

658/39

Is this not a matter that the Government should have looked after? It may seem altogether out of place to suggest that the Government should have included in their contracts instructions as to wages and conditions of labour. But why not? The Government broke through traditions of open competition. The Government fixed a flat rate at which the cloth had to be woven, and another flat rate at which it had to be made up into trousers, tunics, and overcoats.

Take the clothing trade. The cloth is supplied by the Government to clothier contractors at a fixed price. All clothiers who make contracts direct with the Government are paid on this flat rate. They are also put on a flat rate with respect to the price that the finished garment has to be supplied at to the War Office. The prices are 12*s.* 6*d.* for service tunic, 8*s.* 9*d.* for trousers; riding breeches, 18*s.* 9*d.*; overcoats, 28*s.* They have no carriage to pay, as they would have in ordinary trade. Now, these prices were arrived at after consultation with certain groups of large wholesale clothiers in Leeds and London, which included one or two members of Parliament. A wholesale clothier proved to me, from his books, that the quotations were very liberal, that they were much higher than usual. The service jacket of the ordinary Tommy is 12*s.* 6*d.*; for present purposes it is a plain tunic in which not as much work is put in as in tunics made in peace times. Yet the present contract price is 12*s.* 6*d.* whilst the superior tunic is made in normal times for 10*s.* 1*d.* mostly, and always at less than 11*s.* War prices for other garments are on a similar handsome scale.

At the present time, the full cost of the complete materials for the clothing of a private soldier is as follows: overcoat, 17*s.* 7·93*d.*; jacket, 7*s.* 1·77*d.*; trousers, 6*s.* 2·75*d.* Here I am quoting the figures of Mr. E. F. Hitchcock in the January number of the Toynbee Record. To the above charges, the cost of labour has to be added. Pursuing Mr. Hitchcock's investigations, we find that, in many cases, direct contractors with the Government are sub-contracting the work. They pay the sub-contractor 3*s.* 3*d.* for the making of an overcoat, 2*s.* 9*d.* for a jacket, 10*d.* for trousers. Out of this transaction alone, the first contractors make a clear profit of 7*s.* 1*d.* on overcoats, 2*s.* 7½*d.* on jackets, 1*s.* 8½*d.* on trousers. How does the sub-contractor fare? Out of the 3*s.* 3*d.* he is allowed for the making of overcoats, he pays 2*s.* 3½*d.* for labour, and makes a profit of 11½*d.*; he pays 2*s.* 1¾*d.* for labour on service jackets, and makes a profit of 7¼*d.*; he pays 7½*d.* for labour on trousers, and makes a profit of 2½*d.* These quotations refer to the work of making up clothes in East London. That they must lead to sweating is obvious—to what extent, God and the sweated victim alone know. For, in all probability, the sub-contractor may sub-contract with some one else—a process which gradually finds its bottom level in the sweating dens of the large towns and cities.

The manager of an extensive clothier's in the North of England informed me that the object of the Government in agreeing to the prices to be paid to contractors was to prevent any traces of sweating, or the beating down of labour. But could not the Government have determined the rates for labour as it determined the prices of the manufactured cloth, and consented to those for the making up of the garments? My informant remarked:

> The prices which the Government has allowed to the clothiers are very liberal indeed, and are big enough to provide for excellent wages, even above the rates recognised under the Trades Boards Act. Yes, we can all pay high wages, and still have a reasonable margin of profit. It's the best job we ever had. We have no trouble. Everything is placed in our hands, and all we have to attend to is the making up.

But what has been done? The Trade Boards minimum rate of pay in the clothing trade is 3¼*d.* per hour. On Government khaki contracts the Conciliation Board of the clothing trade at Leeds has fixed a minimum rate of 4*d.* per hour. But some firms evade this; and there is an agitation to secure the help of the Government to force the backward firms to the level of the advanced ones; also to secure a round minimum of 5*d.* per hour. The complaint of the operatives is that the Government should have laid down a compulsory flat rate of wages. This mainly affects female workers, who form a very large percentage of the makers-up. Males are principally employed as cutters and pressers. Of the machinists, 75 per cent. are women. Let us see how some of these have been crushed to the low levels of wage-earning—to earnings below the Trade Boards scales.

658/40

Looking through the books of a trade union secretary, I saw that the best firm in Manchester was paying 5½*d.* for the machining of a pair of trousers; other firms are paying 2¾*d.* For the finishing of a pair of trousers the model factories pay 3½*d.*; some other firms sink as low as 1¼*d.*; one firm raised the females from 1*d.* to 1¼*d.* only after the threat of a strike. Prices for the labour put in a tunic vary from 1*s.* 10*d.* in the best firms to 1*s.* in the lowest firms. Trouser-finishers are paid 6½*d.* by the best firms, and 3½*d.* by the worst. This variation is observable in other forms of work in making up the clothes. The result is that there is a wide difference in the total earnings of the women: some can make from 30*s.* to 35*s.* per week, and others 20*s.* and 15*s.*, and in one or two cases even less, including overtime!

Here are some of the wages received the week before my inquiry: Coat finishing, 60 hours' labour, wages 15*s.* 3*d.*; another girl worked 63 hours, wages 16*s.* 2½*d.*; another, 55 hours, wages 14*s.* 1*d.*, and previous week 62 hours for 16*s.* 9*d.*

Making trousers: Girl, aged 24, worked 58½ hours, earned 12*s.* 8*d.*, following week 14*s.* 1*d.*; another woman, aged 24, worked 60 hours, earned 16*s.* 4¾*d.*, following week 14*s.* 4¾*d.* for same number of hours; woman, aged 23 years, worked 45 hours, made 10*s.* 6*d.* The highest wage I saw in the books was 18*s.* 9*d.* for 60 hours. The ages of the workers were from 20 to 28 years.

These rates are for female workers employed in factories. Both male and female Trade Unionists are so busy looking after injustices to Trade Unionists that they had had no time to investigate the wages and labour conditions among outworkers. I learned, however, that the contracts are, in some cases, passing through two, three, and four sets of contractors; the rates cease to show any semblance of liberality when they reach the lower forms of contractors and workers. Hence, the object of the Government in providing for high profits and good wages is defeated. Why cannot the Government stop the letting and the sub-letting, and deal with all classes of contractors direct? It should not be impossible. As it is, small tailors and masters are taking work at low rates of pay, and distributing it among outworkers at the prices of slavery. I was shown a woman making trousers complete (making and finishing) at 6*d.* per pair; she could do three pairs a day; she had to pay 5*d.* for thread; she had 1*s.*, therefore, to draw, and burn her own coals and gas, and pay her own rent out of that daily wage. Another woman was paid $4\frac{1}{4}d$ for machining and finishing, whilst some firms pay $5\frac{1}{2}d$. for finishing alone. The demand for labour is so great that in some factories women have been employed to do the work of males. This change has been used to bring down rates of pay, to the great advantage of the employer. In one instance a woman band-cutter had been engaged at 20*s.* per week, the rate for male labour being 42*s.* per week.

658/41

Doubtless, the Fair Wages Clause in Government contracts is being contravened, to some extent at any rate. Khaki cloth is finding its way from the direct Government contractors to all kinds of out-of-the-way places in the lower industrial regions of large and small centres of population. What are the earnings and the conditions of the workers? Nobody yet has had time to look into them. We know, however, that it is the unprotected and unorganized women workers that have to pay the highest price for this unfair trading. If it were merely trading with contracts one would not mind. But when we know that this involves a trading with the health and strength of women whose brothers are heroically fighting the battles of the nation in the trenches of France and Belgium, it is unjust and immoral. The Government has worked hand-in-hand with the large and wealthy contractors, and left the smaller contractors and the lower grades of labour at the mercy of every daring form of commercial exploitation. What the women now ask for is a 'living' flat rate. And that could easily be paid. I heard from a very large contractor who is connected with a social movement in which big interest on capital would be regarded as an exploitation either of labour or the consumer, that to keep down the profits out of the khaki contracts the concern has granted to the workers a special war rate of pay. It employs a very large number of women, who are now earning 20 per cent. more than females at other factories doing similar work. 'We can do this and more on these khaki orders, and still be left with ample profits!' said one of the heads of the establishment. His conclusion was that there was no excuse at all for unfair treatment of women employed either in producing cloth or making up the clothing of Tommy Atkins!

658/42

JAMES HASLAM.

FEMINISM IN ANCIENT LITERATURE

THERE is a question sometimes put to scholars, a doubt often latent in scholars' minds—How was it that Greek civilisation, with all its high ideals and achievements, fell so easily before what seems at first sight an altogether inferior culture? The difficulty is not solved by a reference to military resources or administrative skill, for moral strength is the only thing that matters in history, and a nation has never yet succeeded merely by pure intellect or by brute force. The fact is—and it is as well to state it plainly—that the Greek world perished from one main cause, a low ideal of womanhood and a degradation of women which found expression both in literature and in social life. The position of women and the position of slaves, for the two classes went together, were the canker-spots which, left unhealed, brought about the decay first of Athens and then of Greece.

For many centuries in Ionia and Athens there was an almost open state of sex-war. At Miletus a woman never sat at table with her husband, for he was the enemy with whom bread must not be broken: at Athens, while all the men went free, women were kept as slaves, and a stranger in the harem might be killed at sight. The sexes were sharply separated: men and women had but few opportunities for mutual esteem and affection, and domestic life—the life of the home, the wife and the children—was poisoned at its source.

The causes and results of this war, far worse than any faction or civil strife, are lamentable enough: its manifestations in ancient literature are perhaps even more important, for it is hard to say how far current opinions of feminine disabilities are not unconsciously due to the long line of writers, Greek and Latin, from Simonides of Amorgos, in the seventh century before Christ, to Juvenal in the second century of our era, who used all their powers of rhetoric and literary skill to disparage and depreciate womankind. In the whole deplorable business men were in the wrong, and they therefore took the aggressive.

found here, but he has elected to be ruled by the rose instead.

So, in the rose order, he does not take the name-flower but the apple. The apple gives the bee honey as well as pollen, and makes to the bird or the mammal a really generous reward for carrying its pips to a distance. It refuses, however, to have its leaves eaten, though our philosopher might have argued that it gives the ox the less gross but equally important advantage of shade and a rubbing place, and is paid for it. The hive bee, highest of all insects, belongs to a tribe very strongly organised for war. Some of the ants are slave-makers, the hornets are terrible brigands, parasitism flourishes enormously among the hymenoptera, and the hive bee itself loves nothing so much as to invade the neutrality of a neighboring hive, and carry off with reckless violence everything worth stealing. The missel thrush, "head of the thrush tribe," is the most quarrelsome of them all. He will monopolize a whole rowan tree, and chase off all intruders, and, needless to say, he has no idea whatever of striking up a working alliance with hawk or crow (by many naturalists considered to be higher in the order of birds). The rowan belongs to the rose order, and therefore this thrush's alliance with it is respectable. Its name is not rowan thrush, however, but mistletoe thrush, and its service to the apple consists in transporting from one tree to another the seeds of its deadly parasite.

The works of M. Henri Fabre, which are daily becoming better known to a delighted world, were written long before the present war. M. Fabre remembers, however, 1870. His newest book, translated by Mr. Teixeira de Mattos, is that about "Mason-Bees" (Hodder & Stoughton). The mason-bees like to work in large colonies that are not communities, and have therefore to be good observers of the law of neighbors. Sometimes a bee will show a disposition to take possession of another's cell. The quarrel that ensues can have only one ending. "Reversing the savage Prussian maxim 'Might is right,' among the mason-bees right is might, for there is no other explanation of the invariable retreat of the usurper, whose strength is not a whit inferior to that of the real owner." On the other hand, when two bees fight for an unoccupied cell of last year, a case in which their rights are equal, they struggle with locked mandibles, up and down in the air like birds, and over and over upon the ground for the space of half a day. It is only when one is armed with right, and the other weakened by its sense of being in the wrong, that war is impossible.

There is a general feeling that dishonesty is grounded in laziness. M. Fabre thinks not, at any rate so far as the bees are concerned. The life of the finished parasite is one of frightfully hard work, and he can find nowhere the beginnings of parasitism upon one's own species. The Leucospis may occupy three hours in continuous hard pushing before she gets her ovipositor through the concrete wall of a mason-bee's cell, and the Stelis is more than a day breaking down the masonry to lay her egg inside, after which she has to build up the gap again. Anyone who knows that those gorgeous insects, the jewel-flies, are parasites, can conceive what an abundance of vital energy may go with a trade commonly reputed to be grounded in laziness. M. Fabre says that these creatures must be classified as hunters, no less than Cerceris, Sphex, or Ammophila, who fight, kill, and carry off prey stronger than themselves, instead of merely finding it and laying eggs upon it. If they are parasites, then—

> "Man is the great parasite, the unbridled thief of all that is fit to eat. He steals the milk from the lamb, he steals the honey from the children of the bee, even as the Melecta pilfers the pottage of the Anthophora's sons. The two cases are similar. Is it the vice of indolence? No, it is the fierce law which for the life of the one exacts the death of the other."

The fact about the parasite is no doubt that it set forth on a primrose path that has since been made thorny by the progressive defences of its victim. Some of them have still an exceedingly easy life. When one of them meets the miner-bee at her own door, the latter politely makes way for her, and she has only to descend and lay her egg on the victim's store. The cuckoo in this case is far too distantly related to have begun preying on her own species. She probably started as a welcome scavenger, and has come to make the whole larder her perquisite. "I know of no instance," says M. Fabre, "not one, excepting man, of parasites who consume the provisions hoarded by a worker of the same species." He sees among his mason-bees some that, having had their cells taken in a prolonged absence, tear open the nearest cell, whosesoever it may be, destroy its egg, and lay there one of its own. He puts this down to rage, and has never seen it go further than the strict talio of one cell for a cell.

Human greed also may be obscured by rage. When a nation deliberately invokes a quarrel that brings against her three other nations, it would seem absurd to call that an act of plunder. If she throws her soldiers against the enemy so that they are destroyed by the million and no victory comes, can we call her a bully? Perhaps, if a long series of former wars has resulted in easy lucre and added power, and if, according to purely material calculations, this war, too, ought to have been a swift success. We might write it down as a case, so rare except among mankind, of attempted parasitism on one's own species. Its great difficulty is that, as with the mason-bee, so with us, right may be might.

Present-Day Problems.

THE GOVERNMENT AND KHAKI.

THE question of providing British troops with the necessary clothing has brought home vividly the importance in the struggle of those who stay at home to perform the less exciting but no less valuable part in the war. The War Office is faced with an army of a million and a quarter men, irrespective of Territorials, and with the need for another million. They must be clad. The rate of consumption of clothing during war is probably four times what it is when the army is on a peace footing. Further, winter is upon us, and an ample stock of warm clothing is indispensable.

The War Office, excellent as it may be in the performance of its immediate function, is hardly a success as an organizer of industry. It blundered woefully during the early days of the war. For weeks cloth manufacturers in the West Riding of Yorkshire were literally begging for orders. Hundreds of looms were standing idle, and there was a large amount of unemployment and short time, as the returns in the "Board of Trade Labor Gazette" show, and even now there are firms who cannot get any orders, though capable of doing the work. One of the largest clothing manufacturers, apparently in close touch with the War Office, informed a khaki manufacturer shortly after the beginning of the war that they would be easily able to provide for all emergencies whatever happened! Had the authorities acted with the promptitude which the crisis demanded—and called forth in other quarters—millions of yards more uniform, cloth would have been produced up to the present time. When the Government desired to restore the remittance market so that, among other things, there should be adequate supplies of wool and food for the army, it got together the people who understood the job, because the members of the Government realized about finance what they have never understood about industry, that the inexpert person is sure to make a mess of things if he dabbles in it. Had the Government set up a Northern Command in Leeds or Bradford of the woollen and worsted battalions of the industrial army comparable to the military Northern Command at York, but composed of representatives of the spinners, manufacturers, and workpeople, with the addition of one or more economists who have studied these twin industries, much might have been done to increase the output of cloth.

P.T.O.

As it is, the Board of Trade has recently made inquiries in the woollen district in order to obtain precise statistics as to possible output, etc.—figures which ought to have been compiled within a fortnight of the outbreak of the war. The War Office are now awake to the fact that something has got to be done. But they do not appear to have grasped the constitution and organization of the woollen and worsted industry. It is unfortunate in the first place that early steps were not taken to ensure the possession of the wool required at a reasonable price. Prices have now risen, as was inevitable, owing to the enormous demand for cloth for the armies in the field. At a conservative estimate, it may be said that the contending armies will require four-fifths of the normal annual crop of wool, excluding the coarser varieties. So far the War Office very wisely appears to have refused to accept all-worsted cloths for uniforms, as they are not so warm as woollen cloths or khaki, which is both woollen and worsted. (The German, Austrian, French, and Russian armies are clothed in carded woollens.) The authorities, also, owing to the shortage of certain dyes used in the manufacture of khaki, have relaxed their regulations as to color, and now accept cloth from which a couple of shades have been omitted in the blending.

But the most important question is the volume of the output. Most of the mills where cloth is woven are working at great pressure, overtime being the rule. Many, indeed the majority, of the weavers are women, who are already feeling the strain, which employers themselves have admitted cannot be maintained. The solution is that already adopted by the Home Office—two eight-hour shifts for women, from 6 a.m. to 2 p.m., and from 2 p.m. to 10 p.m., but then there comes the question of the shortage of weavers. In Leeds, cotton weavers have been set on with success, but there seems little likelihood of the cotton operatives coming over to Yorkshire in considerable numbers, even if wages were raised. A number who came into the West Riding returned immediately after the capture of the "Emden," and the possibility of the opening up of the Eastern market. If it were necessary, pressure might be put upon cotton operatives to work temporarily in Yorkshire; but the step should be taken in conjunction with, or rather should be left to, the trade unions concerned. Then there are hundreds of women employed as "menders" in normal times who are now at a standstill for work. As they are fairly familiar with the industry, and further, recognize the value of good weaving, they might be found of service at the looms. Then there are odd mills here and there which are engaged on their normal trade, whom a Northern Command might have impressed for the making of khaki cloth.

But even if every step were taken on these lines, so that the looms were working sixteen or even twenty-four hours per day, the difficulty would not be solved. Whether the looms can run continuously depends upon whether they have a sufficient supply of yarn. This is where the real difficulty lies. The Government inquiry into the possible output of the West Riding looms appears almost academic, so long as the relation between spinning output and cloth output is not accurately known. Now, in certain parts of the West Riding, spinners work night and day to keep pace with the manufacturers' normal day. At present, the early processes are, in most cases, working at full pressure, and manufacturers of khaki cloth have looms standing because there is no yarn available. There must be a considerable number of mills which are "playing for weft," because the weaver soon overtakes the spinner. As there are some firms weaving ordinary cloths, and as the supply of yarn for this purpose which was on hand in the early days of the war must have been used up, it follows that there must be some spinners who are turning out yarn for the purpose. The Northern Command might have stopped this. The difficulty is intensified by the fact that, though most spinners are busy, there are some who have their machinery standing idle, because there has been a considerable amount of enlistment among the male operatives in this branch of the industry. On the other hand, there has not been a corresponding leakage in the weaving branch, which is largely women's work.

What, it may be asked, can be done? The obvious solution is to ensure that all the possible spinning equipment is utilized for woollen and worsted yarn for army purposes. The people at home must, if needs be, wear shabby clothes. The shortage of labor could fairly easily be remedied. Cotton operatives might be used, or, failing any other source of supply, operatives might be imported from the textile mills of Belgium and North-East France, or the introduction of unemployed menders into the weaving sheds might free males employed there for work in the earlier processes. But that would not increase the output of the yarn beyond the definite limits of the capacity of the existing machinery. It would seem, therefore, that the equipment for producing yarn must be augmented. Though some few manufacturers of yarn are, or are contemplating, taking such a step, the whole body of spinners is hardly likely to lay down costly plant in order to meet an abnormal demand. But if such a course were necessary, the State must be prepared to shoulder the burden. Here, however, we run up against another obstacle; the machinery is not in existence, though temporary mills could easily be run up to house it. It is said that those employers who have placed orders for equipment cannot obtain delivery until next spring. This line of approach does not, therefore, hold out much hope. Already it has been found necessary to place orders in America for cardigans for troops. Suitable yarn for weaving army cloths might be imported, the weaving being performed in this country. This would get over the need for a considerable increase of plant for temporary work.

It is not too late even now to tackle the question thoroughly, but the first condition must be that the War Office shall take no part whatever beyond giving the details of the goods required and the required dates of delivery. The responsibility for carrying out the work should be left to an executive committee, with full powers, composed, as already suggested, of employers in the various branches of the woollen and worsted industry, including the Wholesale Clothiers' Association, representatives of the workers from the trade unions, and the available economists. On them would fall the duty of ascertaining the producing capacity of the existing plant in the different processes with a view to reinforcing the kinds of machinery necessary to ensure the full efficiency of other kinds of machinery, having regard, of course, to the abnormal character of the demand. Where desirable, they should be able to instal new machinery at the public expense. They should prohibit altogether the production of yarn for other than army purposes until such time as it could be produced without prejudicing the supply of army cloths. They should be able to take steps to ensure a sufficient supply of labor, and be able to insist on reasonable conditions and wages, and hours of labor. When the industry was organized so as to maximize the output of the earlier processes, surplus looms should be supplied with imported yarn. It would be advisable to ascertain whether the Allies are likely to require large amounts of cloth for uniforms in excess of orders already placed in this country. This would enable them to determine to what extent the Government might with advantage increase the available machinery.

The whole question is by no means an easy one, and several points not touched upon here must be dealt with, but it is capable of something approaching a satisfactory solution provided it is left to the proper people. But at whatever cost, the armies of this country and its Allies must be properly and sufficiently clad.

ARTHUR GREENWOOD.

Daily Mail,
Dec: 11th. 1914.

658a/2 658a

KHAKI COMES FIRST.

WHY WEST RIDING MEN AND WOMEN ARE EARNING HIGH WAGES.

By F. A. McKENZIE.

Mr. F. A. McKenzie to-day shows how Leeds and the West Riding are sharing in the circulation of the £350,000,000 war expenditure. He has already described the prosperity in the Midlands and in Scotland.

LEEDS, Wednesday.

The West Riding of Yorkshire is to-day in the midst of a trade boom unequalled in its history, a boom that gives good promise of being the beginning of a long period of sustained prosperity.

In July, a month before war broke out, business was bad, and seemed likely to be worse. The good times of 1912 and 1913 had passed. Many mills were working short time. "There is no prospect of any improvement in labour conditions during the remaining months of this year," wrote the official experts five months ago. To-day many mills are booked up for six months ahead, and I hear of one that can take no further orders until September next. Some are going at full pressure day and night; others, unable to obtain double shifts owing to the shortage of labour, are working a 66-hour week.

Such hours are unknown since factory laws came in, for they mean that the mills open from six in the morning until eight at night five days a week, with a half-day on Saturday. The local newspapers are full of advertisements appealing for workers and holding out every kind of inducement. The demand for raw material is such that unless fresh sources of supply are arranged there will soon be a famine in certain essential lines.

The orders for war supplies started the boom—orders for millions of yards of cloth from France and Russia, orders for millions of uniforms and hundreds of thousands of pairs of boots from our own Government, orders for locomotives, for war material, for machinery, for drugs, for iron and steel goods, for carriages, and for almost everything that the West Riding supplies. Ordinary trade has been largely stopped. Civilian buyers, usually the most welcome of guests, now take vain pilgrimages from factory to factory and mill to mill, trying to obtain what they want. Some manufacturers boldly take the patriotic line that it is their business first to serve the Government, and that everything else must stand over until the needs of the Navy and the Army are met Others, who would if they could satisfy the usual demand, find themselves compelled by official demands to make their old customers wait.

DELAY IN FANCY SUITINGS.

I heard to-day of wholesale boot buyers glad to secure supplies at 5s. a pair more than peace prices. The wholesale clothing manufacturers talk of the possibility of a time, some months ahead, when ordinary ready-made clothes will be almost unobtainable except at what now would seem prohibitive charges. The mills that usually turn out fancy cloths are now making nothing but khaki; the Leeds cutters and tailoresses are working at full pressure on Army overcoats and uniforms. "Khaki comes first" is the notice in mills and workshops alike.

Leeds is known to all the world as the home of the wool trade, the headquarters of wholesale tailoring in England, our leading leather centre, and third in rank among the shoemaking districts. But it is more than this. Apart from London it can claim to be, so far as I am aware, the most varied manufacturing district in the United Kingdom. It is a railway centre; it produces much iron and steel; it makes locomotives and everything to do with traction, from carriage springs to tyres and from passenger vehicles to signals. It makes machinery of a hundred varied kinds on a great scale—farming machinery, colliery plant, woollen machinery, printing presses, and the like. It is a centre for all kinds of domestic goods, from porcelain baths to gas stoves and from baby carriages to wholesale groceries. It makes glass bottles and drugs; its organs are famed everywhere; it produces ten million boot protectors a day. Its output of women's clothing, from mantles to linen dresses, is reaching a point where it will rival its trade in men's wear.

A city like this presents a very good example of how trade generally is being affected by the war. The outbreak of hostilities came at first to Leeds as a crushing blow, for much of the business of this city was with abroad, and quantities of foreign goods arrived here. Early August saw some dark days, and things did not recover their balance until the middle of September. From then until now each week has shown a great jump upwards.

CO-OPERATIVE PROSPERITY.

The effect on the working people of Leeds is best seen by the returns of the Industrial Co-operative Society, one of the largest institutions of its kind in England. During the first two weeks of August the weekly returns of the co-operative society rose owing to panic buying. Then came six weeks of steady, heavy decline. At the end of six weeks the balance suddenly swung round the other way, and from the third week in September until now the gains have been remarkable and increasing. Thus the increase in trade a fortnight ago was between £3,000 and £4,000, and last week between £5,000 and £6,000, as compared with the thriving days of last year.

Two or three engineering firms, with very fine and specialised plant, have been unable to adapt themselves to other work, and are certainly having a bad time. Apart from these, the records that I have been able to obtain from the leading houses are uniformly good, and in almost every case very good.

There is a great shortage of labour. Sixteen thousand men have enlisted or have rejoined the colours. In the early days, before Government orders poured in, a number of engineers and others went to Glasgow, to Newcastle, and elsewhere and obtained employment there. The effect of this is now being very severely felt. Cloth manufacture is being kept back by a shortage of weavers. In almost every line of trade it is impossible to obtain sufficient hands. Here and there fancy prices are paid. Thus I heard of a special order in the tailoring trade recently—admittedly quite an exceptional case—where a group of girls earned as much as 70s. a week each for a short period, working, of course, at enormous pressure. But 30s. a week for women in the tailoring trade is quite usual just now, with the abundance of overtime, and even with this sufficient women cannot be had. Most of the clothing manufacturers have some machines idle for lack of hands. You will find over a column of advertisements from employers in the local evening papers seeking workers. Some of them take a patriotic note: "Come and serve your country by making overcoats for the Army." Some promise specially considerate treatment. Some guarantee continuous work for six or twelve months ahead. The Leeds tailoress is at a premium just now.

In the shoe trade manufacturers had the good sense, almost as soon as the war started, to begin to adapt their methods to the making of strong boots required by the Army, and they are reaping their reward The allied trade in leather is doing enormously well. Leather prices have risen so greatly since August that many factors have made fortunes.

Leeds takes its good fortune quietly, but that its fortune is very good indeed no one here attempts to deny.

Daily Citizen, Dec: 12. 1914.

SECRET CONTRACTS.

ABSURD WAR OFFICE REPLY TO DEMAND.

The War Emergency Workers' National Committee have received a reply from Mr. Harold Baker, financial secretary of the War Office, to their recent letter, asking for the publication of the lists of firms holding War Office contracts. Mr. Baker writes:—

> This is, I understand, a question affecting other Government departments as well, and the matter has been brought to the notice of the Prime Minister, but so far as the War Office is concerned I am afraid that it would be a practical impossibility to compile any such lists during the present pressure. You will, I think, understand that in some cases in the public interest such information must be regarded as confidential. Apart from these considerations I can assure the committee that there is no desire for secrecy on the part of the War Office.

Mr. Baker's plea that pressure of work prevents the compilation of the lists is, of course, absurd. The committee do not ask for the publication of contracts for armaments, etc., where publicity might be against the national interest. The National Committee are demanding the setting up of a committee which will be representative not only of the Government departments and business interests but also of Labour.

Yorkshire Observer. 15 Dec.

THE LEEDS CLOTHING TRADE.

PLENTY OF EMPLOYMENT.

There is every prospect that the clothing manufacturers of Leeds will be exceedingly busy for some months to come. Many firms which were on short time a week or two ago are now working at normal pressure, thanks to the Government orders which are coming into the city. There are 30,000 operatives employed by local firms, and it is hoped that very few of these will be thrown out of employment. The reports of the large wholesale clothing manufacturers are of a most encouraging nature. Messrs. R. B. Brown & Sons state that they are working full time with their normal staff, and will require extra hands very shortly. Their contracts will last until next Whitsuntide at least. Messrs. Hepworth & Sons, Limited, are working on Army and Navy contracts which will last until Christmas, and Messrs Albrecht and Albrecht are working at full pressure with Army contracts, and actually cannot get sufficient hands. Other firms which have Government work in hand are Messrs. Arthur & Co., Limited, Messrs. Joseph May & Sons, and Messrs. Stewart & Macdonald.

There is every indication that the trade will become increasingly busy. Apart from War Office requirements there is now scope for activity in ordinary directions. Any day large orders may arrive from abroad. More than one foreign Government has made urgent inquiries for the making up of uniforms, and such orders are likely to be on a large scale. To-night a special meeting of the Leeds Association of Clothiers will be held to consider an inquiry from London in regard to the manufacture of great coats, and if the orders for these coats come to Leeds there will be additional employment for a long period.

Yorkshire Observer, December 22nd 1914.

PREPARATIONS FOR CHRISTMAS.

HOLIDAYS AS USUAL.

RELAXATION FOR HARD-WORKED TEXTILE OPERATIVES.

The textile operatives of the West Riding who, during the last few months, have been working almost to the limits of human endurance in the production of Army clothing, have been looking forward hopefully, but with a little uncertainty, to obtaining a brief relaxation in the Christmas season. Speculation regarding the Christmas holiday has been very rife. In those quarters where pressure of Government contracts is greatest curtailment may be said to have been expected by the workpeople; indeed, in some cases it had even been suggested that there was to be no respite on Christmas Day itself. A Christmas Eve with our manufacturing valleys illuminated by the chequered lights of mill windows and a Christmas Day ushered in by the hooting of factory sirens is a vision that uninformed loquacity had conjured up, but one that is not likely to be realised. As a rule textile operatives are to have their Christmas holiday as usual, and Thursday night to Monday morning will be the period of leisure in almost all cases.

LORD KITCHENER APPROACHED.

The anxiety of the workpeople regarding suggested encroachment on their Christmas holiday may be gauged from the fact that one of their trade organisations had even gone so far as to bring the matter to the attention of the Secretary for War. Acting on the instructions of the executive council of the Huddersfield Trades Council, Mr. J. S. Armitage, the secretary, addressed a letter to Lord Kitchener stating that the council "has been informed that some employers in Huddersfield and the Colne Valley are arranging to run their mills all the Christmas holidays," and urging "that in view of the fact that all the employees—men, women, and children—have been working excessive hours during the last four months they should have holiday from Thursday, December 24, to Monday, December 28." The letter also drew attention to the fact that "the next holiday is not due until April, 1915," and urged "that all citizens should use their efforts to help to obtain the holidays asked for."

The letter was sent not only to Lord Kitchener but also to the Mayor of Huddersfield and others. The Mayor (Alderman J. Blamires), who is principal of T. and H. Blamires, Ltd., a firm busily engaged in making flannels for the Army) has in response issued an appeal to all employers to grant the holidays asked for by the Trades Council. As far as can be ascertained the Mayor's appeal has met with a good response.

Generally it had been the intention of employers in the town and district to close down as usual for Christmas. Mr G. H. Wood, the secretary of the Manufacturers' and Spinners' Associations, informed a representative of "The Yorkshire Observer" that the holiday would be Christmas Day and Boxing Day, "which is in accordance with the agreement signed two years ago." The members of the associations, he added, had never thought of adopting any other course. Inquiries of representative firms—of worsted manufacturers in Huddersfield, of woollen manufacturers and spinners in the Colne Valley, and also of wholesale clothing firms, show that the intention of observing the Christmas holidays in the usual way is almost universal.

JADED OPERATIVES.

The position in the worsted trades of Bradford and Halifax and in the heavy woollen industry of Dewsbury, Batley, and district is very similar. Many manufacturers take the view that a curtailment of the holidays is both inexpedient and impracticable. "The holidays fix themselves this year almost as in accordance with a law of nature," said a Bradford manufacturer to our representative. "We must close on Christmas Day; on Boxing Day, which is a Saturday, it would not be worth while raising steam for half a day's working; therefore the holidays practically arrange themselves—to start on Thursday night and end on Monday morning." In Bradford, as no doubt elsewhere, employers generally are desirous that their workpeople should "play" this Christmas, because, as one manager expressed it, "they have honestly earned a holiday." "Lately," he remarked, "our engine has started at 12 o'clock on Sunday night and has not been stopped again until 12 o'clock on the following Saturday night. The workpeople have been employed long hours, and they cannot go on doing that interminably. They must have a break." And the workpeople on their part are no less earnest in their desire for a break. In the woolcombing branch of the industry one manager, at least, takes the view that it is very doubtful whether his employees would work on the customary holidays, even if they were asked to do so. Indeed, he expressed doubt whether they would work on Christmas Eve. "There is plenty of work," he remarked, "labour is scarce, and the men feel a bit independent." The dyers also will conform to the general practice, and in a few isolated cases work will not be resumed until Tuesday morning.

In Halifax, Keighley, Bingley, and Shipley—towns all closely related to Bradford in trade—the holidays will be similar to those observed in the city. In the several places there is an abundance of work and much overtime is being put in; consequently it is felt that it would be an injustice to deprive the workers of a brief respite from their labours this Christmas.

THE HEAVY WOOLLEN DISTRICT.

In no part of Yorkshire, or indeed of the whole country, has the press of work caused by the execution of Government orders been felt more severely than in the Heavy Woollen District, where the cloth, rug and blanket mills have been run to their fullest possible capacity day and night for over three months. In some cases resort has had to be made to Sunday work in order to cope with the urgent needs of the troops, and quite commonly the machinery has been driven until Saturday evening instead of being stopped at midday. Restrictions as to the employment of female and child labour have been relaxed to a greater extent than in any other period since the passing of the Factory Acts, and the strain on all sections of those engaged in the textile industries has been excessive. Here, also, however, Christmas and Boxing Day are generally to be holidays.

A short period of rest and recreation is regarded as a physical necessity. In course of time production is reduced, for human endurance is so taxed that the energies of the workers become seriously impaired, while the efficiency of the looms and mules, too, gradually but surely diminishes. A great quantity of machinery is sadly in need of a thorough overhauling, and the repairs and adjustments which will be made during the vacation will soon compensate for the spell of inactivity. For at least two months the mechanics in the Heavy Woollen District have been doing that kind of work during every available week-end hour, and they have the unpleasant prospect of being fully engaged upon it throughout the festive season. They should, however, be able to enjoy a complete rest for a few days afterwards.

No definite decision has been arrived at yet by employers as a whole as to the exact duration of the Christmas vacation, but from the replies which have been received to inquiries made of some of the principal manufacturers and of trade union officials in Dewsbury, Batley, and the adjacent towns, it appears probable that the mills will be closed down at the usual tea hour on Christmas Eve and opened again at 6 o'clock on Monday morning. In some instances, however, a re-start may be made at midnight on Sunday. Shopkeepers are naturally anxious that the factories should be closed early on Thursday evening, so that the workpeople may have sufficient time in which to make their purchases. No doubt there will be an unprecedented rush of trade, as the workers have been earning good wages for a long time, and have had very limited opportunities of spending their money.

THE POSITION IN LEEDS.

Except in the case of the clothing industry no special arrangements have been made in Leeds as to the duration of the Christmas holidays. The Master Clothiers' Association have, however, issued a recommendation to the various manufacturers and clothiers to the effect that all factories should be closed from noon on Thursday until Monday morning. This is a somewhat longer holiday than is usual, but as for the past few months work has been so plentiful the men have been able to earn very good money, and in consequence they are in no way adverse to having a longer period of rest. The recommendation is not, of course, binding, but there is every indication that it will be universally adopted.

In the engineering industry also, it has not been found necessary to consider the state of the worker's pocket. No universal action has been decided on, and the factories will be closed for periods long or short as they are slack or busy. In the majority of cases, however, they will remain idle from Thursday night until Monday morning at 9 o'clock instead of the usual earlier hour. In some cases the holiday is likely to be shorter, and this is particularly so where factories are engaged in the making of ammunition. Even these will be closed on Christmas Day, but the probability is that they will reopen on Boxing Day and continue working throughout the week-end. The firm which is ceasing work for the longest period is probably the Airedale Foundry, where for many weeks there has been work night and day. In this case the factory is being closed on Thursday night and will not re-open until the following Monday week. This is being done in order that the machinery which has been worked almost unceasingly since the latter days of September may have a complete overhauling.

65/a/3 658a.

Manchester Dispatch, Dec 30th 1914.

THE KHAKI SHORTAGE.

Operatives' Comments on the Situation.

A NOVEL SUGGESTION

No Fancy Cloths for "Dudes and Dandies."

The method of obtaining cloth for the clothing of the troops is criticised in the annual report of the Heavy Woollen District of the General Union of Textile workers.

It is urged that while the operatives are willing to work "overtime and all time" to clothe the soldiers, they know that the overtime would not have been necessary had the Government consulted expert business men.

In Leeds, for example, it is stated many good firms have received no Government orders at all, with the result that while some mills are running overtime, others cannot make up the full normal week.

The supply of raw material is also becoming a difficulty, and the report states that "the only way out would be to commandeer it all."

It is also claimed that the supply of cloth to the Government is hindered by the weaving of fancy civilian material. "The Government, even now, could do much," states the report, "if it said that until our soldiers are clad, and our common people are clad, there shall be no cloths for dudes and dandies.

"Thus the task of providing all that is needed for the fighting line could be done in a few months' time. Plain cloth for civilians is good enough wear in a crisis."

Weavers' Demands.

A thousand men and women weavers in the Huddersfield district, employed chiefly on making khaki, have refused to further work overtime unless the rate of pay for overtime is increased.

In accordance with a resolution the weavers left work at 5-30 on Monday night, refusing to work the two hours' overtime. The same thing occurred last night.

Mr. Allen Gee, general secretary of the General Union of Textile Workers, in an interview yesterday with a representative of the Daily Dispatch, stated that the weavers think they are as much entitled to extra pay for overtime as any other section of operatives. "There has not," he said, "been any recognised system of payment for overtime to weavers. But quite a number of firms in the Huddersfield district are paying the 1½d. per hour extra overtime. The firms employing the thousand weavers referred to are not doing so."

The Drapers Record; December 26th. 1914.
658a/4
658a.

Clothing the Army.

A Better System of Distribution Required—Sensible Speech by Sir Geo. Pragnell.

SIR GEORGE PRAGNELL was the principal speaker at a crowded meeting held at the Queen's Hall last Thursday, under the joint auspices of the "Queen's Work for Women Fund" and the "Women's Service League." Sir George touched on many topics of direct interest to the trade. He said:

We are all on active service now in some measure and in some field of work. To the business mind the worst feature connected with all the good work which is being done is the terrible overlapping not only of institutions and collections, but of effort and enthusiasm. If we were at the end of the war instead of at the beginning it would not matter very much. Again, the effects of mismanagement or want of co-ordination would not be so distressful if the winter were behind us instead of in the front of us. (Hear, hear.)

Everyone will be delighted to know that the British Red Cross Society and the St. John Ambulance Association have joined forces, and the point I particularly wish to draw your attention to (and it is the unspoken opinion of every business man I meet) is that the worst remaining case of overlapping and of mismanagement is the enormous number of appeals to the charitable public for clothing required by the troops which ought to be provided by the Government. (Great applause.)

With a long war and a hard winter in front of us, charity ought not to be diverted from its proper channel, and the State ought not to be competing with such magnificent institutions as the Red Cross, the St. John, and all the old-established societies for the relief of suffering and distress. (Cheers, and a voice, "Quite right, sir.") The inevitable consequence is that some of our men have plenty of friends collecting things for them and have more than they require, whilst others are miserably under-clad, and meanwhile all our proper charities will suffer, too. ("Shame!")

What Are the Authorities Doing?

I am not saying that we should not send these things to our soldiers if they are cold or wet or shivering; in fact, I am sending things to them nearly every day. But I maintain that they ought not to be cold or wet or shivering because the authorities ought to clothe them properly without appealing to the public. (Applause.) What makes it still worse is the fact that there was never any necessity to appeal for blankets, socks, gloves, mittens, shirts, body-belts, scarves, and so on, because if business people connected with that business had been consulted at the commencement of the war (more than four months ago) everything could have been supplied direct to the Admiralty and the War Office through the proper business channels. (Cheers and "Question?") There is no question about it, because I am chairman of the Wholesale Textile Association, which has met daily at noon ever since August 5, and it is my business to know all about these things. (Applause.)

My second point connected with winter and the war touches the object of this meeting still more closely because it concerns employment. If there had been no unemployment or fear of unemployment there would have been no necessity for this particular fund or this particular meeting. Now, I maintain that if the business of the war had been properly managed—that is to say, if the authorities, from the beginning of August, had placed the contracts properly for articles required by the troops—there need not have been any unemployment at all. (Cheers.)

Scientific Distribution Required.

Let me make this point a little clearer. It is not only our Army abroad and our Navy at sea which have had to be clothed and fed, but our vast armies and navies in training, our sick and wounded, and, on top of all of these, the armies and navies and the sick and wounded of France and Russia. Details of their requirements—millions of shirts, millions of body-belts, and millions of all the other things—would stagger you. Now, every business man in a position to know will tell you that if these colossal orders had been properly distributed—that is to say, with a little thought and a little business foresight—no woman who could work and was willing to work ought to have been unemployed since the commencement of the war. I except professional women, and their claims ought to be considered separately. I am not going to labour the point or to go into details. It would do me a lot of good to tell all I know, but this is not the place or the time. The War Office has accomplished so much and risen to the occasion in such a marvellous way and in nearly every direction that severe criticism under a few headings would be ungenerous. (Hear, hear.) I think it was Beaconsfield who said, "It is much easier to be critical than to be correct." Well, I am trying to be both, and it is difficult.

It reminds me of a friend who was driving in Ireland, and who had lost his way. He came to a double forked road, and asked a labourer which was the road to Ballyhuick? And the labourer said "Both." But my friend inquired "Which is the best road?" and the reply he got was, "Well, guv'nor, its both the best they are, but whichever you take, begorra, you'll wish you had taken the other." (Laughter.)

The Road We Should Take.

Ladies and gentlemen, the road we should all take is the one which we think is most likely to do the most good to others. The men and the women who are heping most to see us through this grim time are those who encourage more than they criticise. Above everything, we must think before we act, not only in big things, but in little ones as well. It is the little things that count. My daily life is full of instances. For example, here is a little thing which illustrates want of thought. It is a needle, and on this little needle (it is a hosiery needle) depends the output of all the knitted socks, body-belts, gloves, mittens, and so on, in this country. We allowed the manufacture of all these hosiery needles to go to Germany, with the exception of one little factory at Hinkley, upon whose limited output all our manufacturers depend to-day. And unthinking women are sending white feathers to those men who are working early and late to clothe the men who are fighting for us. I could give you hundreds of similar instances. What a little thing, what a thoughtful thing it would be for the War Office to give such men certificates of exemption and permit them to wear a badge. ("Bravo!" and cheers.) Then we should know who the slackers are. (Applause.)

Here is another little thing, another little thought: mittens are wanted badly by the troops and they are scarce. Now a man's sock only wears out in the foot part, and if this is cut off and a hole made in the other part for the thumb to go through, an excellent mitten can be made without any expense. I am paying unemployed typists to sew them over, and then I send them to our troops. But in three months I have exhausted my circle of friends. May I ask you to send me all the old (clean) socks you can collect in order in this way to provide more work and more comforts without cost, and without interfering with the living of any other class? I lay great stress on that point—finding work for women which won't interfere with the living of other women. May I venture to add, in the presence of so many ladies, that old stockings will do equally well.

Here is another illustration. This is a double flannel body-belt approved by doctors, admirals, and commanding officers, and soldiers and sailors say it is like an extra suit of clothes. Unlike woven belts, these will fit any size of man; they don't ruck up or slide down where they are not wanted, and they don't harbour vermin like the woven ones. Not a nice subject, but a very prevalent one, and, as I have said, "it is the little things that count." Well, unemployed women have made several hundred thousand of these for the Allies without interfering with the work of other women. (Hear, hear, and a voice "Where can we see them?") Samples of socks or belts free, and with pleasure, from the Patriotic Association, 32, St. Paul's-churchyard. (Cheers.)

We Can All Help.

A little more thought for others, and we may yet muddle through. The Queen's Committee and the Queen's Fund are doing great things under great difficulties. (Applause.) They want more co-operation from the authorities, and more help from the public. We can all help in some degree. (Hear, hear.) Let this meeting prove a rallying ground for further effort and a whetstone for our enthusiasm. Let us, ladies and gentlemen, all put good works on board, and so make this grim time turn out a happy argosy. May friendly winds and fair, the gentle breezes of thoughtfulness, of thoughtfulness and love guide all your ships through wintry seas until they reach the sunlit isles of great accomplishments, and may our gracious Queen and all those who ever keep such faithful watch and ward be enabled through your efforts to increase the rate of their precise and beneficent activities. (Prolonged applause.)

658a/5

The Co-operative News, December 26th 1914.

658a.

CLOTHING CONTRACTS.

HOW DOES THE GOVERNMENT PRICE AFFECT THE WORKER? 658a/5

STATEMENTS AT THE C.W.S. MEETING.

PENDLETON AGAIN TAKES UP THE CUDGELS.

DIRECTORS' REPLY.

WHY IS LEATHER MUCH DEARER?

[From Our Own Reporter.]

THERE have been no "Christmas Greetings" at Balloon-street this year, but the December quarterly meetings of the society, which came to a close on Saturday, are in themselves sufficient to indicate that the year 1914 has almost run its course. Soon it will have joined its predecessors, but it leaves behind a record which, so far as the society is concerned, has probably never been equalled. Nobody thought when the year began that the December report would contain any references to war, nor did anybody imagine that the society would be called upon to do the work it has done for the Government. So far as sales are concerned, it is not possible at the moment to give the figures, but it will probably be recalled that a few weeks ago it was announced in the "Co operative News" that the society had broken its best weekly record.

The meeting in Manchester on Saturday did not occupy the usual length of time; as a matter of fact, it was over in an hour-and-a-half. There were 916 delegates present, and they represented 277 societies. Mr. J. Shillito (president) occupied the chair, and he was supported by all the directors resident in the Manchester district, and the following representatives from the other districts: Messrs. T. Shotton, T. Adams, and J. W. King (Newcastle), and Messrs. H. J. Youngs and A. E. Threadgill (London). Messrs. T. J. Baylis and T. Wood (auditors), Messrs. J. J. Barstow and E. Procter (scrutineers), and Messrs. T. Brodrick (secretary and accountant), T. Goodwin (cashier and bank manager), and J. Odgers (C.I.S.) were also on the platform.

The Late Mr. Gibson.

The Chairman, at the outset, made reference to the death of Mr. Gibson (an ex-director of the Newcastle branch of the Wholesale Society), and moved that a letter of condolence be sent to the bereaved family. This was agreed to.

New Members.

There were only two applications for membership: one from the Forward Society in Guernsey, and the other from Maentwrog and District Agricultural Society in the county of Merioneth, and both were agreed to.

The committee's report was then considered.

Army Contracts.

Mr. Sharples (Blackburn), who was indistinctly heard at the Press table, expressed satisfaction at the gratifying increase shown in the society's trade, but wanted to know how much of this increase was due to abnormal circumstances owing to Army contracts? How much was due to extraordinary circumstances, and how much to a natural increase in trade?

The Chairman replied that the increased taxes had hardly come into existence when the quarter under review ended. Certainly they had just slightly. When they looked at what had taken place since—the increased price of sugar, which would come in the next half-year—they had an increase up to the twenty-third or fourth week of a little over two millions, and that arose very largely—at least one million of it—from sugar alone.

Banking and Bank Interest.

Mr. Charter (Cambridge) referred to the increase in the turnover of the banking account. There was still an increase, but was it not possible for an active propaganda to be carried out by the C.W.S. with the object of bringing in other societies now standing out?

Mr. M'Carthy (Leicester) said they in Leicester would like to know if the finance committee had ever considered the advisability of starting branches in centres like Leicester. They did not want to place their business with the C.W.S. through outside agencies. He was speaking both of trade unions and co-operative societies. Could they establish a direct C.W.S. branch in Leicester?

Mr. Varley (Lancaster) wanted to know if the committee would again consider the question of the rate of interest on loans, and raise it to 4 per cent. That percentage could now be got elsewhere; even the Government was now giving that security.

A delegate asked how many trade unions were now banking with the C.W.S.

The Chairman said there were about seventy trade unions now banking with the C.W.S. Replying to Mr. Charter, he remarked that they had always propaganda work going on in connection with banking. But there were peculiarities which were in the way. For instance, there was one society that was on their first balance sheet, but they still refused to bank with the C.W.S. Whether the co-operative spirit had fallen or not he could not say, but it tended in that way. But the banking was increasing all the same. As regarded 4 per cent. interest, they wanted to know if it was wise to make drastic changes when they were in a state of panic? What they desired to do was to give security that could be relied upon. Four per cent. would not last long when they got into a settled condition, and if they got 4 per cent. now, they would not want it to be reduced afterwards.

Beet Growing.

Mr. Redfearn (Heckmondwike) said he understood the directors were making inquiries in regard to beet-growing. He gathered from what one of the directors said at the Manchester divisional meeting, on the previous Saturday, that the society had been in communication with the Development Commissioners in regard to the matter. He was of opinion that the Wholesale Society could manage this business as well as the Government or Development Commissioners. He believed that a plentiful supply of sun was essential to beet growing. He therefore suggested that a few acres on their various estates should be set apart for experimental purposes, and then they would see which parts of the country received the greatest amount of sunshine, and therefore the most suitable for beet growing.

Mr. M'Innes (platform) said the Development Commissioners were not likely to give a grant, even if the Wholesale Society asked for it, because one of the conditions attendant upon a development grant was that the society or company appealing for financial assistance should not be working for a profit. He had seen beet grown in South Lincolnshire during the past few years in very good land, for which Dutch refiners gave a very good price. The growers had, however, discontinued growing beet for crops, which paid them better.

Question of a Tannery.

Mr. Baxter (Middlesbrough) inquired whether the directors, in view of the increased price of leather anticipated in the near future having a tannery of their own. He did not think any firm was in such a good position as the Wholesale Society for getting hold of the raw materials.

Mr. Charter (Cambridge): Is it your opinion that the present inflated price of leather is due to a real shortage, or to exploitation by tanners? If the latter, do you propose to consider the advisability of establishing a tannery of your own?

A Dress Complaint.

Mr. Bradbury (Mossley) said he wanted to make a complaint which had reference to the methods of the drapery department at Balloon-street. He sent a lady, who wanted a dress, to the department.

The Chairman: We cannot allow complaints at these meetings. You should write a letter to the committee, and tell them ——.

Mr. Bradbury: I have an audience whom I appeal to.

The Chairman: It is not a proper question. Write to the drapery committee. I think they will give you a satisfactory explanation.

Mr. M'Innes: I beg to give you the assurance that we of the drapery committee are constantly receiving complaints of the character Mr. Bradbury has made, and we do our level best to get to the bottom of them.

Mr. Bradbury: I don't think you know the character of my- —

Mr. M'Innes: I think you have said sufficient to indicate the character of your complaint, and we shall be pleased to investigate anything you may send along.

The Chairman, replying, said that if they had forty tanneries they could not have their leather cheaper. It was the price of green hides which made the difference. And the increase had not stopped yet. In Germany they were wasting leather in abundance, and this would all tend to make leather dearer and scarcer until a great change came about. Cattle also had gone down in England, and they could not have leather without cattle.

Mr. Millerchip (Walsall) asked whether the Chairman could give the difference in the percentage of advance in the green hides and the manufactured article.

The Chairman said that if notice of the question had been given it could have been answered, but the figures could not be given offhand.

Mr. Rogers (Northampton) said he thought he could throw some light on the matter, but the Chairman said the question had been answered, and the discussion was closed.

Prices of Military Clothing.

A Carlisle Delegate asked whether any information could be given as to the basis upon which the Wholesale fixed the prices of the military garments which they were giving out to societies to make. The Carlisle Society had been requested to make military garments at a price at which they could not do so and pay the log prices in their workshops.

Mr. M'Carthy (Leicester) said that at the prices given for the making of trousers and tunic it was not possible to pay trade union wages and leave a profit for the society. That was not fair to working-class people. If the whole of the business people of the country were prepared to make sacrifices for their country, it would be all right; but while some were making large sums of money out of Army contracts, others had practically no margin left. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. M'Innes (platform), in reply, said that in some instances those to whom these orders were given might not be working under the factory system. As far as sub-contractors are concerned, they had to be firms of good repute, and a list of the firms had to be submitted to the Government. The Wholesale, at its own factories, had been able to make these military garments and give full trade union conditions and pay the minimum scale of wages also. (Mr. Jennings: "No, no.") Well (continued Mr. M'Innes), I have the full particulars in my pocket. I ask Mr. Jennings to give us the particulars he has at his disposal, and we will confute them, and I have no hesitation in saying so from this platform." (Hear, hear.)

The Tea Production.

A Delegate asked what quantity of tea was produced by the C.W.S., and what quantity purchased from other sources.

Mr. Killon (C.W.S.) said that the quantity of tea sold from week to week was about 600,000 pounds. The quantity of tea grown on the C.W.S. estate was only a small proportion of that amount. But they had acquired large tracts of land in India, and as years pass by the quantity of tea produced would be more commensurate with the quantity being sold by the C.W.S.

South-West Flour Supply.

Mr. Halse (Twerton) said they had suffered much through the belated supply of flour. How soon could they have facilities at Avonmouth to prevent such irregularities in future?

Mr. Lander replied that the question concerning supplies from Avonmouth had been a difficult one. They had been able to keep societies going, but they had had to run "long times. Although a new mill was in contemplation, they had had to accept a tender last week (for temporary purposes) to crowd in some machinery in the present mill to increase supply in the area. [illegible] appreciated the kindly spirit of the societies in the district, and the C.W.S. was doing its best to help them o[illegible] of their difficulties.

658a/6

Trade Union Matters.

Mr. Rogers (Northampton) wanted to know if the board were aware of any friction existing inside Huthwaite, due to the fact that a very small proportion of the employés were standing outside the union.

Mr. Lander replied that the committee were perfectly satisfied about the Huthwaite factory, because 100 per cent. of the workers were members of the trade unions. There was a question raised about one employé at a meeting about six months previous, but he had since gone, and now trade unionists were 100 per cent. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Lander said decrease at Desborough was due to trade being affected by the war. The factory was working full time, and the question raised was purely one of stocks and delivery.

A Delegate, on the paragraph headed Batley Mills, asked if the Wholesale Society had been black-listed for not paying the trade union rate of wages.

Mr. Lander said it was unfair for delegates to ask questions like that without making quite sure of their grounds. When the meetings were over, some of the statements were carried away and believed to be the actual facts of the case. However, the mills had not been black-listed, and the officials of the trade union concerned had expressed regret that any such rumours should have got into circulation.

The Proper Place.

Mr. Hadfield (Oldham Equitable), on the paragraph relative to Radcliffe weaving shed, endeavoured to elicit information concerning the building department, but the Chairman—who ruled him out of order—said: "There is a proper place for this, if you will only find it." (Laughter.)

Mr. Hadfield: If we only had a report in regard to the building department, we could ask our questions on that.

Weavers' Wages.

A Delegate asked if the directors had been in communication with the Weavers' Amalgamation in respect to a weaver's statement, and if so, could the statement be placed before the delegates?

Mr. Lander said there was no dispute with the Weavers' Amalgamation. The question they had to talk over with representatives of that organisation had reference to the establishment of a list for Northrop looms in the coloured trade, which at present did not exist. He did not think there would be any difficulty in coming to an amicable agreement as to the prices to be paid. The relationships between the Wholesale Society and the workers' organisation were of a cordial character, and there was no contention between them at the moment.

So far as Radcliffe weaving shed was concerned, Mr. Lander said there was no shortage of weavers at the present time. As a matter of fact, they were about the only people in the weaving trade who were busy in certain parts of Lancashire. They had plenty of orders for the looms, and they were sending out cloth that was giving satisfaction with regard to quality and in price, and the only thing which might cause delay in the development of the shed would be the question of dye. In common with other people, they were experiencing difficulty in getting supplies of dye, and the time might come when they would try to dye their own yarns, and be independent of outsiders.

Conditions of Labour.

Mr. Jennings (Pendleton) having risen, the Chairman said: "We cannot have it over again. We had it at Manchester last week."

Mr. Jennings: I am acting on instructions, and I have the right to ask the question.

The Chairman: We are in negotiations with the Pendleton Society, and when those negotiations are finished, we shall see what can be done.

Mr. Jennings: You are creating a wrong impression if you avoid the question. When I say I speak on behalf of the committee and delegates of the Pendleton Society, that will answer the question, "Do I speak for myself or for the committee?" Proceeding, he again asked the directors of the Wholesale Society if they had any information to give in regard to the various allegations he made [illegible] and now expressed his adherence to. Had they instituted any inquiries? Did they expect them at Pendleton to divulge names of employés who were dissatisfied after the treatment of Barraclough, Smith, and six others, who received victimisation pay at this factory? They had received splendid treatment from the drapery committee, and they appreciated what that committee had done. But was it not possible for the committee to have access to the wage-book? He contended that if they looked through the wage-book they would find justification for the claims of the Pendleton Society.

658a/7

Mr. Whittaker (Todmorden) said he had been told that the employés at the factory engaged on Government work could not make the same wages as they could on their ordinary work.

Mr. Johnson (Pendleton) asked whether employés had left the Wholesale Society to work for Jews. There was discontent at the factory, and it was not good for the movement that it should be so; and he hoped the drapery committee would take up a strong attitude, and remedy any evils which existed.

Mr. M'Innes said it was not good for the movement to push charges of that kind at such meetings without informing the drapery committee beforehand. The question had been asked whether any of their employés had left to go and work for Jews. He did not know; he had not heard of any. They had the assurance of their manager that workpeople who had been working on Government orders—hundreds and hundreds of which were going through—could earn more money and more easily than they could on a large variety of jobs.

Several delegates interrupted with "No, no," and "At Leeds."

Mr. M'Innes, proceeding, said a statement was made the previous week at the Manchester meeting that if a living wage could not be paid at Broughton, they should close the factory. (Hear, hear.) They said a living wage was being paid, and the minimum wage was being observed at Broughton. They had written the Pendleton Society, and up to the present they had not received any reply. They were, however, expecting a reply, which would have their serious consideration. In the next place, he hoped the Pendleton Society would take steps to support and confirm everything that had been said at that meeting. He did not believe there was any truth in what had been said. So far as wage-sheets were concerned, he said they were continually seeing them.

Boots and Shoes.

A Cleckheaton Delegate asked for the reason of the decrease at the Heckmondwike shoe works, more especially when societies had received a circular saying the works were so busy with Government work that they could not complete all contracts?

Mr. Rogers (Northampton) referred again to the question of green hides, and said he was sorry to have to disagree with the platform, but any man in the boot trade knows that the explanation given was not the crux of the question at all. Robbery had been going on, and the delegates would be faced with the same question in perhaps a more acute form three months hence, when the prices of boots would have to be still further advanced, or the quality reduced.

Mr. M'Carthy (Leicester) asked for the cause of the decrease at the Leicester shoe works.

Another delegate wanted to know the percentage of boots and shoes sold by the Wholesale which were made within the movement, and the percentage bought outside.

Mr. Lander, replying, said the percentage of boots and shoes—leaving out slippers and such things—made inside the movement and sold by the Wholesale was 78. (Hear, hear.) With reference to the currying at Heckmondwike, the machinery there was quite out of date for the work it was required to do. The question of developing currying and tanning was receiving the attention of the committee, but had no connection with Heckmondwike, because they could not put a factory there for various reasons. Regarding the decrease at Leicester works, that was up to the end of September, and was only for the supplies from the factory to the various distributive departments. When the war came deliveries were stopped suddenly by societies and by the departments. They all had panic—some worse than others. (Hear, hear.) And the consequence was that the supplies from Leicester were down. The figures up to the present time showed a very substantial increase in the supplies. The factory was well employed at the present time and trying to turn out as many boots as was possible for the spring and summer season, which they hoped would be a good one, in spite of the untoward circumstances. The decrease at Heckmondwike was due to the same cause, but since the outbreak of the war the works had been running until nine o'clock in the evening. Referring to the remarks of Mr. Rogers, he (Mr. Lander) wanted to correct just one thing that might be carried away from that meeting wrongly. He wanted to tell the meeting that so far as their make of boots was concerned, they had not interfered with the quality. They would have to interfere with the price, but they did not think they ought to depreciate the quality. (Hear, hear.) It was a mistake to try and deceive the customer because of the difference in the price of leather. (Hear, hear.) Continuing, Mr. Lander said there was more than one reason for the high price of leather. It was not covered by Mr. Rogers' explanation, nor by that of the Chairman. (Hear, hear.) They were contributory factors to the increased price, and at the present time it looked as though prices would be higher still. Some of this increase that was foreshadowed was largely due to exploitation by men who did not handle the leather at all. The same applied to cloth, and a number of articles besides leather. (Hear, hear.) It applied to wheat. The high prices of some commodities were absolutely a disgrace, and it behoved them, as co-operators to go more and more into the question of getting control over the supplies of raw material. (Applause).

658 a/7

Army Cabinet Contracts.

Replying to Mr. Forsyth (Eccles), Mr. M'Innes said that the small decrease in the Broughton cabinet works was attributable to the slackness in the demand for furniture due to the war. The cabinet factory had done several small contracts for the Government, mainly for the inside of hospitals.

Paints and Printers' Ink.

Mr. Whittaker (Todmorden) wanted an explanation of the decrease at the paint works at Rochdale.

A Cleckheaton Delegate was anxious to know if printers' ink could be manufactured at the Rochdale works.

Mr. Lander said that the decreases at Rochdale reflected the loyalty and disloyalty of societies. They were going into the question of printers' ink; in fact, it was their object to make all that was used in the movement. (Hear, hear.)

Industrial Housing Conditions.

Mr. Jennings (Pendleton) said that about eighteen months ago there was a question raised about the C.W.S. with regard to buying land for works. It was then contended that sufficient land should be purchased for the erection of dwellings for the workpeople. Were the committee still considering that matter, and when did they intend to move in it? As soon as they erected a factory they knew that the value of land increased, and the result went into the pockets of private builders.

Mr. Lander, responding, said the committee had not lost sight of the matter. But they had to consider many things in putting factories up; they must have a suitable place to get in and get out, and have labour necessary for the manufacture. They could not live on sentimental Saturday afternoon prices, but on Tuesday demands. However, they always did whatever they could for the workpeople.

Red-Cross Enlistments.

Mr. R. J. Davies (Manchester and Salford) drew attention (when considering the recommendations of the committee) to a statement which had been issued to employés with regard to enlistments. He said this explained that employés enlisting for Red Cross work would not be treated, respecting payment, in the same way that those who had enlisted for the fighting forces. Why should the allowance not be the same? He also wished to know if the board had taken into consideration the passing of a resolution demanding £1 per week for soldiers?

The Chairman, in his reply, said they regarded the Red Cross Society as a voluntary association, and those who had joined it had taken up something in which there was less risk. ("Oh! Oh!") They decided that payment should be made to those joined the Army, and not the Red Cross.

All the recommendations of the committee were adopted, and the meeting came to a close. Before going down to tea, however, the delegates sang the first verse of the Christmas Hymn.

The Yorkshire Observer, December 31st. 1914.

658a.

658a/8

WHOLESALE CLOTHING TRADE.

DEMAND FOR UNIFORMS.

For the Leeds wholesale clothing trade the year opened placidly, with no indications of the great things that would happen before it came to an end. In January business was slack, as there was a slight wave of depression passing over some of the best home outlets, notably Lancashire. In many parts of the country the retailers had had a very poor winter season, owing to the extreme mildness of the weather. Stocks of overcoats and other winter garments were heavy, with the natural result that the retailers did not care to speculate on spring account, and in Lancashire, which is one of the very best outlets, the prospects of the cotton industry had become gloomy. In the mining districts of South Yorkshire and Derbyshire—another good market—there was much labour unrest, and all these things combined to depress the clothing industry.

The spring orders came forward slowly, and in the first few weeks of the year there was barely sufficient work to keep the machinery working the full normal day. Towards the end of March a decided improvement set in. The threatened labour troubles in the coalfields passed over, and the output on Easter account was well up to the average of the best years.

The improvement was short-lived, as the weeks between Easter and Whitsuntide were slack, comparatively speaking. These weeks are usually the very busiest period of the clothiers' year, when the demand is for the most part in excess of the supply. But this year the clothiers had no difficulty at all in keeping well abreast of the Whitsuntide demand and delivering the orders well up to time. This was a very different experience from that of the very busy years when no orders for Whitsuntide delivery are accepted within, say, three weeks before the holidays.

DEMAND FOR BETTER-CLASS GOODS.

One remarkable feature of the trade was the steady demand for better-class garments. The run upon stock garments was remarkably weak as far as men's wear was concerned. Special measure goods only seemed to be wanted on summer account, and the special order department was kept well occupied from Easter to the August Bank Holiday. The demand for stock garments was confined for the most part to juvenile clothing. In all directions the special department made progress. Another feature of the trade was the increased cost of production. Woollens and trimmings had advanced in value, and with the preparation of winter price lists quotations for clothing of all descriptions were increased accordingly.

The oversea demand did nothing to help towards greater activity or to compensate for the comparative quietness in the home markets. South Africa is the chief outlet overseas for the productions of the Leeds clothing factories, and the condition of affairs out there has not been conducive to brisk business. At the moment of writing the tendency is towards a still further falling off. The whole situation regarding South Africa may be summed up by saying that shipping firms on this side are not inclined to push Cape business to anything like its fullest extent, and out there the storekeepers are not disposed to buy in excess of immediate requirements. The outlook, however, is hopeful, and it is expected that business will soon settle down again into its normal groove. Stocks of clothing in South Africa must be very low, and with a return of confidence a steady flow of orders might be expected.

EFFECT OF THE WAR.

The clothing factories were all closed down and the operatives were for the most part away at Blackpool and Scarborough when the war broke out. The factories opened their doors a day or two afterwards with the gloomiest prospects for the winter trade. The whole natural order of things was upset. As in other [illegible] tries something of a panic ensued, and short time became general throughout the trade. Even if there had been no war this slackness would have been with us, as the clothiers had very few orders on hand with which to start the autumn and winter trade, which usually begins immediately after the August Bank Holiday. The[illegible] for the most part, took the most pessimistic view of the situation. They seemed convinced that the whole trade of the country would be upset, and no one would require clothing. The handling of khaki was entirely new to most of them, but they adapted themselves to the work with remarkable quickness and have become experts in a very short time.

It should also be placed upon record that the charges of sweating which have been made against the wholesale clothiers in connection with these Army contracts appear to be without the slightest foundation in fact. There has been a certain amount of sub-letting in some cases, but that was inevitable under the circumstances, and where it has been done at all it has been under equitable conditions. The amount of sub-letting appears to have been trivial in any case, and the contracts all appear to be carried out under the fairest trade conditions, notwithstanding rumours to the contrary and in spite of the pressure for delivery.

There is still an enormous amount of work to be done in connection with the clothing of the new Army. In this respect the clothing trade suffers like other industries from a scarcity of skilled labour. Many of the operatives have joined the colours, and their places are difficult to fill. Any further scarcity of labour caused by recruiting will further handicap the clothiers and cause considerable delay in the completion of the contracts.

The uniform trade is, of course, occupying a large proportion of the available machinery, and as a result, those firms who can accept private orders have no difficulty in obtaining them. In most of the industrial districts on which the clothing industry depends trade is booming in spite of the war or because of it, and when this can be said there is no scarcity of orders in the clothing factories, and the winter demand has been steady and regular.

Another very satisfactory feature of the trade throughout the year has been that retailers nearly everywhere have taken up their engagements promptly. Neither the number nor the importance of suspensions of payment have been above the average, and the wholesale houses will scarcely have even the ordinary percentages to write off on the score of bad debts when it comes to stocktaking. There have been no labour disturbances in the trade of any moment, and although there was agitation and unrest amongst the workers in the early part of the year, which might have developed into strikes later on, the shadow of the war has put all these things aside.

A PROSPEROUS YEAR.

The year must be described as a prosperous one, and it has never happened before in the history of the trade that the clothiers have had such a busy winter season as the present. There are no signs of any cessation of activity, and the present condition of affairs is almost certain to last as long as the war. The activity may even increase. It is certain that our own Army clothing authorities will look to Leeds to produce uniforms at even a greater rate than at present, and it is even possible that the manufacturers may be asked to make up uniforms for France and Russia just as our woollen manufacturers are making the cloth. In some quarters French contracts have been expected. In normal times France looks to Lille and the busy surrounding manufacturing area for the supply of military uniforms. Paris is also a great making-up centre and so is the Lyonnaise, and as long as the Germans can be held back from occupying these areas the French army clothing authorities may manage to get all their making-up done at home if we will only supply the cloth, which we are at present doing.

The immediate outlook must be considered good, and there is not likely to be any falling off in the present activity whilst the war continues. It is, of course, impossible to look any further ahead than the war. The old order of things may be in the melting-pot, and no one knows how the clothing industry may be affected. The generally-expressed opinion is that it will take generations for Germany to recover from the effects of this war, and during that period that country will be ineffective as a commercial rival. It is not too much to expect that most of the great volume of trade which its manufacturers have hitherto held in the world's markets will fall to the share of Great Britain, and this applies particularly to the clothing industry, in which German competition has been keenly felt.

658a/9 658a.

in the first few weeks of the year there was barely sufficient work to keep the machinery working the full normal day. Towards the end of March a decided improvement set in. The threatened labour troubles in the coalfields passed over, and the output on Easter account was well up to the average of the best years.

The improvement was short-lived, as the weeks between Easter and Whitsuntide were slack, comparatively speaking. These weeks are usually the very busiest period of the clothiers' year, when the demand is for the most part in excess of the supply. But this year the clothiers had no difficulty at all in keeping well abreast of the Whitsuntide demand and delivering the orders well up to time. This was a very different experience from that of the very busy years when no orders for Whitsuntide delivery are accepted within, say, three weeks before the holidays.

DEMAND FOR BETTER-CLASS GOODS.

One remarkable feature of the trade was the steady demand for better-class garments. The run upon stock garments was remarkably weak as far as men's wear was concerned. Special measure goods only seemed to be wanted on summer account, and the special order department was kept well occupied from Easter to the August Bank Holiday. The demand for stock garments was confined for the most part to juvenile clothing. In all directions the special department made progress. Another feature of the trade was the increased cost of production. Woollens and trimmings had advanced in value, and with the preparation of winter price lists quotations for clothing of all descriptions were increased accordingly.

The oversea demand did nothing to help towards greater activity or to compensate for the comparative quietness in the home markets. South Africa is the chief outlet overseas for the productions of the Leeds clothing factories, and the condition of affairs out there has not been conducive to brisk business. At the moment of writing the tendency is towards a still further falling off. The whole situation regarding South Africa may be summed up by saying that shipping firms on this side are not inclined to push Cape business to anything like its fullest extent, and out there the storekeepers are not disposed to buy in excess of immediate requirements. The outlook, however, is hopeful, and it is expected that business will soon settle down again into its normal groove. Stocks of clothing in South Africa must be very low, and with a return of confidence a steady flow of orders might be expected.

EFFECT OF THE WAR.

The clothing factories were all closed down and the operatives were for the most part away at Blackpool and Scarborough when the war broke out. The factories opened their doors a day or two afterwards with the gloomiest prospects for the winter trade. The whole natural order of things was upset. As in other [illegible] tries something of a panic ensued, and short time became general throughout the trade. Even if there had been no war this slackness would have been with us, as the clothiers had very few orders on hand with which to start the autumn and winter trade, which usually begins immediately after the August Bank Holiday. Clothiers, for the most part, took the most pessimistic view of the situation. They seemed convinced that the whole trade of the country would be upset, and no one would require clothing for a long time to come. This view was to some extent justified, because for a few weeks afterwards orders were almost nil. Then Government orders began to pour in. Uniforms were wanted immediately for the new army. This brought about a sudden transition from stagnation to activity, and wholesale clothiers found that they were short of both hands and materials to cope with the sudden demand. The nearest approach to the situation existing was that at the time of the Boer war, when the Leeds clothiers rose to the occasion and quickly supplied the deficiencies of the Army Clothing Department at Pimlico. But the Boer war was a trivial thing compared with this.

The clothiers set themselves with characteristic energy to the task, and with the hearty aid of the workers they have overcome many difficulties and have turned out uniforms at a wonderfully rapid rate. The manner in which the clothing factory employees surmounted the difficulties is worthy of all praise. It must be remembered that the making up of uniforms and [illegible] difficulty in obtaining them. In most of the industrial districts on which the clothing industry depends trade is booming in spite of the war or because of it, and when this can be said there is no scarcity of orders in the clothing factories, and the winter demand has been steady and regular.

Another very satisfactory feature of the trade throughout the year has been that retailers nearly everywhere have taken up their engagements promptly. Neither the number nor the importance of suspensions of payment have been above the average, and the wholesale houses will scarcely have even the ordinary percentages to write off on the score of bad debts when it comes to stocktaking. There have been no labour disturbances in the trade of any moment, and although there was agitation and unrest amongst the workers in the early part of the year, which might have developed into strikes later on, the shadow of the war has put all these things aside.

A PROSPEROUS YEAR.

The year must be described as a prosperous one, and it has never happened before in the history of the trade that the clothiers have had such a busy winter season as the present. There are no signs of any cessation of activity, and the present condition of affairs is almost certain to last as long as the war. The activity may even increase. It is certain that our own Army clothing authorities will look to Leeds to produce uniforms at even a greater rate than at present, and it is even possible that the manufacturers may be asked to make up uniforms for France and Russia just as our woollen manufacturers are making the cloth. In some quarters French contracts have been expected. In normal times France looks to Lille and the busy surrounding manufacturing area for the supply of military uniforms. Paris is also a great making-up centre and so is the Lyonnaise, and as long as the Germans can be held back from occupying these areas the French army clothing authorities may manage to get all their making-up done at home if we will only supply the cloth, which we are at present doing.

The immediate outlook must be considered good, and there is not likely to be any falling off in the present activity whilst the war continues. It is, of course, impossible to look any further ahead than the war. The old order of things may be in the melting-pot, and no one knows how the clothing industry may be affected. The generally-expressed opinion is that it will take generations for Germany to recover from the effects of this war, and during that period that country will be ineffective as a commercial rival. It is not too much to expect that most of the great volume of trade which its manufacturers have hitherto held in the world's markets will fall to the share of Great Britain, and this applies particularly to the clothing industry, in which German competition has been keenly felt.

Weekly Dispatch, January 3rd. 1915.

KHAKI FORTUNES IN THE EAST END.

Not Enough Tailors and Machines.

The war, a very ill wind to most, has blown a lot of life into a slack industry in the East End of London—that of tailoring. The East End is experiencing a khaki boom. The period after Christmas is usually a very quiet one, but "this season is unequalled in the history of tailoring," said Mr. William Goodwin, of Steward-street, to a representative of The Weekly Dispatch. "We have enough work to keep us going day and night for an almost indefinite period. We are doing five times the quantity of garments that we did before the war. Others must be doing even more, for we are doing the better-class goods, and, of course, the bulk is not so good. A difficulty, almost unbelievable at this time of the year, is in getting workpeople. I am also experiencing a kind of inconvenience I have never had before in my life—that of getting machines." Asked to explain the cause of this difficulty, Mr. Goodwin said: "Firstly, the tremendous quantity of work; secondly, the Aliens Act; and thirdly, we will not employ Germans or Austrians."

FORTUNES FOR ALL.

Stories of little fortunes being made were numerous. Everybody knew of somebody else who was just coining money in these wonderful times. There is Mr. —— making twenty pounds a week clear profit. Before the war he was making two!" Ten, twenty, and thirty pounds a week were said to be the profits of several small master tailors. "I have earned two pounds this week," said a pale but bright looking woman. "I learnt the buttonholes very easily when my husband told me there would be a demand for workers. And every little helps!" From two shillings to half-a-crown per hundred buttonholes on tunics and overcoats are paid. Half the price is paid for buttonholes made on breeches. Men altogether ignorant of the tailoring trade are trying a hand at it. For instance an enterprising musician, rather badly hit by the war, purchased a machine for button-hole making and is maintaining his end in this manner. A baker, finding that khaki paid at least as well as bread, transformed half of his stores into a tailoring department!

The Manchester Courier 15-2-15,

MAKING UNIFORMS.

GRIEVANCE OF THE SUB-CONTRACTOR.

It appears to be a fact that Government contracts generally manage to lead to dissatisfaction somewhere in the circle of people concerned with and affected by them. This has been noticed again and again; yet very few business people would disdain such a contract. This difference of opinion has occurred again in connection with the Army uniforms. No effort has been made to keep it secret, but neither has any attempt been made to advertise it.

There are reasons for this "endurance and submission," and perhaps the simplest is that the people chiefly affected are those who, while doing Government work, have no direct dealings with the Government. These people are the sub-contractors, who undertake to do the surplus work of the contractor. That is, the contractor "lets out" so much work to a sub-contractor to ensure the delivery of the goods within the given time. Several large clothing firms in Manchester hold Government contracts to supply Army uniforms, and they have engaged hundreds of sub-contractors to assist them.

These sub-contractors are inclined to grumble at the low figure fixed by the Government, a figure which compels them to work, in many instances, with practically no profit at all. The Government pay 19s. 6d. per suit and supply all materials, entering the cost of them against the contractors and deducting the same when making payment. It has been said that a contractor can make from 12 per cent to 15 per cent profit on the undertaking, so that working at top pressure he has nothing whatever to grumble at. It is only the work he finds it impossible to perform that he gives out to the smaller firms, and on that work he reckons to make 5 per cent profit. The important difference between the contractor and the small sub-contractor is that the former employes girls and uses machinery, while the latter must employ men and does not use machinery. Thus he finds his turnover adversely affected in two ways. He has to pay more for men's work than the contractor pays the girls, and with no machinery—or little enough not to count—he cannot turn out a sufficient number of suits to yield a substantial profit.

Girls are paid 3s. 3½d. per tunic—it usually takes three girls to make the garment—and 1s. is paid for the trousers. Thus the suit is made for 3s. 3½d., but several girls have to share this sum, and with a smaller number of suits turned out the profits of the sub-contractor are again lessened.

Recently there has been trouble in Leeds among the workers, suggestions being made that sub-contractors endeavoured to make up some

---

The Daily News & Leader, January 8th. 1915.

LABOUR & KHAKI BOOM.

East End Rush From Jam Factories to Tailoring.

The khaki boom, now at its height, has resulted in the establishment by Government contractors of huge factories in Bow and Poplar, and the cry for workers is insistent. So attractive is the prospect of "constant work and good pay" that girls are resigning their posts in jam and pickle factories, and training themselves for the work of making up uniforms.

Contractors enlisted the help of sub-contractors, and these, in their turn, have found it expedient to secure larger premises and advertise extensively for workpeople.

Tailors' pressers and under-pressers, who earned from 30s. to 40s. a week in normal times, are taking three times that amount to-day. Girl basters have taken to machining, whilst ex-schoolboys, who earned a few shillings by carrying civilian clothing to and from the City shops, are plying the machines and earning men's money.

Yorkshire Observer, January 28th. 1915.

LEEDS CLOTHING OPERATIVES' GRIEVANCES.

The conference between representatives of the Leeds branch of the Amalgamated Union of Clothiers Operatives and the Leeds Master Clothiers' Association was resumed at the Great Northern Hotel yesterday. As has been reported before, the matter under discussion is that of agreeing upon the payment of a flat rate of remuneration for the workers together with a standard rate for overtime. It had been expected that an amicable understanding would have been arrived at yesterday, but at the close of the sitting it was officially announced that the negotiations were still proceeding. Another meeting will be held to-morrow, and in the meantime the delegates on both sides will report to their respective organisations. The situation is considered to be hopeful.

Austrians."

FORTUNES FOR ALL.

Stories of little fortunes being made were numerous. Everybody knew of somebody else who was just coining money in these wonderful times. There is Mr. —— making twenty pounds a week clear profit. Before the war he was making two!" Ten, twenty, and thirty pounds a week were said to be the profits of several small master tailors. "I have earned two pounds this week," said a pale but bright looking woman. "I learnt the buttonholes very easily when my husband told me there would be a demand for workers. And every little helps!" From two shillings to half-a-crown per hundred buttonholes on tunics and overcoats are paid. Half the price is paid for buttonholes made on breeches. Men altogether ignorant of the tailoring trade are trying a hand at it. For instance an enterprising musician, rather badly hit by the war, purchased a machine for button-hole making and is maintaining his end in this manner. A baker, finding that khaki paid at least as well as bread, transformed half of his stores into a tailoring department!

The Manchester Courier
15-2-15.

MAKING UNIFORMS.

GRIEVANCE OF THE SUB-CONTRACTOR.

It appears to be a fact that Government contracts generally manage to lead to dissatisfaction somewhere in the circle of people concerned with and affected by them. This has been noticed again and again; yet very few business people would disdain such a contract. This difference of opinion has occurred again in connection with the Army uniforms. No effort has been made to keep it secret, but neither has any attempt been made to advertise it.

There are reasons for this "endurance and submission," and perhaps the simplest is that the people chiefly affected are those who, while doing Government work, have no direct dealings with the Government. These people are the sub-contractors, who undertake to do the surplus work of the contractor. That is, the contractor "lets out" so much work to a sub-contractor to ensure the delivery of the goods within the given time. Several large clothing firms in Manchester hold Government contracts to supply Army uniforms, and they have engaged hundreds of sub-contractors to assist them.

These sub-contractors are inclined to grumble at the low figure fixed by the Government, a figure which compels them to work, in many instances, with practically no profit at all. The Government pay 19s. 6d. per suit and supply all materials, entering the cost of them against the contractors and deducting the same when making payment. It has been said that a contractor can make from 12 per cent to 15 per cent profit on the undertaking, so that working at top pressure he has nothing whatever to grumble at. It is only the work he finds it impossible to perform that he gives out to the smaller firms, and on that work he reckons to make 5 per cent profit. The important difference between the contractor and the small sub-contractor is that the former employes girls and uses machinery, while the latter must employ men and does not use machinery. Thus he finds his turnover adversely affected in two ways. He has to pay more for men's work than the contractor pays the girls, and with no machinery—or little enough not to count—he cannot turn out a sufficient number of suits to yield a substantial profit.

Girls are paid 2s. 3½d. per tunic—it usually takes three girls to make the garment—and 1s. is paid for the trousers. Thus the suit is made for 3s. 3½d., but several girls have to share this sum, and with a smaller number of suits turned out the profits of the sub-contractor are again lessened.

Recently there has been trouble in Leeds among the workers suggestions being made that sub-contractors endeavoured to make up some of the "lost" profits by paying smaller wages. A representative of the "Manchester Courier" inquired of a number of sub-contracting firms in Manchester whether there existed in the city any such grievance among the employees, and found that in this respect the employees were quite satisfied with the rates of pay, which were equal to those given by the contracting firms. This, of course, applies only to girl labour. There are a number of sub-contractors who do employ a number of girls, these firms being somewhat larger than those referred to where men are employed.

An employer in one of the smaller firms said the men had a very simple method of settling any difference they had with the masters—they refused to do the work. They are engaged to work at piece rates, and hence have the liberty to cease work when they choose. If the employer won't pay at their rates they won't do any work. And they have the advantage of knowing that with the employer it is a case of securing a little profit or getting none at all. They know that there is practically no other sort of trade for the tailoring firms except under Government contracts, and are thus placed in an independent position.

Our informant declared that such conditions were to be found in almost every small firm in the city. Hence the peculiar position has arisen that the employers have the grievance. It certainly is peculiar and unusual, and apparently will last as long as the Government base their contract rates on those of girl-labour.

On the other hand, if the rates are raised it will mean that the present good profits of the contractors will be made yet higher, and, as of the Exchequer's services will be required to one small employer remarked, the Chancellor extract the money from the citizens of the country in order to foot the bill.

January 20th. 1915.

LEEDS CLOTHING OPERATIVES' GRIEVANCES.

The conference between representatives of the Leeds branch of the Amalgamated Union of Clothiers Operatives and the Leeds Master Clothiers' Association was resumed at the Great Northern Hotel yesterday. As has been reported before, the matter under discussion is that of agreeing upon the payment of a flat rate of remuneration for the workers together with a standard rate for overtime. It had been expected that an amicable understanding would have been arrived at yesterday, but at the close of the sitting it was officially announced that the negotiations were still proceeding. Another meeting will be held to-morrow, and in the meantime the delegates on both sides will report to their respective organisations. The situation is considered to be hopeful.

Daily Express
11-1-17

658a/10

ARMY CLOTHING REFORMS.

URGENT QUESTIONS FOR LORD ROTHERMERE.

ILL-PAID WOMEN AND AN ARMY OF ALIENS.

Many important changes in methods have taken place in connection with the manufacture of Army clothing since Lord Rothermere accepted the task of cleansing what had evidently become a scandalous centre of grave irregularities.

Within three weeks of his appointment as Comptroller of the Royal Army Clothing Department at Pimlico, Lord Rothermere had so "sized up" the situation that he issued a stern warning to every one concerned that the practice of influencing the passing of goods by means of bribes or other influence must cease.

"Instances have come to my knowledge that irregularities are not infrequent," said Lord Rothermere, and he added: "This department will prosecute in every case that arises, and will seek to have the maximum penalty inflicted," and it must be remembered that under the law recently passed the maximum penalty is seven years' penal servitude.

The warning has had its effect. It has been followed by a substantial increase in the number of rejections (made-up garments that have not been up to contract standard), and the general result is that Tommy is better clothed.

CONTRACT CONTROL.

There is another side to the Army clothing question, however, regarding which we should like to ask Lord Rothermere certain questions:—

(1) Has Lord Rothermere received control not only of the receiving side of the business of Army clothing, but also of the letting out of the contracts?

In October attention was drawn in the House of Commons to the absurd lines on which the business of Army clothing was conducted. Colonel Ashley pointed out that the task of putting the department at Pimlico on a business footing was hopeless unless "some control of the actual giving of contracts goes with the power conferred." Mr. Lloyd George, in reply, admitted that there was point in Colonel Ashley's suggestion.

Has the suggestion been adoped? If it has not, why not?

(2) Is there any reason why so large a portion of the business of making Army clothing should be in alien hands?

There are, of course, many firms of alien origin who have been in the business for a decade or more, to whom no objection could possibly be taken, but on the other hand, there are literally hundreds of firms which the war has brought into being in which there are no British partners.

A curious fact in this connection is that practically every alien firm is full of work, and in many cases putting down fresh machinery in order to cope with War Office demands, while a number of old-established British firms have portions of their machinery idle. This leads to the third question.

(3) Is cheapness the only basis on which contracts are given out?

As pointed out above, there are good alien firms as well as bad alien firms. But there are alien firms who keep their pay roll as near to the Trade Board minimum as possible, and when this is done it is obvious that tenders submitted by them will be lower than tenders submitted by firms who pay higher rates.

STARVATION WAGES.

The Trade Board minimum for a woman worker is 3½d. an hour, and it is laid down that where piece rates are paid the rate must be such as to yield a minimum time rate of 3½d. per hour to average workers. This figure in a week of fifty hours produces only 14s. 7d.

We believe it is a fact that in many factories now engaged on "khaki" work the women workers are earning substantially more than 3½d. an hour. Has Lord Rothermere's department or any other department responsible for giving out contracts any record of the wages paid, and is the question of cheapness so insisted on that a premium is placed on the employer who rigidly sticks to the minimum?

(4) Has Lord Rothermere's department or any other department any record of the number of aliens of Allied nationality and well under the military age limit who are employed in making Army clothing?

One authority has stated to the "Daily Express" that the number is as large as 200,000. We do not pretend to vouch for the accuracy of the figure. We do suggest, however, that, whatever the number of these men, they should be put in the way of serving their country under arms.

An incident that came to the notice of the "Daily Express" illustrates the need for drastic action in this respect. A Russian who had publicly announced on various occasions that he had no intention of fighting for any country suddenly showed signs of conversion. He gave in his notice, stating that he had obtained a passport in order to return to his native country for the purpose of taking up military duty. His statement was regarded as so extraordinary, in view of his past utterances, that it was thought worthy of investigation.

ESCAPE FROM SERVICE.

It was then discovered that the man was one of some hundreds who had received passports to return to Russia via Norway. They reached Norway, a neutral country, but went no further. The determination shown in this country to make every able-bodied man take his part in the fighting had evidently caused them some perturbation, and they had taken this course to escape service.

These four questions are but samples of the many problems which Lord Rothermere may find worthy of investigation in connection with the manufacture of Army clothing. The "Daily Express" puts them forward in no spirit of carping criticism. We have too profound a realisation of the valuable work already achieved by Lord Rothermere in the Army Clothing Department.

Our desire is to see the same spirit of reform extended to every branch of the business. We want to see co-operation between the various authorities giving out the contracts, issuing the materials, and paying for the completed articles. We want to be assured that all women as well as men working on "khaki" are receiving a living wage, and we want to know that business methods, not "Army" methods, are the rule throughout the entire operations of the department.

Birmingham Post 658a
11-1-17

BIRMINGHAM AND DISTRICT TRADE.

ROLLING MILLS QUIETER.

BIRMINGHAM, Friday Evening.

The metal rolling mills are now working under less pressure than for a long time past. Government requirements are on a reduced scale, but this is probably only a passing fluctuation, due to war exigencies in other directions. Metal rolling for civil trade is, of course, forbidden. Operations are restricted to work which carries the A Certificate, or something approximating to it. Government contractors who use rolled metal find no difficulty in getting prompt deliveries against new orders, and this particularly applies to the lower grades of material. Productive capacity has, of course, been greatly increased since the war began, and if, as is supposed, the falling off of demand is due to temporary causes it will be possible materially to enlarge the output as soon as fresh requirements develop. It does not appear that any mills are idle or that there has been any reduction in the number of workpeople employed.

Co-operation in the Brass Trade.

An evolution is in process in some of the brass-foundries, though it has not as yet made very great progress. It points to brass no longer forming an essential part of certain important categories of munitions. This may explain the somewhat greater freedom with which metal is being released for work which does not come within the primary classification. From all over the country come demands for engine fittings of one kind and another, and although these things do not carry the A Certificate they are essential for maintaining our industrial equipment in full efficiency. A considerable amount of sanitary work also has to be undertaken. Brassfounders are fully occupied up to the limit of their man-power, as apart from the release of high quality metal there is plenty of scrap available of the descriptions which the civil trade largely relies upon. But the output has undergone an appreciable reduction, a considerable number of workmen having been claimed from uncontrolled firms during the past two months. Permits to export are issued only very sparingly, and the manufactures going into the ordinary channels of civil trade have shrunk to much smaller proportions.

An experiment which appears to promise a notable change in the economy of the brassfoundries is being made in some of the Birmingham factories. The practice has widely prevailed among manufacturers of distributing work at contract prices among charge hands, as they are called, leaving these men to find the necessary labour and to make their own terms with the under-hands they employ. The under-hands receive a stipulated wage, and the profits made on the contract go into the pockets of the charge-hand. The evil tendencies of this system have been recognised by the workers and their union as well as by the manufacturers. The experiment which is now being made is in the direction of co-operative contracting, so that all the workpeople employed on a job shall have a share in the profits realised. This, it is thought, should allay incipient discontent, and put a wholesome check upon shirking, inasmuch as each man in the scheme is interested in seeing that his fellow honestly shoulders his share of the work. In this way it should have an important effect upon output, an aspect of manufacturing industry upon which the war has focused attention very significantly. Many manufacturers now realise, as they did not before the present stress, what a vital factor a full output is in relation to the cheapening of production.

Dislocated Factory Operations.

There are still widespread complaints among manufacturers that War Office contracts are not co-ordinated with the means of production so as to ensure continuous running on manufactures which are wanted in almost unlimited quantities. Intervals are allowed to elapse between the contracts, and during that time the manufacturer, knowing nothing of future requirements, adapts his plant to other purposes or possibly disbands the workpeople he has employed on the old contract. It is as likely as not that as soon as he has done so he will receive a fresh requisition from the Department, which he can only comply with after a good deal of trouble and expense that proper organisation might have avoided. The seriousness of these dislocations has been recognised by the appointment of a special department in London to bring about a more efficient system. No doubt the difficulties are great. Certainly much more remains to be done before they can be overcome.

The outstanding question as to the employment of women in the flint-glass trade has been amicably settled as the result of a conference between Midland manufacturers and the trade union. When the union consented recently to the employment of women in the glass-cutting industry for the period of the war, the question of the wages to be paid to such women was reserved. A scale of payment agreeable to both sides has now been drawn up, the principle being that the new employes should be paid as learners at the outset and afterwards according to proficiency. Women are already being introduced. It is stated that there is a fairly good reservoir of labour to draw upon, the industry being one which appeals to the eye.

658a/11

658a.

The Common Cause. 24.9.15.

Girls' Work on Khaki.

When the storm burst over Europe in August sunshine, it found the working people in full enjoyment of their only general holiday. But the call came, and the crowds rushed home to bid good-bye to their dear ones, who were called upon to fight, to brace themselves for the burden that must be borne by those who are left behind. The angels are supposed to have assisted at the Battle of Mons, but I am inclined to think, since their sympathies are with the Allies, they must have been here during the early days of the war, when the nation, faced so suddenly with the task of raising, training, feeding, and clothing our Army of three million men rose to the occasion and, with one mind, heart, and purpose, determined, at all costs, to preserve our freedom, our country, and our national ideal from foreign domination. In this we were all united. The factory-girl feels this as keenly as the earl's daughter. It has been the inspiration of her actions, during all the long days of weary monotony, she has kept to her work. No charge has or could be brought against her for slacking. The women and girls in the clothing factories have done their bit right well. From November last to the present time they have worked in most factories from 8 a.m. to 8 p.m. In many others, special overtime has been allowed, and so great has been the girls' desire to work that had they not been protected by the Factory Acts' regulation of hours, and the strict attention to duty displayed by the factory inspectors, many would, carried away by their enthusiasm, have suffered in health.

Have the girls earned good wages?

There are, unfortunately, no available figures to show what the wages have been. The employers' figures are untrustworthy, as employers only quote the highest figures. The girls themselves, owing to their lack of organisation, which prevents any record of wages being kept, are not able to state what their earnings have averaged. We know that there has been a lack of uniformity in the payment of labour. It is known that the employers received a uniform price from the War Office. Why, then, in the absence of competition between employers, a uniform rate could not be paid for the same labour can only be put down to the unscrupulous desire of some to make more profit than others. Usually, a demand for higher wages meets the reply that unrestrained competition make it difficult for an employer to meet his workers' demands. Here, however, we have a clear case of employers all receiving the same payment yet not paying the same wages. Something can be put down to bad management in the factories. One man can organise his factory better than others. Girls are kept "waiting for work," an old grievance even when the trade is busy.

Organisation of workers would remedy many of the evils under which they suffer. Organisation of employers would promote better management of the factories. Speaking generally, I think it can be said that in Leeds, at any rate, the wages have averaged more on khaki than upon ordinary work. This is due to several causes. The strong incentive to work inspired by the knowledge that our troops needed clothing; the constant repetition of one kind of work, which, of itself, tends to increased speed; and the necessity which the girls recognised of working hard to earn more money to meet the increased cost of living, owing to very high war prices. The wage received by the girls during the khaki trade-boom may appear favourable when compared with ordinary trade, but the real wage, as representing its purchasing power, reduces the figure considerably. Also, there is a false idea which still persists in the industrial world. What is considered a poor wage for a man is considered a good wage for a woman. I deny that a woman requires less to support her than a man. The point of difference is that custom has decided against even her requirements, and she has been compelled to accept a much lower standard of life. All are agreed that a pound a week is a miserable pittance for a man with a family dependant upon him. Yet many deserted wives with children dependant upon them, widows, and daughters supporting parents, receive less.

The practice of over-charging for materials still exists in the clothing trade. The Truck Act does not go far enough in its protection of the workers. The Act provides that all sewings must be charged for at cost price. Now the employer provides the sewings, and the worker has no means of ascertaining what is the cost price. She cannot demand to see the invoice. Also, the girls buy the reels one by one, thus paying retail prices. Thus, incidentally, the girl contributes to another source of income to the employer. She is compelled to buy his goods at his price. I will quote a case to show the heavy charges made by a firm to a working-girl engaged on button-holing khaki tunics, working on piece-rates. Wage entered as earned in wage-book, £1 6s. 5½d. Deductions made for silk, for insurance 3d., hospital 1d.—1s. 2½d. Wage to draw leaving 12s. 3d. Another case in the same firm of a girl who earned £1 8s. 11d. left, after deductions for silk, &c., 13s. to draw—deduction for silk, 15s. 4d. There is a good deal of discussion in the Press at the present time on restricted output of labour, especially on war work.

There are two sides to every question, and, let me say at once, I am not in favour of limiting output, believing that the skilled workers should have the benefit of their superior skill. But every worker engaged on piece-work knows that if the worker shows any capacity to work hard, instead of having the benefit of their industry or superior skill, the occasion is used by the employer to reduce the piece-rates of the whole of the workers, even though only a few have earned what a section would consider a fair wage. There is a certain type of mind which cannot conceive or judge of any case on its just merits.

Let it also be noticed that it is only on the working-classes that a limit of wage is attempted. No one dares to put a limit on profit made in business. In commerce, huge profits are made daily. Its justice or injustice is never questioned. It is only when any section of workers seem to be a bit better off than others that the cry is made about large numbers who are not receiving a living wage. But nothing is done except by the workers themselves to raise wages. Their methods are often criticised, too often from a narrow standpoint, but the method adopted by employers of labour, owing no doubt to the fact that their critics are usually members of their own class, are dealt with much more leniently and are easily pardoned.

The working people of Great Britain, both men and women, are sound at heart. Slowly but surely they are recognising that knowledge and organisation are important factors in improving their own condition. They are gaining knowledge. They are organising industrially. They are determined to preserve their trade unions, and when the history of this great war is written trade unions, far from being attacked as they have been by people who never look below the surface to find the meaning of discontent, will be given an honoured place by historians as one of the forces by which the will of the people was expressed, their unanimous desire and determination to maintain not only our own freedom but also the freedom of the smaller nations.

A. HOLMES.

East London Observer
30-1-15. Whitechapel

658a/12 658a

Daily News & Leader
25-9-15

War Contracts in East London.

An Important Investigation

"The Toynbee Record" for January contains an interesting and important article by Mr. Eldred F. Hitchcock on the subject of "Military Tailoring in East London," a subject which is now claiming consideration. Mr. Hitchcock has made several valuable contributions to the subject of work and labour in East London, but this is probably the most important. We are permitted to make the following extracts:—On November 16th, in the House of Commons, Mr. Touche put a question to the War Office as follows: "If complaints have been received regarding the quality of clothing supplied to the new army; if clothing has been placed at prices which have constituted an incentive to scant material and sacrifice quality and to employ sweated labour; what steps have been taken to secure good materials and workmanship and for the payment of adequate wages?" Mr. Harold Baker, Financial Secretary to the War Office, replied in the following terms:—"No complaints have been received with regard to quality of clothing supplied by the War Department; all contracts contain the Fair Wages Clause, and any supposed case of its non-observance in the making-up of clothing has been referred to the Office of Trade Boards." The points raised in this question and answer are of considerable importance and interest to the people of East London, thousands of whom are employed in making Army clothing. It may, therefore, be useful to consider some

ASPECTS OF THE PROBLEM

which particularly affect East London. In normal times military clothing is made up at the Royal Army Clothing Department at Pimlico by direct labour, and by manufacturers (called "contractors") on the War Office list, in their own factories. The work requires special and skilled knowledge, and inspection is rigorous. If 3 per cent. of the work delivered were rejected by the Inspection Department of the War Office as not up to sample, it would be considered unsatisfactory. Conditions with reference to sub-contracting are very stringent. The prices obtained for the work enable employers to pay rates to their workers substantially above the minimum rate laid down by the Office of Trade Boards. Most of the work is done on piece rates, and the Tailoring Trade Board stipulates that the piece rates paid must yield a minimum time rate of 5½d. per hour to "average workers" (women), and 6d. per hour to "average workers" (men). Generalising, it is roughly correct to say that, other things being equal, men will earn in the tailoring trade on the same piece rates about one and a-half to twice the wage of a woman. It is a mistake to suppose that military clothing is rough, unskilled work. It requires considerable knowledge, and is better work than much that is normally produced in East London. At the beginning of the War the Contracts Department of the War Office was suddenly faced with the colossal task of placing contracts for millions of soldiers' outfits. Reckoning that an outfit on active service lasts about three months, and that 2,500,000 men have to be provided for, the number of uniforms required for twelve months is ten millions. With the assistance of certain members of the trade for immediate requirements was accomplished, and the clause referring to sub-contracting was relaxed. The firms competent to undertake the work could not, however, meet the growing demand, and shortages occurred in material. The latter difficulty was overcome by Yorkshire and other firms employing at least two-thirds of their productive powers on military work, and by semi-official arrangements for the supply of sufficient quantities of khaki dye. The former difficulty was solved by simplifying the design of military clothing, which enabled tailors of less experience in such work to undertake it. Some orders were also sent to America and Canada. It is obvious that in well organised factories accustomed to this class of work the cost of production is much less than in those factories normally employed for the most part in civilian work. Owing to the urgency with which the clothing was required, the prices given by the War Office in the early stages for similar work varied considerably. Later it was considered desirable to fix rates both for the material for the clothing

THE PLACING OF CONTRACTS

Bow Recruiting Meeting.

Stirring Speeches.

A public recruiting meeting was held on esday night at the Bow Baths Hall, orised by Mr. Harry F. Smith and Mr. E. Sedgwick. The Mayor of Poplar ouncillor A. H. Warren, J.P.) presided, the speakers were Mr. J. G. Butcher, C. (Conservative M.P. for York), Mr. nes Rowlands (Liberal M.P. for the tford Division of Kent), Mr. G. J. rdle (Labour M.P. for Stockport), and jor H. C. Hogg (recruiting officer). ers present were: The Mayoress of plar, Councillor R. J. Sambridge, Coun or M. Dalton, J.P., Mr. G. W. Robin Mr. J. W. Marriott, Mrs. Sedgwick, H. W. Cowl, Mr. Pearch, and many ers.

The Mayor, in opening the proceedings, d a good many of their friends would e been present that night, but they e serving their country elsewhere. The shown by the above figures, are in some cases (especially for the pressers) higher than in pre-War times. There is an increase of about 3d. on the wages bill for greatcoats, 4½d. in the case of jackets, and 11d. in the case of trousers. Wages on the rates quoted above would vary from about 16s. for girl finishers to about £3 to £10s. for men fitters and machiners for a 55-hour week. Many of them also earn overtime money. The Fair Wages Clause referred to in the reply of Mr. Harold Baker to Mr. Touche reads as follows:—"The contractor shall . . . pay rates of wages and observe hours of labour not less favourable than those commonly recognised by employers and trade societies, or, in the absence of such recognised wages and hours, those which in practice prevail amongst good employers in the trade, in the district where the work is carried out. Where there are no such wages and hours recognised or prevailing in the district, those recognised or prevailing in the nearest district in which the general industrial circumstances are similar shall be adopted. Further, the conditions of employment generally accepted in the district in the trade concerned shall be taken into account in considering how far the terms of

THE FAIR WAGES CLAUSE

are being observed. The contractor shall be prohibited from transferring or assigning, directly or indirectly, to any person or persons whatever, any portion of his contract without the written permission of the Department. Sub-letting, other than that which may be customary in the trade concerned, shall be prohibited. The contractor shall be responsible for the observance of the Fair Wages Clause by the sub-contractor." Owing to the great demand by the War Office for military clothing, much of the military clothing is now given out by contractors to sub-contractors, many of whom, though skilled men, have had little experience of this class of trade. They find it extremely difficult to decide on what piece-rates to pay, and their workers are still less able to do so. There are no "rates of wages commonly recognised by employers," and trade societies are conspicuous by their absence. There are no fixed "wages recognised or prevailing in the district" or "nearest district." The conditions are complex and the trade is unorganised. The War Office has fixed flat rates for the made-up garments. Is it too much to expect of it in future contracts to fix flat minimum rates which contractors shall pay to sub-contractors? Or cannot the War Office itself give out the work direct to associations of small employers (sub-contractors) and thus prevent large employers, who are already making considerable profits, from scooping further big profits by merely transferring orders? The profits which they make in their capacity of middlemen is out of all proportion to the service which they render to the nation. The excellent principle adopted by the London County Council in respect to its contracts for uniforms, by which the amount on each garment which must be paid in wages is definitely fixed by the Council, might also be adopted by the War Office in the case both of contractors and sub-contractors. There are no insuperable difficulties here. It is unnecessary that contractors should, by

ACTING AS MIDDLEMEN,

make large fortunes merely because they happen to find themselves in strategic points at a time of national crisis, and

ARMY CLOTHING PRECAUTIONS

"The Daily News" understands that within the past few weeks selected officials of the War Office have been making a round of inquiry in the factories and transformed dwelling houses in which the Government orders for khaki clothing are being completed.

These investigations, which have centred largely upon the East End of London, have been prompted by the desire to remove all possibility of infection.

In many cases the officials have assured themselves of the sanitary condition of such establishments, the number of residents, employees, etc., frequently suggesting alterations and improvements. Particularly in the case of the outworkers is such investigation urgently necessary.

There is still a shortage of skilled labour, so that contractors are, in most instances, glad to secure the help of home workers without too strict an inquiry into the hygienic conditions obtaining in their homes.

East London Observer
30-1-15 Whitechapel

658a/12 658a

Daily News & Leader
25-2-15

War Contracts in East London.

An Important Investigation

"The Toynbee Record" for January contains an interesting and important article by Mr. Eldred F. Hitchcock on the subject of "Military Tailoring in East London," a subject which is now claiming consideration. Mr. Hitchcock has made several valuable contributions to the subject of work and labour in East London, but this is probably the most important. We are permitted to make the following extracts:—On November 16th, in the House of Commons, Mr. Touche put a question to the War Office as follows: "If complaints have been received regarding the quality of clothing supplied to the new army; if clothing has been placed at prices which have constituted an incentive to scant material and sacrifice quality and to employ sweated labour; what steps have been taken to secure good materials and workmanship and for the payment of adequate wages?" Mr. Harold Baker, Financial Secretary to the War Office, replied in the following terms:—"No complaints have been received with regard to quality of clothing supplied by the War Department; all contracts contain the Fair Wages Clause, and any supposed case of its non-observance in the making-up of clothing has been referred to the Office of Trade Boards." The points raised in this question and answer are of considerable importance and interest to the people of East London, thousands of whom are employed in making Army clothing. It may, therefore, be useful to consider some

ASPECTS OF THE PROBLEM

which particularly affect East London. In normal times military clothing is made up at the Royal Army Clothing Department at Pimlico by direct labour, and by manufacturers (called "contractors") on the War Office list, in their own factories. The work requires special and skilled knowledge, and inspection is rigorous. If 3 per cent. of the work delivered were rejected by the Inspection Department of the War Office as not up to sample, it would be considered unsatisfactory. Conditions with reference to sub-contracting are very stringent. The prices obtained for the work enable employers to pay rates to their workers substantially above the minimum rate laid down by the Office of Trade Boards. Most of the work is done on piece rates, and the Tailoring Trade Board stipulates that the piece rates paid must yield a minimum time rate of 3½d. per hour to "average workers" (women), and 6d. per hour to "average workers" (men). Generalising, it is roughly correct to say that, other things being equal, men will earn in the tailoring trade on the same piece rates about one and a-half to twice the wage of a woman. It is a mistake to suppose that military clothing is rough, unskilled work. It requires considerable knowledge, and is better work than much that is normally produced in East London. At the beginning of the War the Contracts Department of the War Office was suddenly faced with the colossal task of placing contracts for millions of soldiers' outfits. Reckoning that an outfit on active service lasts about three months, and that 2,500,000 men have to be provided for, the number of uniforms required for twelve months is ten millions. With the assistance of certain members of the trade for immediate requirements was accomplished, and the clause referring to sub-contracting was relaxed. The firms competent to undertake the work could not, however, meet the growing demand, and shortages occurred in material. The latter difficulty was overcome by Yorkshire and other firms employing at least two-thirds of their productive powers on military work, and by semi-official arrangements for the supply of sufficient quantities of khaki dye. The former difficulty was solved by simplifying the design of military clothing, which enabled tailors of less experience in such work to undertake it. Some orders were also sent to America and Canada. It is obvious that in well organised factories accustomed to this class of work the cost of production is much less than in those factories normally employed for the most part in civilian work. Owing to the urgency with which the clothing was required, the prices given by the War Office in the early stages for the smaller emplo[illegible] the greater is this cost of pr[illegible]ntil one comes to a point where hand workers are quite unable to compete with machine work (e.g., to make the buttonholes in a military greatcoat by machine costs 2½d.; by hand it would cost 1s. 6d.). Here Mr. Hitchcock presents showing how the money paid by the War Office to contractors is distributed in the case of orders which are sub-contracted. This ascribes the following gross profit to the contractor per garment: Greatcoats, 7s. 1d.; jackets, 2s. 7½d.; trousers, 1s. 8½d. The sub-contractor is credited with the following gross profit per garment: Greatcoats, 11½d.; jackets, 7½d.; and trousers, 2½d. The comparative gross profits of the contractor and the sub-contractor, as shown by the above figures, need no comment. Besides working at a lower cost of production than the sub-contractor, the contractor is able to reap advantages in other ways. A good cutter often makes his own wages out of the surplus cloth in the pieces supplied, and thousands of pounds are obtained by many large firms for their odds and ends of cuttings, to be turned into shoddy cloth to dress less fortunate citizens. The rates of wages, as shown by the above figures, are in some cases (especially for the pressers) higher than in pre-War times. There is an increase of about 3d. on the wages bill for greatcoats, 4½d. in the case of jackets, and 11d. in the case of trousers. Wages on the rates quoted above would vary from about 16s. for girl finishers to about £3 to £10s. for men fitters and machiners for a 55-hour week. Many of them also earn overtime money. The Fair Wages Clause referred to in the reply of Mr. Harold Baker to Mr. Touche reads as follows:—"The contractor shall . . . pay rates of wages and observe hours of labour not less favourable than those commonly recognised by employers and trade societies, or, in the absence of such recognised wages and hours, those which in practice prevail amongst good employers in the trade, in the district where the work is carried out. Where there are no such wages and hours recognised or prevailing in the district, those recognised or prevailing in the nearest district in which the general industrial circumstances are similar shall be adopted. Further, the conditions of employment generally accepted in the district in the trade concerned shall be taken into account in considering how far the terms of

THE PLACING OF CONTRACTS

AN IMPORTANT [illegible]

THE FAIR WAGES CLAUSE

are being observed. The contractor shall be prohibited from transferring or assigning, directly or indirectly, to any person or persons whatever, any portion of his contract without the written permission of the Department. Sub-letting, other than that which may be customary in the trade concerned, shall be prohibited. The contractor shall be responsible for the observance of the Fair Wages Clause by the sub-contractor." Owing to the great demand by the War Office for military clothing, much of the military clothing is now given out by contractors to sub-contractors, many of whom, though skilled men, have had little experience of this class of trade. They find it extremely difficult to decide on what piece-rates to pay, and their workers are still less able to do so. There are no "rates of wages commonly recognised by employers," and trade societies are conspicuous by their absence. There are no fixed "wages recognised or prevailing in the district" or "nearest district." The conditions are complex and the trade is unorganised. The War Office has fixed flat rates for the made-up garments. Is it too much to expect of it in future contracts to fix flat minimum rates which contractors shall pay to sub-contractors? Or cannot the War Office itself give out the work direct to associations of small employers (sub-contractors) and thus prevent large employers, who are already making considerable profits, from scooping further big profits by merely transferring orders? The profits which they make in their capacity of middlemen is out of all proportion to the service which they render to the nation. The excellent principle adopted by the London County Council in respect to its contracts for uniforms, by which the amount on each garment which must be paid in wages is definitely fixed by the Council, might also be adopted by the War Office in the case both of contractors and sub-contractors. There are no insuperable difficulties here. It is unnecessary that contractors should, by

ACTING AS MIDDLEMEN,

[illegible] supply because they that "sweating" is not tak[illegible] place on other Government clothing [illegible] Eq[illegible] underpayment, mainly from [illegible]auses stated above, is almost universal. The last sentence of the Fair Wages Clause says that "The contractor shall be responsible for the observa[illegible] of the Fair Wages Clause by [illegible]ub-contractor." Mr. Baker would [illegible] "s[illegible]pposed infringement" of this [illegible] of the clause to the Office of Trade Boards. But the Office of Trade Boards is unable, owing to the inadequate nature of the Trade Boards Act, to deal with such a matter. It is also unable to deal with the underpayment. It can only deal with "sweating," and then only by prosecuting the small employer for the sins of the contractor. The War Office is now obtaining the clothing that it requires in sufficient quantity and at a satisfactory rate, and very soon, when more material is forthcoming, it will be placing fresh clothing orders. It has done so excellently in other directions that it can no doubt be relied upon to deal with the difficulties indicated above. If it is felt undesirable that the War Office, with its present responsibilities, should deal with the problem, the Office of Trade Boards might be given more adequate powers, and the whole matter be delegated to it."

khaki dye. The former difficulty was solved by simplifying the design of military clothing, which enabled tailors of less experience in such work to undertake it. Some orders were also sent to America and Canada. It is obvious that in well organised factories accustomed to this class of work the cost of production is much less than in those factories normally employed for the most part in civilian work. Owing to the urgency with which the clothing was required, the prices given by the War Office in the early stages for similar work varied considerably. Later it was considered desirable to fix rates both for the material for the clothing (which is issued to the contractors by the War Office) and for the made-up garments. The prices fixed for the made-up garments are as follows, and are in advance of the prices of normal times:—Greatcoats (drab mixture, dismounted), 28s. each; jackets (service dress), 12s. 6d. each; trousers (service dress), 8s. 9d. per pair; riding breeches (service dress), 18s. 6d. per pair. A contractor obtains an order for quantities of these garments. The material (including all fittings and trimmings) is supplied to him at certain rates by the War Office. He has, however, to purchase "sewing," i.e., silk and thread. He first of all has the cloth "cut" into pattern by means of a power band-knife machines, and it then passes through the hands of about eight workers, who, for the most part, work on

POWER MACHINERY.

Part of the order is often, however, not done in the factory, but is given out, after the cloth has been "cut," to smaller employers, called "sub-contractors." They are generally without the up-to-date machinery found in the larger factories, and few of them can afford to instal power in their workshops. [In one case, which has come under the writer's notice, an East London clothing sub-contractor of considerable experience and foresight installed in his workshop, on the outbreak of War, forty electric-power machines. He has, however, so far been unable to obtain any orders direct from the War Office or to get on to the War Office list; but has still to depend upon the comparatively low-paid orders from contractors. This is no encouragement to progressive small employers of East London.] They work hard themselves, and in many cases have a considerable experience of the trade. They employ both "indoor" and "outdoor" workers. Owing to their lack of capital and up-to-date and power machinery, and to the number of inferior workers they employ, their cost of production is higher than that of the contractor who first obtained the contract. Their expenses of production—maintenance charges, supervision, etc.—are, however, probably lower, and as they superintend their own workshops the "leakage" which takes place in every large factory is in their case almost negligible. [From the annual accounts of the Royal Army Clothing Factory for the year 1913-1914, it can be calculated that expenses of production as apart from cost of production, are about 25 per cent. of the whole expenditure. This is higher than in an ordinary factory, where the item varies from 12 per cent. to 20 per cent. Where orders are merely given out to sub-contractors after the cloth is "cut," this item is about one-half of the expenses where the work is done direct.] As a general rule, that on. The excellent principle adopted by the London County Council in respect to its contracts for uniforms, by which the amount on each garment which must be paid in wages is definitely fixed by the Council, might also be adopted by the War Office in the case both of contractors and sub-contractors. There are no insuperable difficulties here. It is unnecessary that contractors should, by

ACTING AS MIDDLEMEN,

make large fortunes merely because they happen to find themselves in strategic points at a time of national crisis, and because the War Office has little knowledge of the technicalities of the tailoring trade. Contractors should be compelled to pay more to their workers and to their sub-contractors, and the sub-contractors should, in their turn, be enabled and compelled to pay more to their workers. If the Government is paying too much on some garments, it is an easy matter to reduce the rates on future contracts. It is improbable that the conditions of labour in the lower grades of the tailoring trade can ever be satisfactory unless machinery is introduced throughout the trade. Apart from high prices, considerable profits must of necessity be made by the tailoring trade during this year, because of the large quantities of clothing required by the War Office. It is of paramount importance to the workers in the trade as a whole that this abnormal profit should be shared by the smaller employers, as well as by the contractors. The majority of small employers realise their position, and are only too anxious to introduce machinery and other improvements. Those who are receiving orders from contractors for army clothing are the more experienced and intelligent, and extra profits which they make now will largely be put into their businesses. The contractors can well afford to give better prices to sub-contractors, and in the interests of good wages and good industrial conditions, they should be compelled to do so. The small employer with no capital must either be eliminated or put in such a position as enables him to rid himself of his disabilities. Now is the opportunity to effect the latter in the case of the more efficient small employer. The pressure of a revised Trade Boards Act will be able largely to accomplish the former. If fixing of further flat rates is considered impossible, might not the War Office give out contracts direct to associations of sub-contractors working on a co-operative basis? Facilities, such as guaranteeing inspection of orders and remittance of cheques in payment within a stated period after delivery might have to be granted by the War Office, but the end achieved would be immeasurably greater than the extra trouble and with such orders. In this connexion it might further be suggested that the "cutting" of the cloth might be undertaken by the Royal Army Clothing Department before being passed on to small employers to be made up, a fixed charge being made by the War Office for this service. As far as East London is concerned, it is true to say that sweating (within the meaning of the Trade Boards Act) on military uniforms is not taking place. [This statement refers only to the khaki clothing dealt with in this article. It should not be assumed

PROMPTITUDE NECESSARY

The Common Cause,
May 21st. 1915.

Army Clothing Contracts.

WOMEN WORKERS AND THE EVILS OF SUB-CONTRACTING.

Far from being a "travesty of the case," as Mr. Hitchcock suggests, my article in THE COMMON CAUSE of April 23rd is extremely mild in comparison with the deplorable evils I was trying to point out. Indeed, when I saw it in print, I could not help wondering what those poor wretches in the social Hades of the North—the women whom I saw at work—would have thought about it if they had read the article. Since writing, I have seen and heard something of the abominable conditions in the East End of London, and am now left wondering with whatever motive, or with whatever object, the trifling criticisms were brought against me.

My article was no mere journalistic flash in the pan; I was under the same difficulty as Mr. Hitchcock confesses—that of trying to get a deal of intricate matter into small space. Hence, my charges were mostly of a general character. That was their weakness; because if all the grim details underlying them had to be filled in, one would have to dip one's pen in tears—if not in blood. The pictorial conception of "Our Huns at Home" in the cartoon in THE COMMON CAUSE was right.

I know that there are good contractors and good sub-contractors—or sub-contractors as good, perhaps, as they can afford to be, and that they do not all possess the same economic means of production. But I know, too, that some will never provide the best and latest means of production so long as they can exploit the human machine. I know that some workers have been paid better on khaki suit making than on ordinary tailoring work, but where better wages have been obtained it has been largely as a result of trade union representation, and threats. In some factories, on the other hand, rates have been paid which were less in value than those scheduled in the Trade Boards Act. No doubt, inspectors under the Act have done their best to rectify this infringement; and, no doubt, trade union officials have done their best to pull up wages. But during the khaki trade fever, there was not the time to do all that might have been done, and to discover all the places and circumstances in which khaki clothing was being made.

The facts I gave about sweating were only part of those in my possession. But what may be obviously called sweating is proved by the Women's Exhibition held in London, and referred to in the current issue of THE COMMON CAUSE. Sweating is indicated in the letter and article in which I am attacked. The main contention against me is that I was too severe upon the sub-contractor, and the sub-sub-sub-contractor. I care not whether the sub-contractor is, in cases, wronged by the principal contractor; I was writing against the system of sub-contracting—a system wherein the most regrettable burdens and injustices are heaped upon the shamefully exploited woman home-worker. I want to see the system of parasitical profit makers who feed upon her, and who keep her in a state of economic bondage, abolished. It is wrong from bottom to top; and it is a form of commercial robbery which forms a menace to the race of industrial children born of the thousands of poor women workers, and reared in their miserable dens. I once lived in one of these dens, by necessity, and its awfulness made an impression upon me which I shall never forget.

The commercial system continues to increase the number of men and women whose usefulness is insignificant, but who pluck the honest manufacturer and the real worker, to say nothing of plucking one another. These men and women are usually the most rampant where the productions of women workers are concerned. What I wanted to convey in my article was that these men and women were permitted to act in a most indiscriminate and irregular manner in connection with khaki sub-contracts. It was a pity that it was permitted; and the few facts with which I supported this contention were typical of other facts that could have been cited.

The charge made against me that the Government did not supply sewings (and, therefore, the poor woman worker who had to pay for thread was not robbed) is partly right and partly wrong; but if a sub-contractor extracts sixpence for thread from a home worker for eighteenpenny worth of work, what in heaven's name can you call it but "robbery"? I am told that in the case I cited, the sub-contractor had to buy his own thread; but I'll warrant that he did not pay more than twopence for that for which he charged the woman slave sixpence. It is about the basest form of robbery that one could think of. What has a great nation to say about circumstances in which a sweated woman is made to pay for thread used in the making of a warrior's uniform?

The Government has now put a stop to sub-contracting in regard to soldiers' clothing, and I am glad of that, but sorry to learn that the veto of the Government is being evaded by sub-contractors being appointed as "managers" for principal contractors. The change is only in name and not in method of work. I have a letter now from a contractor who has refused a Government contract, because when it reached him it had already passed through two or three hands, or agents, who had not put a stroke of practical work into it, but had squeezed down to such

658a/13 658a.

Yorkshire Evening Post, 6.2.15

THE CLOTHING TRADE DISPUTE.

THREATENED STOPPAGE OF KHAKI WORK.

UNIFORMS THAT ARE NEEDED FOR THE TROOPS.

EXPERT GIRL'S EARNINGS OF £2 10S.

To-day brought no relief to the critical situation which has been created in the Leeds wholesale clothing trade by the demands of the workers for a flat rate of payment for khaki work. As was recorded yesterday, the negotiations between the masters and the operatives' union officials have been suspended, and as neither side at present appears to feel justified in reopening them the question arises "From whom will the next move come?"

It is safe to say that the War Office would take a serious view of any interference with the provision of clothing for our soldiers. Equipment of this sort is just as urgently needed as rifles or other armament, and a strike that would interfere with the supply of uniforms is not likely, one would think, to be tolerated for long.

The Director of Army Contracts has already asked for a statement of the alleged grievances, but he has not been furnished with it. The employers state they are not in a position to supply the information, as the union officials have so far not put any of the alleged grievances into writing. On the other hand, Mr. H. E. Withy, the secretary of the Leeds branch of the operatives' union, says he has had no direct request from the War Office, all he has received being a copy of a letter sent to the Masters' Association, and forwarded to him by their secretary, Mr. R. Hilditch. He and his colleagues appear disinclined to recognise a request received in this way, and they maintain that as yet there is no claim upon them to furnish the Government with specific grievances.

POSITION OF CONCILIATION BOARD.

The union officials allege that the masters broke off the negotiations by not adhering to the arrangement by which a small committee representing the two sides should visit certain factories to investigate the dissatisfaction. Instead of this the masters suggested that a more satisfactory way would be to have the complaints dealt with by the Conciliation Board, which exists to deal with such matters. From conversations a representative of "The Yorkshire Evening Post" had to-day with one or two employers it would appear that the members who were to visit these firms had no idea what they were to investigate, no specific grievances having been put into writing, and, moreover, they would have had no power to act. The Association felt that in the Conciliation Board they had all the machinery set up for the purpose.

The workers' representatives, however, seem to fight shy of this Conciliation Board. Mr. Withey said to-day, "We absolutely decline to go to the Conciliation Board on flat rates of pay for khaki, for the simple reason that when the agreement under which the Board is set up, was arrived at, namely, in August, 1913, such work as this was not anticipated. Complaints made by us to the Board have been 'hung up' for three months; and I may say the Board has never had a case of complaint from the masters' side yet."

THE EMPLOYERS' POSITION.

The employers, whilst not admitting the other side's grievance about the delay in dealing with cases, are not unaware of the allegation, and to remove any doubt as to the way this matter would be dealt with by the Conciliation Board, the full Association the other day passed a special resolution pledging themselves to expedite any negotiations in which the Board and the union officials might take part.

In the statement issued on behalf of the masters to-day it is pointed out that the conditions of labour vary considerably, there being a great difference between the small place with a few sewing machines and the highly-organised and specialised firm with a modern equipment. Against this, Mr. Withey asked to-day if it is fair that the girl operative should suffer on this account. "It is not our fault," he added, "if some firms prefer to run their concerns on old-fashioned lines." He went on to say that for the simplest tunic and trousers the employers were making a reasonable profit, but it should not be forgotten, he said, that their expenditure is nothing like what it is on ordinary work. He asked: "Where are their travellers' expenses and bad debts, and what about their receiving prompt payments?"

Mr. Withey also commented upon the statement made on behalf of the masters that some girls are earning forty shillings a week and more. He said he but where better wages have been obtained it has been largely as a result of trade union representation, and threats. In some factories, on the other hand, rates have been paid which were less in value than those scheduled in the Trade Boards Act. No doubt, inspectors under the Act have done their best to rectify this infringement; and, no doubt, trade union officials have done their best to pull up wages. But during the khaki trade fever, there was not the time to do all that might have been done, and to discover all the places and circumstances in which khaki clothing was being made.

The facts I gave about sweating were only part of those in my possession. But what may be obviously called sweating is proved by the Women's Exhibition held in London, and referred to in the current issue of THE COMMON CAUSE. Sweating is indicated in the letter and article in which I am attacked. The main contention against me is that I was too severe upon the sub-contractor, and the sub-sub-sub-contractor. I care not whether the sub-contractor is, in cases, wronged by the principal contractor; I was writing against the system of sub-contracting—a system wherein the most regrettable burdens and injustices are heaped upon the shamefully exploited woman home-worker. I want to see the system of parasitical profit makers who feed upon her, and who keep her in a state of economic bondage, abolished. It is wrong from bottom to top; and it is a form of commercial robbery which forms a menace to the race of industrial children born of the thousands of poor women workers, and reared in their miserable dens. I once lived in one of these dens, by necessity, and its awfulness made an impression upon me which I shall never forget.

The commercial system continues to increase the number of men and women whose usefulness is insignificant, but who pluck the honest manufacturer and the real worker, to say nothing of plucking one another. These men and women are usually the most rampant where the productions of women workers are concerned. What I wanted to convey in my article was that these men and women were permitted to act in a most indiscriminate and irregular manner in connection with khaki sub-contracts. It was a pity that it was permitted; and the few facts with which I supported this contention were typical of other facts that could have been cited.

The charge made against me that the Government did not supply sewings (and, therefore, the poor woman worker who had to pay for thread was not robbed) is partly right and partly wrong; but if a sub-contractor extracts sixpence for thread from a home worker for eighteenpenny worth of work, what in heaven's name can you call it but "robbery"? I am told that in the case I cited, the sub-contractor had to buy his own thread; but I'll warrant that he did not pay more than twopence for that for which he charged the woman slave sixpence. It is about the basest form of robbery that one could think of. What has a great nation to say about circumstances in which a sweated woman is made to pay for thread used in the making of a warrior's uniform?

The Government has now put a stop to sub-contracting in regard to soldiers' clothing, and I am glad of that, but sorry to learn that the veto of the Government is being evaded by sub-contractors being appointed as "managers" for principal contractors. The change is only in name and not in method of work. I have a letter now from a contractor who has refused a Government contract, because when it reached him it had already passed through two or three hands, or agents, who had not put a stroke of practical work into it, but had squeezed from it such profits as now prevent my acquaintance paying decent wages to his female operatives. Hence, he will have none of it. But somebody else will. It is time this kind of business was stopped; and the people to try to stop it are the women of the nation.

After this general charge, I will not enter the divided, sub-divided, and technical details of the clothiers' trade. Mr. Hitchcock's figures I accept, in a way. But I know that when you put such tables of figures before the workers, and calculate their earnings therefrom, they laugh at you. Knowing this, and having experienced it, I went among the workers to get my facts about real earnings. These facts were right; and the system of sub-contracting, with its wheels within wheels of commercial trick riding—called business, was mainly responsible for it!

JAMES HASLAM.

just as urgently needed as rifles or other armament, and a strike that would interfere with the supply of uniforms is not likely, one would think, to be tolerated for long.

The Director of Army Contracts has already asked for a statement of the alleged grievances, but he has not been furnished with it. The employers state they are not in a position to supply the information, as the union officials have so far not put any of the alleged grievances into writing. On the other hand, Mr. H. E. Withy, the secretary of the Leeds branch of the operatives' union, says he has had no direct request from the War Office, till he has received being a copy of a letter sent to the Masters' Association, and forwarded to him by their secretary, Mr. R. Hilditch. He and his colleagues appear disinclined to recognise a request received in this way, and they maintain that as yet there is no claim upon them to furnish the Government with specific grievances.

POSITION OF CONCILIATION BOARD.

The union officials allege that the masters broke off the negotiations by not adhering to the arrangement by which a small committee representing the two sides should visit certain factories to investigate the dissatisfaction. Instead of this the masters suggested that a more satisfactory way would be to have the complaints dealt with by the Conciliation Board, which exists to deal with such matters. From conversations a representative of "The Yorkshire Evening Post" had to-day with one or two employers it would appear that the members who were to visit these firms had no idea what they were to investigate, no specific grievances having been put into writing, and, moreover, they would have had no power to act. The Association felt that in the Conciliation Board they had all the machinery set up for the purpose.

The workers' representatives, however, seem to fight shy of this Conciliation Board. Mr. Withey said to-day, "We absolutely decline to go to the Conciliation Board on flat rates of pay for khaki, for the simple reason that when the agreement under which the Board is set up, was arrived at, namely, in August, 1913, such work as this was not anticipated. Complaints made by us to the Board have been 'hung up' for three months; and I may say the Board has never had a case of complaint from the masters' side yet."

THE EMPLOYERS' POSITION.

The employers, whilst not admitting the other side's grievance about the delay in dealing with cases, are not unaware of the allegation, and to remove any doubt as to the way this matter would be dealt with by the Conciliation Board, the full Association the other day passed a special resolution pledging themselves to expedite any negotiations in which the Board and the union officials might take part.

In the statement issued on behalf of the masters to-day it is pointed out that the conditions of labour vary considerably, there being a great difference between the small place with a few sewing machines and the highly-organised and specialised firm with a modern equipment. Against this, Mr. Withey asked to-day if it is fair that the girl operative should suffer on this account. "It is not our fault," he added, "if some firms prefer to run their concerns on old-fashioned lines." He went on to say that for the simplified tunic and trousers the employers were making a reasonable profit, but it should not be forgotten, he said, that their expenditure is nothing like what it is on ordinary work. He asked: "Where are their travellers' expenses and bad debts, and what about their receiving prompt payment?"

Mr. Withey also commented upon the statement made on behalf of the masters that some girls are earning forty shillings a week and more. He said he could give many instances where girls are earning only 13s. for the same class of work.

GIRL WHO CAN EARN £2 10S.

Two or three employers who were asked by our representative if this great difference were possible, said frankly that some girls were only earning about 13s., but they hastened to point out that these were learners. One master produced figures in support of his statement, and in every case where the earnings ranged about 13s., it was found that the girl was a learner. Wages of £1 5s., £1 10s., and £2, were quite common, and in one case, the young woman—admittedly an expert hand—took home £2 5s. last week, and over £2 10s. yesterday.

The operatives are to hold a mass meeting in the Town Hall on Monday night, when a proposal to take a ballot on the question of calling a strike will be brought forward. If this step is decided upon, the ballot will probably be taken on Tuesday. A two-thirds majority is necessary before a strike can be declared.

The number of operatives in the city is estimated at 36,000, of whom 6,000 are in the union. If a strike is declared it is unlikely that the whole of the girls will leave work. Those who are satisfied with their earnings are a considerable number, and it is understood that steps will be taken to protect them from molestation if they desire to continue at work.

The Yorkshire Observer 30/6/15.

GREENWOOD & BATLEY, LEEDS.

CHANGES DUE TO GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS.

The annual meeting of Messrs. Greenwood and Batley was held yesterday in London, Colonel O. C. Armstrong, chairman of directors, presiding.

The Chairman, in moving the adoption of the report, referred to the influence which the abnormal conditions arising out of the war had had on the working of the company during the period under review. The main and legitimate business of the company had hitherto been confined to that of engineers and machine makers, the manufacture of small arms ammunition having been carried on on a very small scale. Shortly after the outbreak of war the directors were pressed by the Government to devote greater attention to the production of small arms ammunition and to the machine-making and engineering side, to supply a considerable amount of plant required by the Government or other firms holding Government contracts. As time went on the Government demands steadily increased, until at the present moment every suitable machine and every available man was employed on machines and tools directly or indirectly for Government work. The hitherto small ammunition factory had grown into a big one, and the directors hoped, in the interests of the Army in the field, that the output would shortly be one thousand per cent. greater than the average output before the war.

The directors found themselves forced into the position of having entirely to abandon their ordinary business, and to refuse all invitations to quote for machines, &c., required by firms unconnected with Government work; in fact, temporarily to sever the connection on which they had hitherto relied during many years past to keep the works employed. The directors gladly and readily undertook those responsibilities, as they fully recognised that in the crisis through which the country was passing it was the duty of all such firms unhesitatingly to comply with the slightest expressed wish of the Government. At the same time there was no doubt that this obligatory diversion of their trade from one channel to another would affect their legitimate business more or less prejudicially at the conclusion of hostilities.

There was a further point to which he directed attention. Although the company only in a very partial degree—and this at the direct instance of the Government—fell under the classification of "munition makers," yet under proposed legislation they might find themselves in part placed under distinct and serious disabilities. It was impossible to forecast the bearing of the Munitions Bill on the company. While the powers given to the Minister of Munitions were drastic, his discretionary powers were proportionately wide, admitting of exceptions, partial exemption, or special consideration being given to individual cases. They could only hope and trust that these powers would be exercised in such a manner as to ensure that no unfair burdens or restrictions were placed on companies in their position.

Following an analysis of the balance-sheet, which he stated showed the financial position of the company to be now a very strong one indeed, the Chairman said it would serve no useful purpose to enter into details of the work being done in the several departments. The orders on hand were likely to keep them all fully employed for a considerable time.

TRIBUTE TO THE WORKPEOPLE.

Proceeding, the Chairman remarked that far too much had been said and written, resulting in vague generalisations, about the prevalence of drink and slackness among the skilled workmen employed in workshops engaged on Government work. It was with great pleasure, therefore, that he was able to record, on behalf of the directors of the company, that, so far as their experience was concerned, drunkenness or absence from work traceable to drink had been non-existent. On the contrary, their experience had been that the time-sheets showed an exceptional regularity in attendance. The desire of the men to do their utmost had been most marked. Similarly, the girls employed in the ammunition factories had shown an extraordinary keenness and anxiety to increase the output, zeal which could only be attributed to a loyal recognition of the importance of the work they were doing. In conclusion, the chairman moved that the report and accounts be adopted, and that a dividend of 7 per cent. on the preference shares and of 12½ per cent. on the ordinary shares be declared.

Mr. Sidney Townend Batley seconded the motion, which was carried.

Mr. Henry Greenwood was re-elected a director, and Messrs. W. B. Peat & Co. were re-appointed auditors.

General Micklem proposed a vote of thanks to the chairman, directors, and the staff. He made special reference to the workpeople at Leeds, who, he said, deserved the company's best thanks for their regularity and devotion to duty. He also proposed that a special bonus of £250 should be granted to the chairman in recognition of the services he had rendered during the war period.

Mr. Armytage Batley seconded, and the proposals were carried.

At an extraordinary general meeting of the company which followed, on the motion of the chairman, a resolution was adopted altering the articles of association so as to give the directors power to appoint any employee of the company to be a special director.

Yorkshire Evening Post. 16.2.15 658 a.

MORE TROUBLE IN THE LEEDS KHAKI TRADE.

658a/14

DISSATISFIED GIRLS LEAVE WORK.

To the Editor of The Yorkshire Evening Post.

Sir,—Much has appeared in the papers during the past few weeks about the high wages earned at present by the woman workers in the Leeds clothing trade. One tale holds good until another is told. The newspapers have quoted wages such as £2 and £3 10s., but as a matter of fact, in one particular factory, one girl alone has had the honour of drawing £3 10s. once. This particular employer both thought and said, "That this was not a woman's wage, but a man's." He forgot that a woman has to pay the same prices as a man for all she requires.

The result of this one decent wage has been a penny reduction on one part of the tunic, and a farthing advance on another. Half an hour after the girls in the "Special" department of this factory were acquainted with the news notices were handed in to leave the factory when the work in hand was finished. Although much pressure has been exercised, and a halfpenny advance offered as an inducement to stay, a large majority have remained firm and determined not to go back to that factory on any consideration.

This has been done quite unofficially, and why have we done it? We know perfectly well that every employer has the same amount of money for the work to enable him to pay a reasonable price, and as workers, we do not intend to undercut our fellows by working under price. The wages earned in this department have ranged as low as 10s. 6d., and only one has managed to reach £3., the average being about 24s. What would they be with a penny per cent. reduction?

The employers are preparing for the slump when peace is declared by making good profits, and the employees should also be allowed to prepare by making good wages.—Yours, etc.,

Clara Adams, Maria Blades, Dorothy Merchant, Emily Merchant, Edith Fawcett, Laura Wallace, Esther Morrell, Sarah Farrar, Elsie Smith, and Annie Farrar (former hands in the "Special" Department).

Drapers Record. 6.2.15

Manufacturers' Happy Position.

Aided by substantial Government orders, some manufacturers are in the position of accepting or refusing further orders. It is noteworthy that trades unions have relaxed many of their regulations, and in addition the Factory Act regulations have become more elastic. Accordingly many manufacturers are now enabled to produce with a speed hitherto impossible. Indeed, records as to production are being broken almost every week.

Fortunately Scotch factory owners had kept up their equipment to a high pitch, and hence they are in a position to reap the benefit of the pressure placed on their capacity. At the same time, I still hear many complaints of the poor working margin obtained on Government orders.

Glasgow Herald 9/4/15.

ARMY CLOTHING.

SUB-CONTRACTING STOPPED

GLASGOW FIRMS SERIOUSLY AFFECTED.

A somewhat serious situation has been created in the clothing trade in Glasgow owing to the Government having put a stop to sub-contracting in the making of Army clothing. A considerable amount of khaki clothing has been made in the city, and up till last week the firms who had the contracts spread a portion of the work among a number of smaller firms. The authorities are now stipulating that all work contracted for must be carried out on the premises of the firms who undertake the contracts. The new condition has come as a surprise to the trade.

In the earlier stages of the war there was an abnormal demand for khaki garments, and steps were taken by the authorities to utilise to the fullest extent the existing facilities for meeting the requirements. At that time two classes of work were being undertaken, and in the trade they were known as "emergency" and "simplified." It was the urgent need for "emergency" uniforms that was responsible for the increased output by the Glasgow firms. So great was the demand that the larger houses had not the facilities for turning out the completed articles at the speed required, and in consequence resort was made to the expedient of sub-contracting. It is stated that the authorities were quite cognisant of this arrangement, and no exception was taken to it. When new schedules were issued recently covering the period to the end of June there was sent to each contractor whose tender was accepted a telegram stipulating that all the garments must be made on his own premises. The contractor was also requested to telegraph his acceptance of the condition. The smaller firms were by this means deprived of work which they expected would have kept them fully employed for several months. Another serious aspect of the matter is that in order to undertake as much sub-contracted work as possible these smaller firms had taken extended premises and had introduced expensive machinery. With the military work cut off the machinery will not be required, and the cost of it and the rent of the new premises will mean a serious loss to them. The larger firms will also be inconvenienced by the new condition, though in their case the position is not so serious. They will be unable to accept as large contracts as they have carried out with the assistance of the smaller firms. It is also pointed out that some of them in fulfiling their military contracts have taxed their resources so fully that they have to a certain extent neglected their civilian trade, which may not be readily recovered later on. The smaller firms deprived of their military work, will no doubt be able to pick up some of the civilian trade, but the extent of it will be small and will be practically no set-off against their heavy loss.

A MILLION UNIFORMS FROM AMERICA.

Several factors seem to have influenced the War Office authorities in their decision to abolish the sub-contractor. In the first place it is well known in the trade that the demand for Army uniforms is not nearly so great as it was some months ago, when the problem of clothing the New Army was being faced. Combined with the reduced requirements is the fact that a large order placed in America is coming to hand. It is the talk of the trade at present that fully a million suits are provided for in the American contract. The common objection taken to sub-contracting—namely, the lack of satisfactory supervision of the conditions under which the work is being executed—is also said to have had some weight. The centralisation of the work will also prevent any possibility of sweating, though it is stated that in Glasgow that aspect does not enter into the question. A member of one of the largest firms working on Army contracts states that there was practically no sweating in the [illegible] and that sub-contracting could be continued without any fear of such a thing taking place. Among the smaller firms whose principal business has been taken away are many Jewish firms who were working under sub-contracts. The situation, as already stated, is serious for all the small firms, and the prospect of retaining a portion of Army work for them is not very promising. There is, however, still a feeling that something in this direction may be done either through a combination of firms or in some other way. About six weeks ago a deputation from the wholesale clothing manufacturers in Glasgow had an interview at the War Office with the Director of Contracts, when they submitted to the authorities a scheme which provided that a contract for the majority of the firms in Scotland should be given to four large firms, who would be responsible for the working of the contract, and that the smaller firms would get the full price, less 2½ per cent. for working expenses. The scheme was favourably received, but after consideration the War Office decided that they could not adopt it. A representative meeting of the trade was held in Glasgow recently, when the abolition of sub-contracting was under discussion. Representatives were present from contractors, sub-contractors, master tailors, and workers, but no definite decision was come to. Probably another [illegible]

Medical Officer 27-2-16. 658a 658a/15

Notes of the Week.

Outworkers and Army Clothing.

THE Home Office has drawn the attention of local authorities to the great importance at the present time of enforcing strictly the provisions of the Factory Acts as to home work in connection with the manufacture of clothing for the army. It is pointed out that on account of the enormous quantity of work being given to outworkers it becomes more than ever necessary, in view of the possible danger of infection to the troops, that great care should be taken to see that the work is not done in premises where there is infectious disease. The official communication informs local authorities that they possess full powers under the Factory Acts to prevent work being done in any house where there is infectious disease, and the Secretary of State trusts that, if they have not already done so, they will arrange for close and special attention to be paid by their officers to premises where Army clothing is being made.

John Bull. 22. 4. 16.

658 A. 658a/16

"Breeches."

The tailoress who told us that Government pays 25s. a pair for khaki breeches which cost the contractor only 3s. 6d. to make must correct her figures, for she has been misinformed. The price paid is 15s., and the cost of materials, which must be purchased from the R.A.C. Department, is 12s. 11d. Waste cuttings valued at 4d. reduce the figures to 12s. 7d., and this leaves a sum of 2s. 5d. to cover the pay of cutters, machinists, finishers and other workpeople, rent, rates, light, heat, insurance, cartage, etc., etc. After these payments are made—all that is left over is profit! We may add that the figures quoted above are verified from an official schedule of prices, and they prove that the breeches-maker, at all events, is not robbing the public

Manchester Guardian. 12. 2. 16.

ARMY CONTRACTS.—"Contractor" writes:—Contractors do not usually pay attention to the statements of outsiders as to the prices paid for the making up of garments. Such prices are usually for a section or part of the garment, and the public are led to believe the price is for the completed garment. But we must protest against the time of our worthy Lord Mayor being taken up in listening to such misstatements as those made by Mrs. Bruce Glasier, and reported in your issue of February 10, that the price paid for making army uniforms, presumably two garments, was 2s. 3½d., leaving the contractor a profit of 7s. 1d. We have a fair experience of army contracts, but very much doubt whether we see more than our standing expenses out of the work. The War Office in December asked for tenders for khaki uniforms at a fixed price, all materials to be supplied by them, leaving 7s. 5d. for cutting, making, and general expenses, not necessarily profits. Where does Mrs. Glasier's 7s. 1d. profit for the contractor come in?

Menin Rear,
May 8th. 1915.

658a/17

658a

The Daily Telegraph. 27-11-15

65.8. A

658a/18

QUESTIONS IN PARLIAMENT.

Scotland's Share of New Clothing Contracts—Only 25 per Cent. of English Firms' Tenders Accepted—The Glanfield Contract Again.

IN the House of Commons last week Mr. Watt asked the Financial Secretary to the War Office what proportion of the Army clothing contracts recently placed went to contractors in Scotland?

Replying, Mr. Baker said: The total number of garments ordered from Scotch firms was 168,950, or about 4¼ per cent. of the total ordered in the United Kingdom. I may add that the total number tendered for by Scotch firms was only 403,390, so that the orders placed covered over 40 per cent. of the numbers offered, while English firms secured orders for less than 25 per cent. of the numbers offered.

Mr. Watt: Is the hon. gentleman aware that 4¼ per cent. is only half of that to which we are entitled?

No reply was given to this question.

In a further question, Mr. Watt asked why the new contracts introduced the condition of forbidding sub-contracting, especially so far as Scotland is concerned, in view of the fact that the smaller makers there pay higher wages to their workpeople than the larger makers.

Replying, Mr. Baker said: The prohibition of sub-contracting is not a new condition, but one which has been in force in regard to clothing contracts for many years before the war. It was temporarily suspended in the early part of the war to meet the emergency, but, in view of the abuses which are liable to occur under a system of general sub-contracting, it was reintroduced as soon as circumstances permitted. All contractors are bound to pay rates of wages which fulfil the requirements of the Fair Wages Clause.

Seeking still more information about the Glanfield £3,000,000 contract, Mr. Booth asked if the women who suggested the placing of the clothing contract actually introduced Mr. Glanfield to the contract department; what previous experience such persons had enjoyed in placing orders of two and a-half millions sterling; whether any portion of this or other clothing contracts of the War Office had been executed in America; and if so, upon what terms?

In a written reply, Mr. Baker stated: "The Central Committee on Women's Employment, to which I understand the hon. member to refer, was appointed by the President of the Local Government Board to devise schemes of employment for women unemployed on account of the war. Neither the Committee nor any of its members advised the placing of any contract for clothing, but they made representations for a wider distribution of contracts and suggestions for a simplification of the service dress pattern. Mr. Glanfield was one of the commercial advisers to the Committee, and was already well known to the War Office as an Army clothing contractor of high reputation. No part of the contract has been executed in America. I will furnish the hon. member with a statement of the clothing contracts which have been placed in America.

History of the Glanfield Contract.

Speaking in the House of Commons recently, in the discussion on Army estimates, Mr. BOOTH said that, in reply to a question, the hon. member for Accrington (Mr. Baker) had just after the Easter recess informed him that a clothing contract was placed with Messrs. Glanfield and Son for 1,000,000 suits of uniform and 1,000,000 greatcoats. On the basis of the flat rate, continued Mr. Booth, that order represented nearly £2,500,000 placed in one contract. If the investigations made by perfectly unbiassed people, who had published the result of their inquiries, were well founded, the profit made upon each of those million outfits was over 10s., or a total profit of £500,000 on one order given to one firm. Whether the estimate could be challenged he did not know. Particulars had not been given to the House of that tremendous order, but he did not think the hon. gentleman could defend the placing of such a colossal order with one firm. He did not wish to challenge the position, honesty, or efficiency of the firm of Glanfield and Son, or of the new firm of Glanfield and Co. If the War Office were determined to place a contract of this magnitude with any firm, they might as well give it to Glanfield and Co. as to anybody else. What he wanted to ask was: Of what were the War Office thinking? He was sure it could not be any business man who advised them to give such a tremendous order for £2,500,000 worth of goods to one firm in this fashion. The estimated profit he had given did not include the sub-contractors' profits. The explanation given by the Government was that they wished to "create and organise new sources of supply." No proper account at all had been given of how Glanfield and Co. had complied with that desire of the War Office. From inquiries he had made they seemed to have scattered their orders fairly freely and broadcast. He believed the War Office were approached by the Wholesale Clothing Association, who, if they had received such a huge order, would have placed it out among the firms in equal proportions. He should like to know whether all of this contract had been delivered; whether there was any truth in the rumours that the clothing produced under this contract was not equal in quality to the clothing for which the War Office has stipulated in other contracts; whether it was a limited firm; and what exactly the relation was between the old firm and the new? Mr. Booth said he brought the matter forward because throughout the clothing trade and the tailoring trade, from one end of the land to the other, this contract, by its magnitude and the manner in which it was placed, was the one topic of conversation.

Help in Time of Need.

Replying, Mr. BAKER, in the course of his speech, said he thought Mr. Booth was well entitled on the facts to ask for some explanation of this contract because it was undoubtedly one of an unusual character. The first impulse in the direction of this contract came from a body known as the "Women's Employment Committee." He did not say they recommended it either in its exact form or as a corporate body, but the suggestion came from a representative of theirs that it would be a very good thing if the War Office were to set someone to organise outside firms who had not hitherto been engaged in the Army clothing trade. Mr. Glanfield came to the War Office with the suggestion just at the moment when recruiting was taking place most heavily. Mr. Glanfield was well known to the officials of the Quartermaster-General's Department. He had been in the Army clothing trade for a great many years, and he thought he might fairly say that he was one of the most respected persons engaged in that industry. There were a great number of officials at the conference, representing all the branches concerned, and he was informed that Mr. Glanfield was by no means willing to take the contract. At any rate, he was finally persuaded to do so, provided that they would abandon the rather complicated peace pattern and substitute a simplified and modified pattern, the object being that those persons who had no previous experience in the making of uniforms would more readily learn to do so. It was arranged that Mr. Glanfield should organise these firms, and he undertook to deliver up to 100,000 suits per week and 100,000 greatcoats at a fixed price. He was to be allowed to sub-contract, which was an essential of the scheme, but every sub-contract which he made was to include a Fair Wages Clause. Mr. Booth had commented on the size of the orders. If size were to be an objection, he was afraid that most of the operations which the War Office had been carrying out would be liable to criticism. It was true that this was a very large order, but he was quite unable to give any estimate as to the actual profit Mr. Glanfield derived from it. He did say, however, that, in view of the prices and of the insertion of the Fair Wages Clause in all the contracts, the figures quoted by Mr. Booth must really be regarded as altogether fantastic. He did not think they would stand a moment's investigation.

Disabusing the Minds of Enquirers.

The real question was whether the average rates fixed were fair ones, and whether proper precautions were taken to see that the Fair Wages Clause was inserted in all contracts. On both these he did not think the department was open to criticism. Mr. Booth asked if all that was required had been delivered under the contract. He was not sure, but he thought that nearly all had been completed and delivered. Then Mr. Booth made a suggestion that the quality of the clothing being delivered was in some way different from the quality demanded in other contracts. He hoped that Mr. Booth would disabuse his mind entirely of that. The only alteration made was, in fact, an alteration which in war-time was required, which accelerated enormously the delivery of the goods. So far as quality went, those goods were just of the same quality as any other. They had to pass the inspection branch before they were accepted, otherwise they would be left on Mr. Glanfield's hands. Mr. Booth then raised the question of the relations between the old firm and the new, but he could be assured of this—that the reason for the creation of the second company was that they might have a separate office and might keep the whole of their arrangements and transactions apart. When Mr. Booth challenged him to praise this as an admirable arrangement he did nothing of the kind; he was entirely at one with Mr. Booth in condemnation of the contract in its main features, but he was still open to conviction on the question whether there was not anything else that would have been done to secure the clothing in time.

THE QUEEN AND WAR WORKERS.

VISIT TO LONDON FACTORY.

5,000 WOMEN EMPLOYED.

The Queen, with Princess Mary and Prince Albert, spent a considerable time yesterday afternoon, where Messrs. Waring and Gillow employ 7,000 men and women manufacturing equipment for the Army. Her Majesty, who was attended by Lady Bertha Dawkins and Mr. E. W. Wallington, was conducted by Mr. Samuel J. Waring over a factory of two floors, filled with thousands of silent running sewing machines driven by electric power. Row upon row of women bent over their work, intent on increasing the capacity of the factory to supply the troops in the field with shelters and equipment. There was no stoppage of work in honour of the Queen's visit until the tour of the building had been completed, and then on the sound of the hooter the whole of the employés rushed to the centre of the building, and, by cheering and clapping of hands, showed their delight at the Royal interest in their labour.

The Queen saw the factory exactly as it is running night and day. In one department hospital marquees, large in size and made of the finest material procurable, are being turned out at the rate of 300 per week. The marquee for hot climates interested her Majesty greatly, and one erected in the grounds was inspected. The method adopted of relieving the patient from the penetrating rays of the sun is ingenious and effective. Three layers of cotton material, known in the Indian market as "doosootie," one white, another bright yellow, and the third deep red, line the interior, and even when the tropical sun is fiercest the patient is only conscious of a pleasant amber glow.

50,000 BELL TENTS.

The bell tent is being made at the factory at the rate of 5,000 a week, and the Queen saw the work pass through in orderly progress from the rolls of canvas to the finished article strung up to the roof and inspected by War Department officials prior to despatch to Woolwich. Since the works began to run 50,000 of these tents and 3,000 hospital marquees have been made at this factory.

All the processes of manufacture were explained to the Queen, who talked to some of the women and men. Her Majesty was interested to learn that the women were drawn from all classes, and the majority had never been employed on this kind of work till their services were asked for. There were several wives of officers serving at the front among the "hands," and the employés include former governesses, laundry maids, and domestic servants. They are all working with a will, and are proud of the opportunity of rendering aid to the men fighting our battles. In the machine shop her Majesty conversed in French with M Brezet, a French soldier in charge of the mechanics. He was incapacitated by wounds from further service with the French army, and he now devotes his time and energy in assisting to equip our men.

FROM THE MILL TO THE FRONT.

There was a time when it was difficult for Messrs. Waring to obtain some of the materials they had stored in distant stock-rooms. The demand for the equipment was urgent, and means had to be found not merely for getting the textile material to London, but to make the articles asked for by generals at the front. For ten consecutive nights a special train hauled by two engines ran from Dundee with 100 tons of material. This was made into tents, horserugs, meatbags, haversacks, packs, bandoliers for cartridges, mess-tin covers, and so on, and was delivered at Woolwich the day after its arrival in the metropolis, only three days elapsing between the time of the canvas leaving Dundee before it was delivered ready for soldiers' use. Special representatives are buying for the factory in most of the markets of the world, and not a day passes without

...rent. There was no stoppage of work in honour of the Queen's visit until the tour of the building had been completed, and then on the sound of the hooter the whole of the employés rushed to the centre of the building, and, by cheering and clapping of hands, showed their delight at the Royal interest in their labour.

The Queen saw the factory exactly as it is running night and day. In one department hospital marquees, large in size and made of the finest material procurable, are being turned out at the rate of 300 per week. The marquee for hot climates interested her Majesty greatly, and one erected in the grounds was inspected. The method adopted of relieving the patient from the penetrating rays of the sun is ingenious and effective. Three layers of cotton material, known in the Indian market as "doosootie," one white, another bright yellow, and the third deep red, line the interior, and even when the tropical sun is fiercest the patient is only conscious of a pleasant amber glow.

50,000 BELL TENTS.

The bell tent is being made at the factory at the rate of 5,000 a week, and the Queen saw the work pass through in orderly progress from the rolls of canvas to the finished article strung up to the roof and inspected by War Department officials prior to despatch to Woolwich. Since the works began to run 50,000 of these tents and 3,000 hospital marquees have been made at this factory.

All the processes of manufacture were explained to the Queen, who talked to some of the women and men. Her Majesty was interested to learn that the women were drawn from all classes, and the majority had never been employed on this kind of work till their services were asked for. There were several wives of officers serving at the front among the "hands," and the employés include former governesses, laundry maids, and domestic servants. They are all working with a will, and are proud of the opportunity of rendering aid to the men fighting our battles. In the machine shop her Majesty conversed in French with M Brezet, a French soldier in charge of the mechanics. He was incapacitated by wounds from further service with the French army, and he now devotes his time and energy in assisting to equip our men.

FROM THE MILL TO THE FRONT.

There was a time when it was difficult for Messrs. Waring to obtain some of the materials they had stored in distant stock-rooms. The demand for the equipment was urgent, and means had to be found not merely for getting the textile material to London, but to make the articles asked for by generals at the front. For ten consecutive nights a special train hauled by two engines ran from Dundee with 100 tons of material. This was made into tents, horserugs, nosebags, haversacks, packs, bandoliers for cartridges, mess-tin covers, and so on, and was delivered at Woolwich the day after its arrival in the metropolis, only three days elapsing between the time of the canvas leaving Dundee before it was delivered ready for soldiers' use. Special representatives are buying for the factory in most of the markets of the world, and not a day passes without supplies reaching a British port.

Of the 7,000 people employed at the factory 5,000 are women. Many of the men have been brought from coast towns, where they had carried on the trade of sailmakers when they were not at sea. To handle the material and the output of the factory 100 motor-lorries are daily employed, and the mileage is heavy. It is difficult to obtain an idea of the work done in the place by merely walking through it. A glimpse of the stock-rooms suggests that the output is colossal, but unless the secrets of the stock-books are revealed you go away with a hazy notion of what these working men and women are able to do for the armies of the Allies. These figures tell the whole tale. Each week there are used in this factory:

1,500,000 yards of various textile materials.
40 tons of rope of various sizes.
7 tons of thread and twine.
1,000,000 yards of webbing.
2,000,000 assorted wood buttons, wood runners, and general wood fittings.

Prodigious totals, truly, and still the demand is great.

Mens Wear.
18-1-16.

Army Shirt Contracts in Ireland.

The announcement in Parliament recently by Mr. Forster, in reply to Mr. Hugh Law, that the War Office will not prohibit in connection with their contracts for Army shirts the employment of out-workers in the North of Ireland, in view of the special conditions prevailing in the shirtmaking trade there, has, says the "Irish Times," been received with much satisfaction in the North-West. Now, since its very inception, the North of Ireland trade has always employed a large number of women who reside in the rural areas. They live in their own homes, and are in many cases mainly dependent on their earnings from this source, stated one of the largest employers in the trade in Londonderry. The ordinary trade has declined very considerably since the war commenced, and as the Irish manufacturers were prohibited from sending any Army goods to these country workers, a very great hardship existed. The objection which might be urged against any alteration in the contract, that if the employers were not compelled to do the work in their factories they might get it done by sweated labour, does not apply so far as Irish employers are concerned, as the Shirt Trade Board (Ireland) has fixed a minimum time and piece rate for out-workers or home workers, as well as for those employed in the factories. The employers do not desire to do their work by giving it out to sub-contractors, but they do wish to be permitted to provide employment for legitimate out-workers who have been always receiving work from the factories.

658A.
Textile Mercury
8-1-16. 658a/19

War Bonuses at Huddersfield

In faithful imitation of the settlement made a little while ago in the dyeing trade the terms have been arranged of a new and enlarged war bonus for workpeople in the Huddersfield and Colne Valley districts. Men get 3s. a week irrespective of the total amount of their earnings, and women get eighteenpence. It is worthy of remark that a vote was taken to determine whether the offer should be rejected unless and until the employers saw fit to make the bonus to women the same as to men. The proposal fell to the ground, although 124 votes were cast for it, against 193 for the acceptance of the terms. The vote gives some indication of the way the wind is blowing, and some notion of the difficulties through which the organisers of trade unions of mixed membership have to steer.

There are more ways than one of giving an equal wage bonus to men and women. Men might magnanimously agree to accept the lower bonus given to the other sex, but experience in Huddersfield goes to shew that they do not promptly do so. Again men might take a rather lower bonus for themselves in order that a rather higher one might go to women, but Huddersfield experience shews no hurry to do anything of the kind. The old Adam and the male view of the rights of man triumph over sentimental ideas of equality between the sexes. The man votes for three shillings, or for more if he can get it, and advises the woman to be grateful for her eighteenpence. The woman wants three shillings, not because her poverty is distressing apart from it, but because the amount is that which is given to men. She has been taught by her trade-union mentors to believe that the way to get a thing is to refuse labour until her wish is granted, and when she expresses a wish finds that her male colleagues take what they can for themselves and ignore her protests. The exhibition is all very human and educative, although not exactly calculated to promote good feeling within the organisation.

Logic and the needs of the case have too little to do with high war bonuses to be worth serious thought. Prices have risen, and to an appreciable extent war bonuses are the occasion of their rise. Prices form a pretext, and are capable of forming further and further pretexts indefinitely, but the grant comes in response to supply and demand, because the employers count, for the time being, on getting back the additional expense, and because the operatives count on their ability to extort an extra payment as the alternative to a strike. Men are more important to the work of the mill than women, and in general have larger expenses and responsibilities. Both tradition and economy sanction the payment of men at higher rates than women, and the decision to give Huddersfield women a lower bonus is one that cannot surprise them, however much it may incense them.

Yorkshire Eng Pst
17-1-16

658a/20 658a

THE NEW CONTRACTS FOR KHAKI.

LEEDS GIRLS' REDUCED WAGES.

NEWLY STARTED FIRMS THAT HAVE UNDERCUT OLDER RIVALS.

One has become so accustomed to hearing of the high wages which are being earned on Government work that it is somewhat surprising to learn that the Leeds clothing operatives engaged on khaki are earning anything from 30 to 40 per cent. less than they did during the khaki boom of last year. Twelve months ago the female worker on soldiers' uniforms were earning between 25s. and 30s. a week (in odd cases it was more), but on the new contracts which have been placed in the city recently the young woman has to be pretty smart to make more than £1.

During the last khaki boom, when the uniforms were urgently wanted, the Government put the employers in the clothing trade on a flat rate, which meant they paid the same price for each garment, and the clothiers bought the cloth from the Government, and all paid for it at practically the same rates. As a natural sequel the workers asked for flat rates for making the uniforms; and, although they were not entirely successful in their efforts in Leeds, they did succeed in inducing the firms paying the lower prices to pay almost the same rates as the larger and more representative firms. At any rate, the workers ceased to grumble.

SIX LEAN MONTHS.

Then there came a time when the Government's wants were supplied, and the boom was no more. For nearly six months now the khaki work executed in Leeds has been of an almost negligible quantity, but recently the Government intimated that new contracts were to be put out. There not being the urgent necessity for the uniforms that there was a year ago, the Government abolished the flat rate to the employers, and competition between the various firms again became the order of the day. Most of the older and well-established firms tendered in the ordinary way, but the ground was cut from under their feet, it is said, by the firms of mushroom growth which sprang into prominence during the last boom. Against their finely-cut prices the former had no chance.

What more natural then, that these firms, having secured the orders by tendering at low prices, should ask the operatives to accept lower rates of wages? The latter, of course, had been working slack time for several months; and, on the principle that half a loaf is better than no bread, they restarted work on khaki at considerably reduced rates of wages, the difference as compared with last year representing in some cases as much as 50 per cent. In several instances the low wages have led to small sectional disputes, which have resulted in the rates being slightly increased; but even now the rates are said to be between 30 and 40 per cent. below those of last year.

FAIR AND CONSIDERATE TREATMENT.

Some of what may be termed the representative firms treated their employees very fairly over the business. For instance, one large firm, having received a sample uniform, frankly told the operatives the contracts would not allow of the old prices being paid, and they asked them to quote what they themselves thought a fair price for making the things. The firm then based their tender on the prices quoted by the operatives, and it is significant that they have been unsuccessful in obtaining an order.

One firm in the city, it may be said, claims to have received the largest order for one class of article that has been given to one factory.

Two New Orders.

We have repeatedly pointed out that a sweating wage is still being paid by many employers engaged on Government work, and that, so far, only the wages of women employed on "men's work" have been protected. Two new Orders have now been made by the Ministry of Munitions, but at time of going to press full details of these Orders are not available.

The first Order prescribes rates of wages for girls employed on munitions work of a class customarily done by men, and will be applied to the same establishments as the corresponding directions already issued for the remuneration of women employed on such work. The second Order prescribes rates of wages for women and girls employed on munitions work of a class not customarily recognised as men's work, and will be applied forthwith to controlled firms in the main munition areas engaged in the production of armaments, ammunition, and ordnance, and in all branches of mechanical engineering and shipbuilding. The case of other areas and trades is under consideration.

Maintaining Our Exports.

"The labour situation has been to a considerable extent saved by our women," said Mr. F. Kellaway, M.P., Parliamentary Secretary to Dr. Addison, addressing his constituents at Bedford last week. In 1914, he pointed out, 184,000 women were engaged in war industries. To-day there are 666,000; women being employed in 471 different munition processes.

In addition to increasing the supply of munitions the women are also helping to maintain British exports: a matter of vital importance on which our rate of exchange depends. The trade returns for June show a large increase in our exports. Cotton piece-goods show an advance of 76 million yards in quantity, and woollen and worsted manufactures have also advanced considerably. Linen piece-goods have risen by nearly three million yards, and the export of carpets has increased by 244,000 square yards. In the manufacture of textile fabrics, more women than men were employed, even in 1911—the year when the last census of occupations was taken—and the proportion must have very largely increased since the outbreak of war. Women are now employed in the cotton mills in several processes hitherto confined to men—in the blowing room, on spinning mules, beaming, twisting, and drawing, and in the warehouse. In the woollen mills they are now engaged in beaming and overlooking, attending drying machines, carding, and pattern weaving. These are but a few instances of the new operations in various industries which women are performing for the first time, and performing satisfactorily.

658a/21 658A

Globe:
20-1-16:

KHAKI CONTRACTS.

CHARGES OF SWEATING IN CANADIAN WORKSHOPS.

Army clothing contracts in Canada are just now causing a good deal of feeling among the workpeople, who, according to the "Ottawa Citizen," are certainly not over-paid for their laborious work.

Considerable stir is being made by the Press and the trades unions in Canada on the matter of Army contracts and the pay thereon received by the workers. One of the chief causes of complaint is that of wholesale sub-letting of contracts.

According to the newspaper in question, khaki clothing is being made in Toronto, under certain militia contracts, where the girl workers are said to be little better than sweathed wage-slaves. They work long hours—twelve hours or more a day—on piecework, where the price is cut to the sweating level. They seem to have no trade union organisation to protect them; but they have had the temerity lately actually to ask for better pay. The rate allowed for finishing off khaki trousers is six cents (3d.) per pair. They are asking for an increase of one cent!

The finishing-off work on a pair of khaki trousers includes sewing on eleven buttons and doing certain necessary hand-stitching, as well as taking out all tacking threads left in during the machining operations. It is virtually an hour's work, and the pay is six cents! The girl slave at the end of twelve hours' toil will have 72 cents (3s.) due to her! But supposing a girl to have exceptional skill, with eyes never tiring under the strain—even the finishing of 16 pair of khaki trousers per day will mean 4 cents less than a dollar for the day's slavery—and the work would have included sewing on 176 buttons, and an equally laborious amount of stitching and picking ou of threads.

Hon. A. E. Kemp, M.P., has denied the charge made in the clothing trade journal, "Men's Wear," that a militia clothing contract had been placed with a real estate agent. But has every clothing contract been placed with a genuine clothing manufacturer? Has every contract been carried out by the person receiving the order from the war contracts committee? Or has there been sub-letting and profiteering middlemen? This country should know. It has to pay for the clothing. Does it pay at a rate of 6 cents an hour for girl slavery? Or is the price only a sweat-shop price after the profiteering fat has been devoured by middlemen?

The "Citizen" suggest that civilians might at least stir from their firesides to wipe out the sweat-shop, while the soldiers are handling the enemy abroad.

The Scarborough Post.
29/1/16.

658 A.
658a/22

SOCK MAKING INDUSTRY

Mr. Fenton's New Scheme at Work

AT SCARBOROUGH.

Mr. T. H. Fenton, hosier, Victoria-road, has now got to work several young women making army grey socks for the War Office at Springwell Hosiery Works, Back St. Nicholas Cliff (over Bargna's Garage). Springwell works is a most healthy, clean and tidy looking place, and is indeed a hive of industry. They work with patent machines supplied by the Central Association in London, and the whole of the organisation has developed through that association. When the first fifty machines have been set at work and are in full going swing it is proposed to later commence glove or cardigan jacket making. Asked what wages the girls could make, Mr. Fenton said for the first week they would only earn a few shillings, the second week would see the amount doubled, and at the end of the third week 50 per cent. more would be added. At the end of a month the girls would be drawing somewhere about 10s. to 12s. per week, and when six weeks have elapsed they will average about 14s. per week. When they have had two months work at the machines they will then be drawing from 13s. to 17s. per week, some of them considerably more. It is entirely a piecework industry, and being so, with their work. The occupation is a marvellously clean one, in fact the girls only need an apron over their clothes. Up to the present time about one hundred applications have been made for work, a great many of which cannot be yet employed. Dozens of applicants have asked if they could take machines and work at home, but the War Office will not allow it, as diseases might be contracted, bearing in mind that wool is a material which will carry disease almost more than any other material. The Central Association, who have lent the knitting machines, are backed up by Queen Mary's Fund, and many of the knitters employed in London who have learned under the Association are now experienced, and make as many as two or three dozen pairs of socks per day. Taking the lower figure—two dozen—this makes a wage of a pound a week. It is hoped after the war is over and the contracts for soldiers' socks worked out, to make it a permanent industry in Scarborough. Many new improvements are being added to the works, including a steam press for pressing the hosiery and a patent "linker" for linking the toes of the socks. One of the girls who started this week has made eleven pairs of perfect socks in three days, as well as being taught how to knit.

MAKES THE GIRLS KEENER TO GET ALONG

A young lady from London, sent by the Women's Association—Miss Standage—an expert knitter, acts as instructress to the girls and shows them any little defects they have made. Mrs. Fenton, also an expert at the work, takes an able part in the work. It is hoped by next week to have thirty-five machines going.

Sunday Chronicle
20.8.16.

658 A
658a/23

Song of the (Army) Shirt.

By EDWARD CECIL

BEFORE the war we were talking a great deal about sweating. We did very little beyond talking.

With the urgency of war needs, the Government became, at any rate indirectly, employers of sweated labour. The sub-contracting system flourished.

The true method of attack upon sweating is not to draw harrowing pictures of what sweating is and what it involves in the misery of human beings who are sweated, but to direct attention to the sub-contracting which creates sweating.

"The Song of the Shirt" moves one to tears, but the enemy whom the sweater fears is the man who exposes the conditions which create sweating, and creates public opinion so that the sub-contracting, which leads to sweating, is seen to be so great a social sin that all decent people shrink from it.

The Government pays 9s. 3d. a dozen for making army shirts. That is to say, it contracts with this or that contractor to supply the shirts up to standard for that price. I have found women being paid 1s. 11d. a dozen for making these shirts.

Work out for yourself what this means. It means that by making five dozen—sixty—shirts one might earn 9s. 7d. Remember that the shirts have to be perfect, or they will be rejected. Now, I have known a married woman with children who worked from 5 a.m. to midnight all day and all the week, and made sixty shirts, and so earned 9s. 7d.

It is no use to cry over that woman—I could do that—but what is of use is to hate and detest the sub-contracting which caused the sweating.

Something may be done at once; it would not surprise me if it is being done already. During the course of this war I have already seen instances of noble, clear-brained, and far-sighted women who have quietly and sensibly worked for the good of the workers.

If such a woman or a band of such women were to take on the contract for a certain number of shirts, by keeping back 1s. 3d. a dozen shirts for working expenses, 8s. and not 1s. 11d. a dozen shirts could be paid to the actual worker!

The sub-contractors might starve. Let them starve! But by doing two dozen shirts instead of five dozen a mother of children might earn 16s. instead of 9s. 7d., and she and her children would bless those who had knocked away from weary limbs the fetters which the sweater and the sub-contractors had forged.

Manchester Guardian.
7.10.1916

THE ARMY CLOTHING SCANDAL.

To the Editor of the Manchester Guardian.

Sir,—The army clothing contract case has come and gone, the judge remarking that the army clothing department, responsible for the disbursement of many millions, seems to be conducted upon methods that would bring any private firm to bankruptcy.

But as this particular firm happens to be the nation, with apparently unlimited resources as far as mere money is concerned, it seems only right that it should realise the bankruptcy of life that lies behind its methods.

The following table appeared in the "Toynbee Record" for January, 1915, in an article called "Military tailoring in the East End," wherein it was stated that the wages quoted would vary from 16s. for girl finishers to about £3 to £3. 10s. for men fitters and machinists for a 55-hour week. [The Tailoring Trade Board stipulate that the piece rates paid must yield a minimum time rate of 3½d. per hour to "average workers" (women), and 6d. per hour to "average workers" (men).] One must remember too that outworkers provide their own rooms, lighting and heating:—

Cost to contractor.	Gt. coats. s. d.	Jackets. s. d.	Trousers s. d.
All materials	17 7.93	... 7 1.77	... 6 2.75
Pd. to subcontractors for making up	3 3	... 2 9	... 0 10
Total	20 11	... 9 10½	... 7 0½
Pd. by War Office for made-up garment...	28 0	...12 6	... 8 9
Gross profit per garment to contractor	7 1	... 2 7½	... 1 8½
Cost to subcontractor:
Wages	2 3½	... 2 1½	... 0 7½
Recd. from contr'tor	3 3	... 2 9	... 0 10
Gross profit per garment to subcont...	0 11½	... 0 7½	... 0 2½

—From "Toynbee Record."

Profit per outfit of three garments to contractor 7s. 1d. + 2s. 7½d. + 1s. 8½d. = 11s. 4½d
Profit on one million outfits over £500,000.

As was stated by a commentator at the time: "The clothing has been turned out at a somewhat high price to the nation, . . . and the nation has to foot the bill."

And what of the picture that lies behind the wages—the homes, the mothers, the children, the future nation? Those of us who are trying to save the nation at home by securing the minimum necessaries of life to our mothers and their babies—food, skilled care, rest—are constantly hampered by two things, lack of funds and, what is worse, conditions caused by sweating. Many women and girls are still earning less than 6d. an hour, not only by Trades Board rates, but on [illegible]

Manchester Guardian.
9.10.16

THE ARMY CLOTHING SCANDAL.

To the Editor of the Manchester Guardian.

Sir,—The letter of Dr. Barbara Tchaykovsky is useful as occasioning a reply showing the other side of the picture. The figures she uses from the "Toynbee Records" of January, 1915 were immediately disproved in the trade papers as to the cost of all materials and the gross profit to the contractor, and Dr. Tchaykovsky should have reliable data to go on.

I will deal only with the largest item—greatcoats. At the time named (winter 1914-15) the army's needs were enormously greater than the supply, and army agents were buying up the civilian stocks of overcoats of wholesale clothiers (and some retailers), while the clothing trade were providing the real khaki greatcoats. The War Office gave practically the whole work into the hands of one man, or firm, most honourably known throughout the trade and themselves large army contractors, and the "flat rate" was for a very short time 28s. But as "direct" contracts could not be had the whole trade gathered round this firm, and at the request of Lord Kitchener put 70 to 75 per cent of their plant on to these goods at about 25s. and 26s. Moreover, as it was to most of them a new industry the cost of labour instead of being 3s. 3d. was nearer 5s. Your correspondent omits to say that immediately after this "subcontracting" was abolished, and every garment had to be made on the premises of the contractor.

As to the absurd profit of 7s. 1d. shown in the "Toynbee" table, we may say that we have made tens of thousands of these greatcoats at a profit of, roughly, 1s. per coat, and to show the keenness of the Contracts Department in the clothing section we had this spring a tender accepted for 15,000 at well under 25s., while another local tender at one penny more than ours was "declined with thanks."

Your correspondent asks "what of the picture that lies behind the wages"? We cannot speak of the East End of London, but we can of Manchester; and our own women on this work were earning from 30s. to 60s. per week, and our men from £3 to £8 per week, vastly beyond any conception of trade unions or minimum wages rates; in fact, if they could not have khaki they would leave work for days or weeks rather than make civilian clothing.

The practice of the department in giving contracts to aliens and others without investigation as to their status and ability to execute them is severely to be condemned, and we all hope a purer state of things will be quickly evolved.

these shirts.

Work out for yourself what this means. It means that by making five dozen—sixty—shirts wo'd bless those who had knocked away from weary limbs the fetters which the sweater and the sub-contractors had forged.

Manchester Guardian. 7.10.1916

THE ARMY CLOTHING SCANDAL.

To the Editor of the Manchester Guardian.

Sir,—The army clothing contract case has come and gone, the judge remarking that the army clothing department, responsible for the disbursement of many millions, seems to be conducted upon methods that would bring any private firm to bankruptcy.

But as this particular firm happens to be the nation, with apparently unlimited resources as far as mere money is concerned, it seems only right that it should realise the bankruptcy of life that lies behind its methods.

The following table appeared in the "Toynbee Record" for January, 1915, in an article called "Military tailoring in the East End," wherein it was stated that the wages quoted would vary from 16s. for girl finishers to about £3 to £3. 10s. for men fitters and machinists for a 55-hour week. [The Tailoring Trade Board stipulate that the piece rates paid must yield a minimum time rate of 3½d. per hour to "average workers" (women), and 6d. per hour to "average workers" (men).] One must remember too that outworkers provide their own rooms, lighting and heating:—

Cost to contractor.	Gt. coats. s. d.	Jackets. s. d.	Trousers s. d.
All materials	17 7.93	... 7 1.77	... 6 2.75
Pd. to subcontractors for making up	3 3	... 2 9	... 0 10
Total	20 11	... 9 10½	... 7 0½
Pd. by War Office for made-up garment...	28 0	...12 6	... 8 9
Gross profit per garment to contractor	7 1	... 2 7½	... 1 8½
Cost to subcontractor:
Wages	2 3½	... 2 1½	... 0 7½
Recd. from contr'tor	3 3	... 2 9	... 0 10
Gross profit per garment to subcont....	0 11½	... 0 7½	... 0 2½

—From "Toynbee Record."

Profit per outfit of three garments to contractor 7s. 1d. + 2s. 7½d. + 1s. 8½d. = 11s. 4½d
Profit on one million outfits over £500,000.

As was stated by a commentator at the time: "The clothing has been turned out at a somewhat high price to the nation, . . . and the nation has to foot the bill."

And what of the picture that lies behind the wages—the homes, the mothers, the children, the future nation? Those of us who are trying to save the nation at home by securing the minimum necessaries of life to our mothers and their babies—food, skilled care, rest—are constantly hampered by two things, lack of funds and, what is worse, conditions caused by sweating. Many women and girls are still earning less than 6d. an hour, not only by Trades Board rates, but as laid down for munition workers by the Ministry of Munitions.

Behind the condemnation of men who are defrauding the nation must surely lie a deeper and more effective condemnation of a system that directly connives at the bankruptcy of the young life of the nation.—Yours, &c.,

BARBARA TCHAYKOVSKY, M.D.

Manchester Guardian. 9.10.16

THE ARMY CLOTHING SCANDAL.

To the Editor of the Manchester Guardian.

Sir,—The letter of Dr. Barbara Tchaykovsky is useful as occasioning a reply showing the other side of the picture. The figures she uses from the "Toynbee Records" of January, 1915 were immediately disproved in the trade papers as to the cost of all materials and the gross profit to the contractor, and Dr. Tchaykovsky should have reliable data to go on.

I will deal only with the largest item—great-coats. At the time named (winter 1914-15) the army's needs were enormously greater than the supply, and army agents were buying up the civilian stocks of overcoats of wholesale clothiers (and some retailers), while the clothing trade were providing the real khaki great-coats. The War Office gave practically the whole work into the hands of one man, or firm, most honourably known throughout the trade and themselves large army contractors, and the "flat rate" was for a very short time 28s. But as "direct" contracts could not be had the whole trade gathered round this firm, and at the request of Lord Kitchener put 70 to 75 per cent of their plant on to these goods at about 25s. and 26s. Moreover, as it was to most of them a new industry the cost of labour instead of being 3s. 3d. was nearer 5s. Your correspondent omits to say that immediately after this "subcontracting" was abolished, and every garment had to be made on the premises of the contractor.

As to the absurd profit of 7s. 1d. shown in the "Toynbee" table, we may say that we have made tens of thousands of these great-coats at a profit of, roughly, 1s. per coat, and to show the keenness of the Contracts Department in the clothing section we had this spring a tender accepted for 15,000 at well under 25s., while another local tender at one penny more than ours was "declined with thanks."

Your correspondent asks "what of the picture that lies behind the wages"? We cannot speak of the East End of London, but we can of Manchester; and our own women on this work were earning from 30s. to 60s. per week, and our men from £3 to £6 per week, vastly beyond any conception of trade unions or minimum wages rates; in fact, if they could not have khaki they would leave work for days or weeks rather than make civilian clothing.

The practice of the department in giving contracts to aliens and others without investigation as to their status and ability to execute them is severely to be condemned, and we all hope a purer state of things will be quickly evolved.—Yours, &c.,

WHOLESALE CLOTHIERS.

John Bull.
18/12/16

...ch, Work and Wages.

the Government want to encourage women to engage ...ational service they will have to stop this sort of thing. Recently an East End firm had among their employées a girl engaged on equipment. At first they paid her a fair wage. Finishing one contract and accepting another, they required the girl to work at a price at which she could not afford to work; that is to say, 3s. 6d. a dozen, 1s. 5½d. being deducted for thread. She handed in her notice, but on expiry the firm declined to give her a permit to work elsewhere, and she cannot obtain other work without one. Obviously this is not only unfair, but mean and spiteful. A firm who are making high profits on contract ought not to be permitted to restrict an employée in her right to work elsewhere when they will not pay her adequate wages.

Weekly Dispatch.
12/11/16

WOMEN CARPENTERS FOR FRANCE

Contractor Authorised to Take an Unlimited Number.

Two or three hundred women carpenters are to be taken to France immediately, Mr. W. T. Tarrant, Army hut contractor, of Byfleet, told the Chobham (Surrey) Tribunal yesterday.

The Government, he said, have given him permission to send as many as he can engage.

Temporary exemption was then granted to the men who are instructing the women, and the exemption certificates of fourteen employees whom they will displace were cancelled.

Manchester Dispatch
8-10-17.

GARMENT WORKERS' AWARD.

A wages dispute among the 2,200 garment workers of Todmorden and Hebden Bridge has been arbitrated upon by Sir G. K. Askwith and the Committee of Production.

The award lays down that the men concerned, aged 22 and over, shall receive an advance of 1½d. per hour; men over 18 and under 22, 1d. an hour; and youths and girls under 18, ½d. an hour. Piece workers are to get a corresponding increase.

Any general advance given by firms since May, 1917, is to merge in the advances given by this award, provided that, notwithstanding such merging, the further advance given by the award shall not be less than ½d. an hour from October 1 above the rates in force on September 1, 1917, in the case of men and women, and ¼d. for boys and girls.

The advances are to begin from October 1, and to be regarded as war wages, due to abnormal conditions.

The Common Cause
11.5.14

659

Yorkshire Observer
20.11.14

659/1

We are glad to see that protests are being widely made against the treatment of the families of soldiers and sailors. A busy woman with a young family ought not to be compelled to stand in a lamentable queue for hours without rest or refreshment before she can get registered for the payment of money which is due to her. These women often have babies in their arms, and little children wearily hanging to their skirts. It makes one ashamed of one's country to see the families of our brave fellows treated so. It makes one ashamed that these sad women should be sent from pillar to post, receiving "allotment" from one source and "relief" from another. We understand that, so far, what has been spent out of the Prince of Wales's Fund has gone to supplementing the sweated pay which the War Office offers as an inducement to recruiting. It is not fair. Soldiers and sailors of all grades should be well treated by their employer, the State. There should be no need for "charity" to step in to ensure at least a living wage to the man and his family.

Stop-Gaps.

It is because we are anxious the State should recognise its responsibility for proper payment of soldiers and sailors that we are not much attracted by a scheme propounded by Mr. Wells in the Daily Chronicle, that educated women should make themselves into "stop-gaps" for men in the less well-paid posts of clerks, servants, &c., who could then enlist while the educated women did their work, handing over their wage to the family of the soldier. This seems economically unsound. First, it is the duty of the Government to pay its own employees a decent wage. Secondly, there are very many less well educated women thrown out of present work who might step into these places. Thirdly, we greatly doubt whether there is any appreciable number of educated women who would stick at this sort of work. It is well to do the work that comes to hand. But there are not too many really well educated women to do the absolutely necessary jobs of directing business and expert work of all kinds. We expect Mr. Wells does not really mean "educated" women; he means idle women, and it would certainly be better that they should get busy, but not in such ways as to prevent working girls from finding suitable employment.

BRADFORD TAILORS' DISPUTE.

TRADES COUNCIL DISCUSSION.

A meeting of the Bradford Trades and Labour Council was held last night at the Trades Hall, Sunbridge Road. Alderman Michael Conway presided.

A delegate from the Amalgamated Society of Tailors made a statement with regard to a dispute between the society and two Bradford firms. The society, said the delegate, had had an agreement with both the firms. One of the firms had terminated the agreement in a proper manner, by means of a month's notice. They were doing away with the workpeople and were having their goods made in a factory, thus substituting female for male labour. The other firm had not given the workpeople notice, but had locked them out on a day's warning, and were having their goods made by Jewish workers. Both firms had been approached by the Lord Mayor with a view to a conference with members of the Amalgamated Society of Tailors, but intercession had been refused. The action of the firm in locking men out was the more objectionable because throughout the country workers had refrained during this time of war from striking for more wages.

Alderman Conway said the executive would consider what they could do to help the tailors. An understanding was come to and an agreement signed in May last, and it was thought then that the whole matter was settled. That agreement had now been broken, with the usual month's notice in one case.

Alderman Conway also made some comments with reference to the separation allowances and pensions for disabled soldiers and the dependents of the killed. There was no doubt, he said, that the agitation in the country had had its effect on the Government, but it had not had sufficient effect. The Government proposals, which had now been relegated to a Special Committee, were in advance of anything that had been done before. What trade unionists asked for was £1 a week for a widow, a disabled soldier, or a widowed mother who had been dependent. The £1 a week had only been granted to a widow with four children. That would only amount to 22 out of every 1,000 cases that came under the new provisions. The Government were not generous in their treatment of the totally disabled unless they had wives and children; and those would only amount to one-third of the whole. One weakness of the scheme was the inadequate provision for adult women. An adult woman who while her husband was fighting got 12s. 6d. a week if she had no children, got only 7s. 6d. if her husband were killed. Trade unionists should insist on a woman getting enough to live without working, if she desired not to work; for otherwise she would be at the mercy of those who underpaid female labour.

A delegate referred to the "black-legging" of trade unionists by Belgian refugees, remarking that a case had come to his notice from Nottingham in which a french polisher had been advertised for—"Belgian refugee preferred."

The Secretary (Mr. W. Barber) said the executive had no evidence of such cases within their own area, save in the case of a Belgian employed in a Bradford warehouse. There was not yet, however, sufficient warrant for making that case public.

It was stated in connection with the executive committee's minutes that the question of the employment of Belgians in competition with British workers had been referred to the secretary and Mr. A. T. Sutton, with power to call a special executive meeting if and when necessary.

The executive committee minutes stated that the Bradford Education Committee was to be urged to call the school for the blind to be opened at Odsal "Macmillan House" or "The Macmillan School" in recognition of the work of Miss Margaret Macmillan in connection with education in Bradford.

Glasgow Herald, Oct. 26th, 1914

659.

SCOTTISH LABOUR DEMANDS.

£1 A WEEK MINIMUM.

A conference representative of industrial and political Labour organisations in Scotland was held on Saturday in the City Hall Saloon, Candleriggs, Glasgow, to consider the administration of national relief. The conference dealt with various phases of the subject and passed resolutions relating to the provisions for soldiers and their dependants, the organisation of relief work for unemployed men and women, and the feeding and clothing of school children. Mr Robert Smillie, president of the Miners' Federation of Great Britain, presided, and papers dealing with different aspects of relief were read by Mr Joseph F. Duncan, Aberdeen, member of the Scottish Advisory Committee of the National Relief Fund; Mr Robert Allan, Edinburgh, member of the Parliamentary Committee of the Scottish Trades Congress; Mr Martin Haddow, member of Glasgow School Board; and Miss Agnes Young, of the Women Workers' Federation. There was a large attendance of delegates from the West of Scotland and other industrial districts of the country. One of the resolutions called for immediate statutory provision for adequate allowances (£1 per week being stated as a minimum) for dependants of men on service, invalided and disabled soldiers, and widows and other dependants.

The Chairman, in the course of his address, said that a large central Emergency Committee had been appointed from a Labour conference in London to look after the interests of the working classes during the continuance of the war. One of their objects was to see that Labour secured adequate representation on any committees that might be appointed to collect and distribute voluntary funds. In the case of relief to the dependants of soldiers and sailors the country had been practically denied the right of any voice in the administration. That work had been carefully reserved for the representatives of the middle or upper classes. The working classes, however, had the right in many localities of appointing persons to the local distress committees, and he regretted to say that they had not taken full advantage of that. Dealing with complaints regarding the distribution of relief funds he said that they could not have the sympathetic consideration which ought to be given in cases of this kind if that consideration was left to persons who had never themselves been face to face with privation. It was regrettable that in many cases that had been the position of matters so far as the distribution of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Families Fund was concerned. His own view was that the provision for the dependants of soldiers and sailors was a national responsibility, and that it should have been faced by the Government of the country. (Applause.) It should be a national charge, and in all probability there would shortly be such an agitation throughout the country that it would be made a national charge. He proposed a resolution calling upon the Government to make statutory provision immediately Parliament assembled for (1) the adequate maintenance of the dependants of soldiers and sailors serving with the colours; (2) adequate compensation in case of invalidity; (3) adequate pensions for permanent disablement; and (4) adequate pensions for widows and other dependants; and suggesting to the War Emergency Workers' National Committee that they should draft a scale accordingly and set on foot a national agitation to bring home to the conscience of the country the necessity which existed for such provision. Mr Smillie said that they had deliberately declined to state in the resolution what the allowances should be. They contented themselves by pointing out that up to the present time adequate provision had not been made. If they wanted to lay down a scale, that should be done by the National Emergency Committee. They wanted these provisions made not in an Army Order, but by statutory enactment placed on the Statute-book. The compensation to soldiers should not be based on the wages of the soldier. It should be based on the wages paid in the employment which the person left.

Councillor Taylor, Glasgow, moved that the words should be added—"In no case shall less than 20s per week be paid." He thought they should state that as a minimum, because the Government might require some assistance in deciding what the word "adequate" meant.

Ex-Bailie M'Kerrell seconded.

After some discussion the proposed addition was accepted, and the resolution was passed unanimously.

Mr Joseph F. Duncan read a paper dealing with the relief of distress occasioned by the effect of war on industry. After the war, he said, they would probably be faced with the biggest financial and industrial crisis they had ever known. It was necessary that they should have their machinery in order and schemes ready to meet that crisis. In every locality steps should be taken to get schemes prepared either by way of expediting existing work or creating new work. A great deal could be done by local authorities in that way. It was work they wanted, before relief. He moved a resolution emphasising "the necessity of vigilance and organised effort on the part of the working classes" regarding the constitution and operations of committees administering relief out of the National Fund, and also regarding the use of powers possessed by local authorities, the Local Government Board, the Board of Agriculture and Fisheries, the Road Board, the Development Commissioners, etc., in relation to unemployment. The resolution also called for higher standards of relief than those presently fixed, and asked that investigators should "pursue their inquiries with proper regard for the self-respect of those they visit."

[illegible] which was largely devoted to criticism of the Insurance Committee, the resolution was [illegible]

Daily Citizen, Nov. 3rd. 1914

659/2

£1 A WEEK FOR OUR DEFENDERS.

NATIONAL MOVEMENT AT WORK.

12 GREAT CONFERENCES.

Twelve great conferences of the Labour movement are to be held on Saturday in important industrial centres to press forward the recently-formulated national programme.

At yesterday's meeting of the War Emergency Workers' National Committee, at General-buildings, Aldwych, Mr. Arthur Henderson, M.P., presiding, it was reported that arrangements were in hand for the conferences.

The programme, which has already been published in The Daily Citizen, includes the following demands in respect of provision for disabled soldiers and sailors and their dependents:—

If totally incapable of earning a livelihood, a private should receive a minimum of £1 per week so long as incapacity continues.

If partially incapable of earning a livelihood, a private should have his income brought up to a minimum of £1 per week.

Pensions for the wives and dependents of privates losing their lives while with the colours should not be less than the total separation allowances, which are to be finally settled, including the allotments made from the private's pay.

That unmarried wives and their children should be given the full status of dependents.

That unmarried mothers should be given the full status of dependents.

That sailors and their dependents should receive equal treatment to that given to soldiers in this scheme.

That payments for disablement, incapacity, pensions, and separation allowances be administered by State machinery, and that the present system of utilising voluntary charitable organisations be discontinued.

That an allowance of £1 per week should be paid to the wives of the soldiers and sailors now serving with his Majesty's forces (without any deduction from the pay of the person serving at the front), and to the widows or other dependents whose husbands, brothers, or sons, etc., may be killed in the war, or who may die from wounds received, or disease contracted, in the war; also £1 per week to those who may be disabled for life, or, if partially disabled, until they are fully recovered from their injuries.

In addition to the above allowances a payment of 3s. 6d. per week should be made for each child under working age.

PROVISION OF WORK.

The provision of work for the unemployed at standard rates of wages is also urged in the programme.

In the event of the Government's proposals with regard to soldiers' and sailors' pay and pensions, etc., being deemed inadequate and unsatisfactory, the Parliamentary Labour Party will be requested to move an amendment to the Address at the opening of Parliament.

Speakers from the War Emergency Committee will attend the conferences, as follow:—

London, Memorial Hall: Mr. Sidney Webb, Miss Mary Macarthur and Miss Susan Lawrence, L.C.C. (representatives of the Central Committee of Women's Employment), and Mr. F. Knee.

Birmingham: Mr. G. N. Barnes, M.P.

Bristol: Mr. W. C. Anderson.

Cardiff: Mr. W. Brace, M.P., and Mr. Robert Williams.

Leeds: Miss Margaret Bondfield and Mr. H. M. Hyndman.

Leicester: Mr. J. Ramsay MacDonald, M.P.

Liverpool: Mr. H. Gosling, L.C.C.

Manchester: Mr. J. Cross and Dr. Marion Phillips.

Newcastle: Mr. Robert Smillie.

Norwich: Mr. W. H. Brown and Mr. Ben Cooper.

Plymouth: Mr. Ben Tillett.

Portsmouth: Mr. Stephen Sanders.

YESTERDAY'S PROTESTS.

Further resolutions of support have come from the following:—

National Union of Railwaymen—Shepherd's Bush, E. Norwood, Cardiff (No. 7), New Cross (No. 2), Birmingham (No. 5), Ilford, Mazehill, Bow (No. 1), Staple Hill, and Melton Constable branches.

Colne Labour Party.

Trades and Labour Councils—Eccles and district, Coatbridge, Airdrie and district, Pontefract, Plymouth, Stonehouse, Devonport and district, Llantrissant, Yeadon, Kettering, Seaham, and Blaenavon branches.

Independent Labour Party—Great Horton group of the Bradford branch and Wateville.

British Socialist Party—South Islington branch.

Workers' Union—Birkenhead branch.

Shop Assistants' Union—Swansea, Leyton, and Charing Cross branches and the Northern District Council (representing over 5,000 members).

Amalgamated Society of Engineers—Birmingham branch.

Railway Women's Guild—Lancaster branch.

Railway Clerks' Association—Oldham branch.

Women's Section of the National Union of Paper Workers—Maidstone branch.

Amalgamated Union of Upholsterers—Liverpool branch.

Amalgamated Society of Wood-cutting Machinists—Oldham branch.

Socialist Party of the Thornton Heath Parliament.

National Amalgamated Labourers' Union—Swansea (No. 1) branch.

Amalgamated Union of Operative Bakers and Confectioners—Swindon branch.

Nottingham and Notts Federation of P.S.A.s and Brotherhoods (representing upwards of 30 societies with several thousands of members).

Society of Operative Stonemasons—London District Committee.

Postmen's Federation—W.D. Office. "Opinions were freely expressed by my members," writes the secretary, "regarding the disgraceful way in which formerly the men have been treated, and it was hoped that the efforts of our paper will be the means of putting those who bear the brunt of the nation's patriotism into a position which will make it unnecessary for them, after serving their country, to take to the selling of matches and bootlaces and the carrying of advertising boards in the gutters of our towns."

Amalgamated Society of Carpenters and Joiners—Cambridge branch.

Typographical Association—Halifax branch.

National Amalgamated Furnishing Trades Association—Preston branch.

OUR LEAFLET FUND.

Additional subscriptions towards the cost of printing leaflets in support of the £1 a week campaign will be welcomed by the Circulation Manager, The Daily Citizen, 92, Fleet-street, E.C. Yesterday we received the following sums:—

£2 from Mr. G. M. F. Cream, Glasgow; 5s. Mr. Nash, Walthamstow; 3s. Mr. O. Beacham, Highbury; 2s. 6d. Mr. Fullamore, Oldham; 2s. Mr. Ingham, Horbury; 1s. 6d. Mr. Kirkby, Deptford; 1s. each Rev. J. Goodyear, Tipton, and Mr. Taylor, Nuneaton; 6d. each Mr. Sidbotham, Hollingworth, Mr. Lawton, Langley Park, Mr. Burrell, Chorley Wood, and Mr. Weaver, Nelson. Total to date: £58 6s. 8d.

local distress committees, and he regretted to say that they had not taken full advantage of that. Dealing with complaints regarding the distribution of relief funds he said that they could not have the sympathetic consideration which ought to be given in cases of this kind if that consideration was left to persons who had never themselves been face to face with privation. It was regrettable that in many cases that had been the position of matters so far as the distribution of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Families Fund was concerned. His own view was that the provision for the dependants of soldiers and sailors was a national responsibility, and that it should have been faced by the Government of the country. (Applause.) It should be a national charge, and in all probability there would shortly be such an agitation throughout the country that it would be made a national charge. He proposed a resolution calling upon the Government to make statutory provision immediately Parliament assembled for (1) the adequate maintenance of the dependants of soldiers and sailors serving with the colours; (2) adequate compensation in case of invalidity; (3) adequate pensions for permanent disablement; and (4) adequate pensions for widows and other dependants; and suggesting to the War Emergency Workers' National Committee that they should draft a scale accordingly and set on foot a national agitation to bring home to the conscience of the country the necessity which existed for such provision. Mr Smillie said that they had deliberately declined to state in the resolution what the allowances should be. They contented themselves by pointing out that up to the present time adequate provision had not been made. If they wanted to lay down a scale, that should be done by the National Emergency Committee. They wanted these provisions made not in an Army Order, but by statutory enactment placed on the Statute-book. The compensation to soldiers should not be based on the wages of the soldier. It should be based on the wages paid in the employment which the person left.

Councillor Taylor, Glasgow, moved that the words should be added—"In no case shall less than 20s per week be paid." He thought they should state that as a minimum, because the Government might require some assistance in deciding what the word "adequate" meant.

Ex-Bailie M'Kerrell seconded.

After some discussion the proposed addition was accepted, and the resolution was passed unanimously.

Mr Joseph F. Duncan read a paper dealing with the relief of distress occasioned by the effect of war on industry. After the war, he said, they would probably be faced with the biggest financial and industrial crisis they had ever known. It was necessary that they should have their machinery in order and schemes ready to meet that crisis. In every locality steps should be taken to get schemes prepared either by way of expediting existing work or creating new work. A great deal could be done by local authorities in that way. It was work they wanted, before relief. He moved a resolution emphasising "the necessity of vigilance and organised effort on the part of the working classes" regarding the constitution and operations of committees administering relief out of the National Fund, and also regarding the use of powers possessed by local authorities, the Local Government Board, the Board of Agriculture and Fisheries, the Road Board, the Development Commissioners, etc., in relation to unemployment. The resolution also called for higher standards of relief than those presently fixed, and asked that investigators should "pursue their inquiries with proper regard for the self-respect of those they visit."

After considerable discussion, which was largely devoted to criticism of the Advisory Committee, the resolution was passed unanimously.

Mr Robert Allan dealt in his paper with the work of relief committees and local authorities, and proposed a resolution expressing regret at the inactivity in areas where people are suffering distress through the war, and calling upon the Government to revise the constitution of committees which fail to prepare and carry out schemes of employment by making compulsory a large representation of working class organisations.

Mr Martin Haddow dealt with the feeding and clothing of school children, and Miss Young with the relief work for women who have lost their employment in consequence of the war.

The resolutions submitted on these subjects were passed unanimously.

privates losing their lives while with the colours should not be less than the total separation allowances, which are to be finally settled, including the allotments made from the private's pay.

That unmarried wives and their children should be given the full status of dependents.

That unmarried mothers should be given the full status of dependents.

That sailors and their dependents should receive equal treatment to that given to soldiers in this scheme.

That payments for disablement, incapacity, pensions, and separation allowances be administered by State machinery, and that the present system of utilising voluntary charitable organisations be discontinued.

That an allowance of £1 per week should be paid to the wives of the soldiers and sailors now serving with his Majesty's forces (without any deduction from the pay of the person serving at the front), and to the widows or other dependents whose husbands, brothers, or sons, etc., may be killed in the war, or who may die from wounds received, or disease contracted, in the war; also £1 per week to those who may be disabled for life, or, if partially disabled, until they are fully recovered from their injuries.

In addition to the above allowances a payment of 3s. 6d. per week should be made for each child under working age.

PROVISION OF WORK.

The provision of work for the unemployed at standard rates of wages is also urged in the programme.

In the event of the Government's proposals with regard to soldiers' and sailors' pay and pensions, etc., being deemed inadequate and unsatisfactory, the Parliamentary Labour Party will be requested to move an amendment to the Address at the opening of Parliament.

Speakers from the War Emergency Committee will attend the conferences, as follow:—

London, Memorial Hall: Mr. Sidney Webb, Miss Mary Macarthur and Miss Susan Lawrence, L.C.C. (representatives of the Central Committee of Women's Employment), and Mr. F. Knee.

Birmingham: Mr. G. N. Barnes, M.P.

Bristol: Mr. W. C. Anderson.

Cardiff: Mr. W. Brace, M.P., and Mr. Robert Williams.

Leeds: Miss Margaret Bondfield and Mr. H. M. Hyndman.

Leicester: Mr. J. Ramsay MacDonald, M.P.

Liverpool: Mr. H. Gosling, L.C.C.

Manchester: Mr. J. Cross and Dr. Marion Phillips.

Newcastle: Mr. Robert Smillie.

Norwich: Mr. W. H. Brown and Mr. Ben Cooper.

Plymouth: Mr. Ben Tillett.

Portsmouth: Mr. Stephen Sanders.

Postmen's Federation—W.D. Office. "Opinions were freely expressed by my members," writes the secretary, "regarding the disgraceful way in which formerly the men have been treated, and it was hoped that the efforts of our paper will be the means of putting those who bear the brunt of the nation's patriotism into a position which will make it unnecessary for them, after serving their country, to take to the selling of matches and bootlaces and the carrying of advertising boards in the gutters of our towns."

Amalgamated Society of Carpenters and Joiners—Cambridge branch.

Typographical Association—Halifax branch.

National Amalgamated Furnishing Trades Association—Preston branch.

OUR LEAFLET FUND.

Additional subscriptions towards the cost of printing leaflets in support of the £1 a week campaign will be welcomed by the Circulation Manager, The Daily Citizen, 92, Fleet-street, E.C. Yesterday we received the following sums:—

£2 from Mr. G. M. F. Cream, Glasgow; 5s. Mr. Nash, Walthamstow; 3s. Mr. O. Beacham, Highbury; 2s. 6d. Mr. Fullamore, Oldham; 2s. Mr. Ingham, Horbury; 1s. 6d. Mr. Kirkby, Deptford; 1s. each Rev. J. Goodyear, Tipton, and Mr. Taylor, Nuneaton; 6d. each Mr. Sidbotham, Hollingworth, Mr. Lawton, Langley Park, Mr. Burrell, Chorley Wood, and Mr. Weaver, Nelson. Total to date: £58 6s. 8d.

659/3

659.

Justice, Nov. 5th. 1914.

THE NATIONAL WORKERS' (WAR EMERGENCY) COMMITTEE.

The provision of work for the unemployed at standard rates of wages is being actively urged by the above Committee.

In the event of the Government's proposals with regard to soldiers' and sailors' pay and pensions, etc., being deemed inadequate and unsatisfactory, the Parliamentary Labour Party will be requested to move an amendment to the Address at the opening of Parliament.

A series of Conferences on these questions will take place next Saturday, and speakers from the War Emergency Committee will attend as follows :—

London, Memorial Hall : Sidney Webb, Miss Mary Macarthur and Miss Susan Lawrence, L.C.C. (representatives of the Central Committee of Women's Employment), and F. Knee.

Birmingham : G. N. Barnes, M.P.

Bristol : W. C. Anderson.

Cardiff : W. Brace, M.P., and Robert Williams.

Liverpool : H. Gosling, L.C.C.

Leeds : Miss Margaret Bondfield and H. M. Hyndman.

Leicester : J. Ramsay MacDonald, M.P.

Manchester : J. Cross and Dr. Marion Phillips.

Newcastle : Robert Smillie.

Norwich : W. H. Brown and Ben Cooper.

Plymouth : Ben Tillett.

Portsmouth : Stephen Sanders.

Western Press, Nov. 5th. 1914

THE LABOUR PARTY AND THE WAR.

One of a series of conferences of Labour representatives, arranged to be held in different centres, will take place at Kingsley Hall, Old Market Street, on Saturday afternoon, to discuss proposals for naval and military pensions recommended by the Emergency Workers' National Committee. The conference will be attended by representatives of trade union branches, Socialist societies, co-operative and industrial women's organisations, and the Workers' National Committee have arranged for the attendance on their behalf of Mr W. C. Anderson (Chairman of the National Labour Party Executive). The invitation circular is signed by Mr Arthur Henderson and Mr J. S. Middleton (chairman and hon. secretary respectively of the Workers' National Committee), Mr T. C. Lewis (secretary of the Bristol Trades Council), and Mr J. M. Burleigh (secretary of the Bristol Labour Representation Committee).

Bolton Evening News, Nov. 13th. 1914. 659.

The War and the Home.

Within the last few days we have published several letters strongly complaining of delay in the payment of allowances to soldiers' dependents. These letters would have carried more grace and weight if they had betrayed the slightest appreciation of the magnitude and complexity of the problem. Our correspondents, we presume, know that whilst the regular Army contained a quarter million soldiers at the beginning of August, and only 3 per cent. of these were "married on the strength," by the end of October the same Army contained 1,180,000 men, and that every married man of these is "on the strength" for separation allowance. Imagine a concern—say a mill or a church—suddenly called upon to increase its operations, not 45 per cent., but forty-five-fold. The Financial Secretary of the War Office stated last night that the pay staff had been increased ten-fold, but even so it is only by working day and night in relays that the work has been at all overtaken. And it is not possible, in the heart of an emergency, to revolutionize every part of a system gradually evolved through the experience of many years. We can share the sorrow, and even the indignation, of our correspondents at the cruelty of certain hard cases, but we must look at them in a true perspective, and not condemn a whole system or add difficulties to a tremendous crisis, by fastening attention on them. Some of these cases are entirely the fault of the soldiers themselves or of their wives; and in Bolton at any rate the majority of the cases arise from a single act of gross ineptitude for which the War Office has no blame at all. Besides, it ought to be distinctly understood that every case of delay in satisfying genuine claims to allowances should be met by the Local Administrative Relief Committee, not as relief (and therefore not as charity), but as an advance merely, to be repaid to the Committee when the allowance arrives. In this way both hardship and the "taint" of charity would be avoided. We understand that this is being actually done in 750 cases—a fact which nobody would imagine from our correspondents' letters. Whilst we are on this subject, we desire to raise it in a broader way. When the war broke out it was at once obvious that the distinctive work of women would be to look after every aspect of the war which primarily concerned the homes of England. We confess to some disappointment that women have not risen to the height of the great opportunity which was and still is theirs. We know full well all the difficulties that lay before them—lack of organization, the non-recognition of their claims to representation, the thwarting of some of their desires—and the like. But these difficulties were there to be surmounted. To put the whole matter briefly, we will merely indicate the main objects which we feel women ought to set before them in this war: it is not too late to focus them, for the struggle will be a long one. In the first place, then, we should like to see women organized as a community, under proper leaders, and working through a Women's Council for the duration of the war. They would make it their most urgent, and throughout their primary, business, to serve the interests of the soldier's wife. Had they been organized and active, they could have rendered splendid assistance to numerous perplexed women who have wrestled with all sorts of difficulties about papers and allowances. We believe that if women had made the effort sufficiently, they could have obtained charge of all the monetary and other relief given through Local Committees—and in particular the Bolton Committee—to soldiers' families. That would have given them scope for invaluable social service of several kinds. Why should not women, for instance, have organized a true comradeship for soldiers' wives, recognizing their peculiar social needs at this time? It is very nice, of course, to make the returned soldier comfortable—provide him with clubs, and weekly teas, and the like; but the absent soldier's wife needs social help a great deal more. Police surveillance of weak women is deeply repugnant to our common instincts: true comradeship could accomplish a great deal more, not by restraint, but by constraint. We know it is supremely difficult work, but it is also invaluable. Insensibly it could lead to better housewifery and mothercraft in our town. A third kind of service is, we rejoice to note, being undertaken, in the care for child welfare; but even this might have been extended had women workers secured access to all soldiers' wives, and by friendship discovered their needs. There is as much knitting needed for the homes as for the troops. A fourth line of effort for women would have been the discovery of ways of finding work and wages for unemployed women. One of our correspondents, by inference, throws blame on the authorities; but he must know that the creating of suitable employment is a most difficult matter: Queen Mary's Special Committee has discovered that. An ounce of suggestion would be worth a pound of reproach: and perhaps a Women's Council could solve the problem for Bolton. Finally, a Women's Council could have done, could still do, much to help recruiting—which after all is the country's supreme need today. We do not suggest help by the detestable "white feather" methods—but rather by the inculcation, among mothers, sisters, sweethearts, of that spirit expressed in a mother's letter recently found on a young officer—"When you are sent to perform a great deed, don't remember my tears, but only my blessing."

The Co-operative News, Nov. 7th. 1914.

OUR SOLDIERS AND SAILORS.

Women Co-operators Support the £1 a Week Campaign.

From Hanley.

At the last meeting of the Hanley Guild (Staffs.), the following resolution was pased unanimously:—

> That this meeting of the Hanley branch of the Women's Co-operative Guild urges that the Government should state definitely that widows of soldiers and sailors and mothers who are depending on their sons, and men who are disabled in the war, shall be adequately provided for.

We are also forwarding this resolution to Mr. George Barnes, M.P. We hope justice will not be delayed much longer.

Support for a similar resolution has been given at various other Guild conferences and meetings held during the past week.

Co-op. News, Nov. 7th. 1914. 65914

Soldiers' Pensions and Allowances.

Following the references in the "Co-operative News" to the question of military pensions, Mr. G. N. Barnes, M.P., has received shoals of correspondence from societies in all parts of the country. Such letters should really be sent to the Government and to the local M.P.'s. In order to prevent any misunderstanding as to the points recommended by the National Committee, these have just been tabulated. They provide that if totally incapable of earning a livelihood, a private should receive a minimum of £1 so long as total incapacity continues. If partially incapable of earning a livelihood, he should have his income brought up to a minimum of £1 per week. Pensions for the widows and dependents of privates losing their lives while with the colours should not be less than the total separation allowances, which are to be finally settled, including the allotments from the private's day. The committee are also urging that sailors, whose allowances are somewhat obscure, should not be placed in a worse position than our soldiers. At yesterday's meeting of the National Workers' Emergency Committee, it was further agreed, on the suggestion of the Miners' Federation, to press for an allowance of £1 per week to be paid to the wives of the soldiers and sailors now abroad—without any deduction from the pay of the person serving at the front. This point will be emphasised at the conferences on Saturday when the selected speakers for the twelve towns will include Messrs. Barnes and Brace, M.P.'s, H. M. Hyndman, B. Tillett, R. Smillie, Miss MacArthur, Dr. Marion Phillips, and one of the co-operative representatives, the latter being appointed to the Norwich meeting.

Nation. 21. 11. 14.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Every organ that claims to be advanced has raised an outcry with regard to the Government plan for the payment of soldiers' wives. Parts of the scheme are certainly deplorable, as, for instance, placing these women under police supervision in order to force them to spend their own money according to our liking. The point, however, that rouses most indignation, and that you yourself characterize as "indefensible," is the minimum pension of 7s. 6d. a week for the childless widow. This sum is regarded as shamefully low. I contend it is high: 7s. 6d. a week, we are told, is not enough for a woman to live on. It is not. But why should such a woman live on it? The widows who would receive this amount are the young and able-bodied, without children. Many of them are newly married; they would not be worn out by the hard trade of child-bearing and child-rearing on scanty means. Almost without exception they would have earned their own living previous to their marriage. Why should they not again do so? Is there any reason for the State to deprive itself of their service and add their number to the drone class?

This may be considered as a heartless method of viewing these newly made war-widows. On the contrary, far from minimizing their loss, I feel it is so great that no money can compensate them for it. But I also feel that to discourage them from paid work is to increase and not lessen their suffering and loneliness. What else are they to do all day? A pension is needed for young, healthy women in order to lay the haunting spectre of unemployment, not to introduce it. Work is part of human dignity. It is the people who would insist on keeping these women out of the labor market who, in my opinion, are treating them as a "serf class."

The case is, of course, completely altered if the woman has children. The care of the children is quite enough work, and quite important enough work, for any woman. If the mother prefers to enter some wage-earning pursuit—which would very rarely be the case—she would still need an adequate pension in order to pay a substitute to take her place in the home. Consequently, the proposed pension for the widow with children, which is quoted as more liberal than that of the childless widow, appears to me less liberal. It seems, indeed, barely adequate, although it probably averages as much as the women have been receiving before. For though the artizan's widow will be getting considerably less than in her husband's lifetime, the laborer's widow will be getting more, allowing for the former expenses of the man.

There is a further difference between keeping the childless widow out of the labor market and keeping the widow with children out of it. In the former case the State is incurring a definite extra expense. It is a luxury to support a person who can support herself. As the State is chiefly made up of poor and struggling people, it is doubtful whether it can afford this luxury. With regard to the widow with young children, the State is incurring no extra expense. The children cannot support themselves. If enough money is not given to the mother to feed and care for them, the money and even more of it must be given to the workhouse or the orphanage, or the hospital. This apparently has been realized in the case of the soldier's widow. Let us only hope that it may soon be realized in the case of all widows. Every good workman who dies has fallen for his country. He has fallen, not in the destructive battle of death, but in the constructive battle of life.—Yours, &c.,

EDITH AYRTON ZANGWILL.

The East End Parish News
November 16th, 1914

The Nation, Nov. 21st. 1914. (659

THE WIDOW'S CASE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In your issue of November 7th you have an article full of sympathy and insight, entitled "Soldiers' Wives." The writer dwells upon the loneliness and tedium of these women's lives, and quotes the case of a woman who, in despair, went out to work and put her child into a crèche. In your issue of last Saturday, you urge more than once the importance of giving the childless widow of a soldier a sufficient sum "to keep her out of the labor market altogether." If a soldier's wife is dull at home with little to do, what about the soldier's widow with no child to care for and no husband to think about? We all want to do the very best that can be done for soldiers' widows, and there can be no doubt that where there are children a widow should receive enough to enable her to remain at home and care for them; but, surely, an able-bodied woman with neither husband nor child would naturally wish to return to wage-earning, and there is no reason why the community should be deprived of her working capacity. What is the object of keeping a childless widow out of the labor market? Is it because it is more honorable for her to be maintained than to work for wages, or because a woman is a frail creature that cannot be expected to earn her living? If the object is to prevent a widow taking work at a low wage, it may well be argued that the less need she has for wages, the more likely she is to take work for anything she may be offered.

We may well feel that we do not care for these arguments and theories just now in our desire to deal generously with our soldiers and their widows, but the demand for pensions for the widows of those who lose their lives in industry will surely follow, and then the question must be faced, for the whole status of women as workers in the community will be involved.—Yours, &c.,

C. DOROTHEA RACKHAM.

Cambridge, November 14th, 1914.

[The question is whether society should compel a childless woman whose husband—a soldier or sailor—has given his life for the State, to become a wage-earner. (It must not be assumed, of course, that every soldier's wife was a wage-earner before marriage.) Mrs. Rackham, we gather, thinks the answer is "Yes," on the ground (1) that the State ought not to be deprived of her working capacity; (2) that to give her maintenance is to imply that the status of a wage-earner is less honorable; (3) that the alternative to wage-earning is a life of ennui and idleness; (4) that if she has enough to live on, she will accept sweated wages more readily than if she has only part of her maintenance from the State. With all the respect due to Mrs. Rackham's judgment on such a question, we venture to submit that argument (1) applies just as much to the widows of officers. The State has no greater claim on the widow of a miner who has enlisted than on the widow of a general; the same consideration applies to (2). We may wish that everybody earned his or her own living, and that the world was so arranged that everybody could do this with satisfaction and pleasure. We have to take the world as it is, and though the position of wage-earner is in no sense or case less honorable, it may be, in certain circumstances, less desirable. That is to say, to compel a woman who may or may not have been trained as a wage-earner, and had no reason to expect to become one, to seek her living in that way may be to put a hardship upon her. That, with regard to (3), it is no more true of the working class than of other classes that a woman who is not earning her living is necessarily wasting her life and unoccupied. There is ample scope, not only in private relationships but in public work. A working woman whose maintenance did not depend on a local employer, who could serve on Boards of Guardians or other public bodies, would often be invaluable. (4) If a woman has no private resources, she goes into the labor market on equal terms with her competitors; if she has some private resources, but not enough to maintain her, she must go into the labor market, and she does so under special conditions which may lead her, consciously or unconsciously, to depress the rate of wages. If she has enough to live on, she may choose some other mode of life; if she becomes a wage-earner, her independence may make her more particular about her terms. A correspondent wrote to the "Times" in alarm the other day to say that if all soldiers' widows were to have pensions that would keep them, the upper classes would soon find themselves short of servants.—ED., NATION.]

Daily News & Leader, Nov. 19th. 1914.

PARLIAMENT.

PENSIONS COMMITTEE SET UP.

PREMIER'S VIEW.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON AND THE RAILWAYMAN.

(From Our Parliamentary Correspondent.)

WESTMINSTER, Wednesday Night.

Yesterday the House considered the war debt as expressed in money. To-day the House discussed the war debt, as embodied in life and limb and sorrow. A Committee was appointed to determine what allowances and pensions shall be made to the wives, widows and dependents of soldiers and seamen killed, injured, or invalided during the war. Mr. Bonar Law, Mr. Austen Chamberlain, and Mr. Lloyd George will all serve on this small but powerful body.

The Prime Minister, in his brief speech this afternoon, deprecated a detailed criticism of the White Paper which has already set out the Government's first thoughts He is as sympathetic as Mr. Barnes himself towards the dependents of men killed and injured. He readily accepted amendments to the terms of reference of the Committee, which make it quite clear that the officer is included in the inquiry, and that disease arising through the war is also covered. But he points out, first, that the general finance of the State is an element in the problem, and that the good of the dependents themselves must not be overlooked. Both Mr. Asquith and Mr. Bonar Law recalled the case of the civil war pensions in the United States, which were granted on very lax conditions.

WIDOWS AS WORKERS.

Mr. Asquith said the other day that if the childless widow's pension were raised beyond 7s. 6d. a week she might compete unfairly with her sister in the industrial market. Mr. Barnes took up this point with some vigour, urging that a higher pension would remove the widow altogether from such competition, and that a small pension always tends, as in the case of commissionaires, to depress wages.

The Prime Minister did not pursue the argument, beyond insisting with emphasis that for the young widow, accustomed to work, who has no children, a life of complete economic independence would be no real benefit. "We all have to work," added Mr. Asquith, "or we all ought to."

Even Mr. Barnes had his doubts about the two [illegible]tuity to widows on remarriage. The sum of money, which has been hitherto £13, would be in future £39. "The widow," said Mr. Barnes, "will be a bait to some mercenary-minded man. I would prefer a higher pension and no gratuity."

EGYPTIAN WAR RELICS.

The discussion was significant because it marks a complete revolution in the theory of war. As Mr. Hayes Fisher reminded the House, there are living in England to-day soldiers who fought in the Egyptian War, and dependents of such soldiers, who have received no provision at all from the State. Thus there must arise the question whether the scheme is or is not to be made retrospective.

Mr. Barnes hazarded "the arresting reflection" that the subject only received attention when the soldier ceased to be drawn from the poorest class. Also he asked why a deceased officer's pension should be receivable by his mother or sisters, while a deceased soldier's pension is limited to his wife, and ends if she dies or if the soldier is unmarried.

Mr. Hayes Fisher and Mr. Barnes were pleading the same cause, and were full of compliments to one another. But in one important respect there was a difference between their outlook. Mr. Hayes Fisher, with long personal experience of the Royal Patriotic Fund and of Chelsea Hospital, thinks that, in addition to a flat rate for pensions, there should be a lump sum, vested in some trustee organisation, to be used in special cases where more money is needed.

STATE CONTROL.

Mr. Barnes is utterly opposed to any society coming between the State and the servants of the State. "We ask," said he, "for the pensions as a right, and not as a charity. We have had enough of fussy people pestering the working classes during the last three months, and the religious sectary is the worst of the whole lot."

He told a story of a visitor going into a Roman Catholic house and seeing evidences of the faith on the walls. "The person," said Mr Barnes, bluntly, "went down on his marrow bones, and prayed for the home, afterwards leaving a tract which showed how a solicitor was converted by an applewoman. This sort of thing is getting sickening; we have had enough of the insufferable superiority of the voluntary societies."

Mr. Baker hinted that money was paid through the Post Office.

"They've got nothing yet," replied Mr. Barnes, who sometimes displays a combative instinct.

£1 A WEEK DEMANDED.

A number of local authorities have asked for the minimum of £1 a week pension for the soldier's widow. The miners, for whom Mr. Brace spoke, want to add 3s. 6d. a week for each child. It is doubtless an anomaly that the pension proposed in the White Paper will often fall below the separation allowance which the widow is to enjoy for the first six months after her husband's death at the front Mr. Hayes Fisher calculates that if 20,000 widows are left with 40,000 dependent children, and if 10s. be allowed for the widow and 2s. 6d. for each such child, the cost to the State will work out at £780,000 a year—a sum which diminishes, of course, with the maturing of the children Thus, one halfpenny on the income-tax (worth, say, £1,500,000) would easily cover a generous provision for widows.

The real expense is the allowance for total and partial disablement. If the war lasts for two years, and two millions of men are engaged; and if there are 40,000 deaths and 48,000 disablements, then the total cost of the pensions and allowances, spread over a term of years (as defined by the White Paper) will be £202,000,000. The maximum expenditure in any one year will be £8,250,000 or 3¼d. on the income tax The advocates of a more generous scale urged that it is hardly expected that the war will last for two years.

On one aspect of the case Labour is very insistent. A man totally disabled at the war will receive 5s. a week if he belongs to the National Insurance Fund. Mr. Barnes pointed out that this charge will have to be met by the approved societies, and is really not a discharge of the special war debt due from the State.

Although there is no political controversy in these days, the House is far from dull. Mr. Thomas, the railway member, asked why a Great Eastern man, discharged from the Army because of his bad teeth, had not been taken back into the service of the company. Lord Claud Hamilton regarded the question as "an aspersion on his personal honour."

"An aspersion on my honour," said the speaker, "appeared on the order paper for a whole session." (Laughter.)

Lord Claud murmured a retort that amused the House.

"The Hamiltons," he muttered, "must be more sensitive than the Lowthers."

At the end of questions a number of Liberals asked the Speaker if the noble lord was in order in speaking for his company instead of for his constituents. The Speaker ruled that after all Ministers of the Crown reply for the Government—which parallel was respectfully argued by the appellants. However, Lord Claud got in his say, which was that the railwayman had been refused employment by a stationmaster who was dissatisfied with the Army report on his conduct, but that a higher official had at once reversed the decision.

The House cheered this explanation, the Speaker observing:

"I don't see how the noble lord's [illegible]

Nation, Dec. 5th. 1914. 659.

SOLDIERS' WIDOWS' PENSIONS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Instead of sinecure pensions it might be practicable to make it compulsory for the Government to provide work as an alternative at a reasonable minimum wage, with fair hours of employment. I refer, of course, to widows without family.—Yours, &c.,

A. J. MARRIOTT.

249, Ladbroke Grove, Notting Hill.
December 2nd, 1914.

P.S.—If work could not be provided, or during unemployment, I think 15s. weekly would be a reasonable pension.

houghts He is as sympathetic as Mr. Barnes himself towards the dependents of men killed and injured. He readily accepted amendments to the terms of reference of the Committee, which make it quite clear that the officer is included in the inquiry, and that disease arising through the war is also covered. But he points out, first, that the general finance of the State is an element in the problem, and that the good of the dependents themselves must not be overlooked. Both Mr. Asquith and Mr. Bonar Law recalled the case of the civil war pensions in the United States, which were granted on very lax conditions.

WIDOWS AS WORKERS.

Mr. Asquith said the other day that if the childless widow's pension were raised beyond 7s. 6d. a week she might compete unfairly with her sister in the industrial market. Mr. Barnes took up this point with some vigour, urging that a higher pension would remove the widow altogether from such competition, and that a small pension always tends, as in the case of commissionaires, to depress wages.

The Prime Minister did not pursue the argument, beyond insisting with emphasis that for the young widow, accustomed to work, who has no children, a life of complete economic independence would be no real benefit. "We all have to work," added Mr. Asquith, "or we all ought to."

Even Mr. Barnes had his doubts about the two [illegible]tuity to widows on remarriage. The sum of money, which has been hitherto £13, would be in future £39. "The widow," said Mr. Barnes, "will be a bait to some mercenary-minded man. I would prefer a higher pension and no gratuity."

EGYPTIAN WAR RELICS.

The discussion was significant because it marks a complete revolution in the theory of war. As Mr. Hayes Fisher reminded the House, there are living in England to-day soldiers who fought in the Egyptian War, and dependents of such soldiers, who have received no provision [illegible] from the State. Thus there must arise the question whether the scheme is or is not to be made retrospective.

Mr. Barnes hazarded "the arresting reflection" that the subject only received attention when the soldier ceased to be drawn from the poorest class. Also he asked why a deceased officer's pension should be receivable by his mother or sisters, while a deceased soldier's pension is limited to his wife, and ends if she dies or if the soldier is unmarried.

native instinct.

£1 A WEEK DEMANDED.

A number of local authorities have asked for the minimum of £1 a week pension for the soldier's widow. The miners, for whom Mr. Brace spoke, want to add 3s. 6d. a week for each child. It is doubtless an anomaly that the pension proposed in the White Paper will often fall below the separation allowance which the widow is to enjoy for the first six months after her husband's death at the front. Mr. Hayes Fisher calculates that if 20,000 widows are left with 40,000 dependent children, and if 10s. be allowed for the widow and 2s. 6d. for each such child, the cost to the State will work out at £780,000 a year—a sum which diminishes, of course, with the maturing of the children. Thus, one halfpenny on the income-tax (worth, say, £1,500,000) would easily cover a generous provision for widows.

The real expense is the allowance for total and partial disablement. If the war lasts for two years, and two millions of men are engaged; and if there are 40,000 deaths and 48,000 disablements, then the total cost of the pensions and allowances, spread over a term of years (as defined by the White Paper) will be £202,000,000. The maximum expenditure in any one year will be £8,250,000 or 3½d. on the income tax. The advocates of a more generous scale urged that it is hardly expected that the war will last for two years.

On one aspect of the case Labour is very insistent. A man totally disabled at the war will receive 5s. a week if he belongs to the National Insurance Fund. Mr. Barnes pointed out that this charge will have to be met by the approved societies, and is really not a discharge of the special war debt due from the State.

Although there is no political controversy in these days, the House is far from dull. Mr. Thomas, the railway member, asked why a Great Eastern man, discharged from the Army because of his bad teeth, had not been taken back into the service of the company. Lord Claud Hamilton regarded the question as "an aspersion on his personal honour."

"An aspersion on my honour," said the speaker, "appeared on the order paper for a whole session." (Laughter.)

Lord Claud murmured a retort that amused the House.

"The Hamiltons," he muttered, "must be more sensitive than the Lowthers."

At the end of questions a number of Liberals asked the Speaker if the noble lord was in order in speaking for his company instead of for his constituents. The Speaker ruled that after all Ministers of the Crown reply for the Government—which parallel was respectfully argued by the appellants. However, Lord Claud got in his say, which was that the railwayman had been refused employment by a stationmaster who was dissatisfied with the Army report on his conduct, but that a higher official had at once reversed the decision.

The House cheered this explanation, the Speaker observing:

"I don't see how the noble lord's honour is in any way affected by the error of a stationmaster."

FUR COATS FOR THE FRONT.

Perhaps the best news of the day was Mr. Tennant's statement that fur coats are going to the soldiers in the trenches.

"We cannot," said he, "send 200,000 all at once, but we are doing our best to meet the urgent cases."

People who, owing to the doubled super-tax, are now too poor to wear fur coats, might send the same to the War Office.

P. W. W.

Yorkshire Observer Dec 14/14

659.659/6

ARMY AND NAVY PAY AND PENSIONS.

A BRADFORD CONFERENCE.

A conference on the subject of pay and pensions for soldiers and sailors and their dependents was held on Saturday at the Trades Hall, Bradford. There were present representatives of all political, religious, trade union, social, co-operative, and women's organisations. The chair was occupied by Alderman Michael Conway, and on the platform were Mr. F. W. Jowett, M.P., Dr. Marion Phillips (both members of the War Emergency Committee), Alderman Joseph Hayhurst, Mr. J. H. Palin, and Mr. Walter Barber. There were also present the Vicar of Bradford (the Rev. F. T. Woods), Dr. Griffith-Jones (principal of the Yorkshire United College), Canon Sutcliffe Thomas, the Rev. R. B. McKee (Vicar of Eccleshill), the Rev. A. C. Gower Rees, the Rev. W. A. J. Graham, the Rev. Holden Pickup, the Rev. Cecil Thomas, the Rev. Stuart Douglas, the Rev. G. Herbert East, the Rev. Oliver Ransford, Alderman A. Pickles, Mr. Fred Pickering (secretary of the Chamber of Trades) and others. The proposals before the conference in regard to pay and allowances were as follow:—

(a) If totally incapacitated from earning a livelihood a private should receive a minimum of £1 per week so long as total incapacity continues.

(b) If partially incapable of earning a livelihood a private should have his income brought up to a minimum of £1 per week.

(c) Pensions for the wives and dependents of privates losing their lives while with the colours should not be less than the total separation allowances, which are to be finally settled, including the allotments made from the private's pay.

(d) That unmarried wives and their children should be given the full pay of dependents.

(e) That unmarried mothers should be given the status of dependents.

(f) That sailors and their dependents should receive equal treatment to that given to soldiers in this scheme.

(g) That payments for disablement, incapacity, pensions, and separtion allowances be administered by State machinery, and that the present system of utilising voluntary charitable organisations be discontinued.

Mr. Barber announced that there were represented fifty-two trade union organisations, thirty-six political organisations, twenty-eight organisations connected with religious bodies, nine co-operative organisations, fifty-two organisations connected with chambers of trade, the City Guild of Help, the Shipley Trades Council, and five friendly society organisations. The total number of organisations which had promised to send delegates was 139, representing a membership of 86,796.

Alderman Conway said the problem to be considered was a unique one that had arisen through thousands of men who did not intend to make the Army their profession taking up arms. The War Office had made certain proposals which had now been referred to a special committee. Those proposals contained some points which were an advance upon anything done in previous war times. The one great weakness was the inadequate provision for the adult woman. The woman who lost her husband dropped after six months from 12s. 6d. to 7s. 6d. It should be borne in mind that the cost of living had increased from 1905 to 1912 by 13 per cent.; and since the war started it had gone up a further 13 per cent. The problem was of two phases—there was the question of more generous treatment and the question of administration. He thought it was a very happy idea of the Government's to bring in the old-age pensions committees to help in administering remuneration, and he thought the system might be carried further.

WHERE WILL THE MONEY COME FROM?

Alderman Hayhurst moved the following resolution:—

> This conference, representing every phase of thought in Bradford and district, heartily approves the scale of pay and pensions to soldiers and sailors and their dependents as now submitted, and strongly urges the Government to administer the payment by and through the machinery of the old-age pensions committees, as in the opinion of this conference it will be far more satisfactory than the present system of utilising voluntary charitable organisations.

Some people, said Alderman Hayhurst, seemed to think that if they supported these proposals they would be going beyond that which was sanctioned by their party. He therefore quoted remarks made by Mr. Asquith, Mr. Balfour, and Mr. Bonar Law in support of generous treatment to the dependents of soldiers and sailors. All that was necessary, he added, was to make politicians realise that the people were in earnest. Once they realised that, nothing could stop the people's will. The next thing that might be asked was, where was the money to come from? The incomes liable to income tax in 1869 represented 762 million pounds. That had increased by 1913 to 1,111 millions. The taxation then realised in 1899 was £18,000,000 and last year £46,000,000—an increase of 38 per cent. These figures represented one of the answers when people asked where the money was to come from. In the last fifteen years 107 English millionaires had died leaving 200 million pounds. Such accumulation of wealth was criminal in a civilised country. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Palin, who seconded the resolution, devoted his remarks to the question of administration, saying that if the allowances were increased and the machinery not altered a good deal of hardship would ensue. Owing to the machinery being clogged, there was great confusion during the first eight weeks of the war. Not only were thousands of the soldiers without pay, but their dependents received no separation allowances, and it was left to charity to deal with the matter. In his opinion, though there might be an excuse there was no justification for the delay that had taken place, and steps ought at once to be taken to prevent a repetition of the suffering. He did not see why the Army authorities should have anything to do with the pensions and separation allowances of the new army. Their ordinary duties were quite sufficient for them. A new authority should be created for dealing with cases that arose out of the new army.

"UNMARRIED WIVES."

Dr. Marion Phillips said that up to the present the soldier's wife or widow had always been treated as though she were a suppliant for the nation's charity. Now that the strongest, most sober-minded, reasonable, and hard working of the male population had joined the Army the nation no longer dared to treat the wives as fit only for the pittance which the War Office or the Poor Law had previously given. Some way had to be found whereby the honour so rightly done to these men in words should be carried out in deeds. (Applause.) Not merely a Poor-law existence, an existence on the level of grinding poverty, was being asked for, but an honourable subsistence.

Dr. Phillips went on to say that these allowances were being asked for not only for wives who had marriage lines, but also for "unmarried wives." (Applause.) It was desirable that a man who kept a family before the war started should be enabled to go on keeping it when he was fighting for his country. With the moral question they were not concerned; the argument was that economically these people should be no worse off because the man was fighting. The man who came back disabled and unable to work should receive £1 a week, and if he was able to earn some money it should be made up to £1 a week. This should be in addition to the allowance which the wife and children received.

Mr. Jowett, who also spoke in support of the resolution, said there was a universal feeling that better terms should be given to soldiers and sailors and their dependents. There were some, however, who had their doubts as to the suggestions that had been made by the War Emergency Committee. Some people said these terms would mean that some widows would be receiving larger incomes than they had been used to. In his opinion it was quite time that some of them had a taste of better conditions than they had previously enjoyed. Then it was argued that women would be forced into the labour market, but obviously it was that small pension that would have that effect and result in a lowering of wages. It had further been suggested that the burden would be too great for the country to bear; it was asked that actuarial calculations of the cost should be made beforehand. As a fact, the country could afford this measure of justice. What was happening? The dead hand of capital was becoming heavier under this crisis. All who lived by investments were not poorer but richer by this war. Why not make these people pay? A reasonable suggestion that had already been made was that from those incomes assessed to income tax which had increased in consequence of the war, 75 per cent. of the increase should be impounded to pay for the war. (Hear, hear.) Speaking of the suggested surveillance by the police of those receiving pensions, Mr. Jowett said the working-man's wife very justifiably resented any treatment which was different from the treatment accorded an officer's wife. (Applause.)

DIFFERENT TREATMENT SUGGESTED.

The Vicar of Bradford said he believed there was no set of people in the country more anxious than Churchpeople that generous and just treatment should be accorded to soldiers and sailors and their dependents. In this case, after all, generosity was but justice; for when men were laying down their lives hardly anything could be too much. (Hear, hear.) He agreed with a great deal that had been said in regard to the administration of payments; there was a good deal to be learned in that matter. He would not, however, deprecate the enthusiastic and excellent people who had placed their services at the disposal of the city; what they had done had been done out of a sense of public duty. Nevertheless, he believed the time had come when the administration should pass into the hands of some department of State. The War Office was probably the worst department to deal with the matter. The only point, went on the Vicar, on which he would venture to sound a slight note of difference was on that regarding "unmarried wives." It was easy to assert that the only relationship between the State and the citizen was economic, but it was not always so in practice. This was a time when the State was concerning itself with the morals of the citizens. To adopt this proposal would be for the State to say that the marriage bond went for nothing. As a fact, one of the very corner-stones of the State's welfare was the marriage bond. (Hear, hear.) The dignity of the lawful wives of soldiers and sailors must be considered, and he thought that this might be obtained by a slight difference of administration. He did not suggest that "unmarried wives" should receive less than other women, but that they should receive their allowance through a different channel.

Dr. Griffith-Jones said he did not see how any man could for a moment deny the absolute claim of soldiers and sailors and their dependents to proper care. These men were giving to the country the highest possible gift—themselves. The claim came to the country on the highest grounds. Self-sacrifice for a great cause was one of the greatest of virtues. He agreed with all his heart with the general spirit of the resolutions and would do all he could to see them carried out. Nevertheless, he could not stand by without saying something in support of the position the Vicar of Bradford had taken up. He regarded the marriage bond as the safeguard of public morality. The very centre of what was precious in this country's life was the home life. He did not see how economics could be separated from morality. Economics would never be lifted out of the trough into which they had fallen until they were regarded as an aspect of morality. He did not think these people should suffer in regard to their self-sacrifice because they had offended in another matter; but he thought some distinction should be made.

The Rev. G. Herbert East (Wesleyan) said he did not agree with the Vicar of Bradford. The question of morals came in here—that it was a moral thing to help these women and their dependents. It would be immoral to ask them to go altogether to some other place. His only quarrel with the allowances suggested was that they were too small. (Applause.)

Mr. Fred Pickering also supported the resolution, remarking that he was, however, "rather with the Vicar of Bradford" in regard to "d" and "e." He did not think £1 a week was enough, for, as representing the shopkeepers of Bradford, he knew that that sum was only equivalent to 15s. 6d. some years ago.

Canon Sutcliffe Thomas suggested that the vote should be taken on all the points save "d" and "e," which alone seemed to be in dispute.

Mrs. Child, of the Primrose League, said that if money were granted to "unmarried wives," many of whom were weaker mentally, morally, or in will than their sisters, it would mean that "some lazy, hulking, idle man" would come into the home and divide the children's bread. Therefore she thought there should be supervision in these cases.

Dr. Marion Phillips said that everybody seemed agreed that there should be no difference in the amount paid to the two classes. The only point in dispute was one of administration. As "d" and "e" had nothing to do with administration, everybody could conscientiously vote without any reference to the matters in dispute.

The seven points were then put to the meeting together and carried.

Northern Daily Telegraph. Dec 19/14

659/7

CRITICISM OF A CIRCULAR.

Sir,—The Home Secretary's circular relating to the supervision of women drawing allowances in respect of their relatives serving with the forces has been discussed by the members of my Union, and so indignant are they that they have requested me to ask for the use of your paper to enter their protest. Their chief objections are as follows:

1st. That women dependent on soldiers and sailors are singled out for special attention, notwithstanding that drunkenness, criminal acts, and child neglect are punishable by whosoever committed. The circular assumes that the police neglect to proceed against persons guilty of those offences; but instead of asking them to do their whole duty it only calls upon them to exercise it in the case of women in receipt of allowances. Our members are not inclined to treat lightly those persons who squander their money in drink and neglect their children; but they do insist that all men and women should be treated without distinction, and without regard to their source of income.

2nd. The circular shows that the Army Council anticipate receiving reports from the branches of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Families' Association and kindred organisations, who have taken upon themselves to watch the conduct of soldiers' and sailors' dependents. When such reports are received the police are to be requested to investigate the cases, to confirm or otherwise. We protest most strongly against wealthy and middle-class men and women, constituting themselves a committee of judges on the mode of life of their poorer sisters.

3rd. The Government in deciding to stop allowances in certain cases are adopting a principle which must be watched very closely, i.e., that employers of labour have a right to decide how their employees or their dependents shall spend their earnings. It may suit the purpose of the Government to talk of grants and allowances, but our members, who are ordinary persons, prefer to speak of wages. They maintain that the State has no right to withhold wages when they have been earned, and these so-called allowances have been earned in all conscience.

I trust that your readers will bring what pressure they can to bear upon the Government to withdraw this obnoxious circular and ask them to trust to public opinion, and the ordinary law impartially administered, to prevent unfortunate women wasting their extremely meagre pay and neglecting their homes and families.

ANNIE ORMEROD.
National Union of Women Workers,
79, Florence-street, Blackburn.

659
7

The Co-operative News, December 26th 1914.

659/8 639.

OUR SOLDIERS' PENSIONS AND ALLOWANCES.

So much criticism has arisen with regard to the payments made to the wives of soldiers and the proposals as regards pensions for widows, that the Government have appointed a special committee—composed of Mr. Lloyd George, Mr. Bonar Law, Mr. Austen Chamberlain, Mr. George Barnes, and others—to go into the whole question. The Guild Central Committee have sent in a memorandum to the committee, expressing the views we hold as to what is the proper provision to be made. It is based on the £1-a-week scheme proposed by the Workers' War Emergency Committee, which so large a number of our branches have supported.

Pensions for Widows and Dependents.

There is first the question of pensions to be paid in cases where the soldier or sailor has been killed.

The memorandum from the Central Committee says: "The Government, in suggesting that a widow with one child should maintain herself and the child on 12s. 6d. a week, is advocating a scale of payment which is below the lowest minimum wage fixed by Trade Boards for sweated industries. The proposed scale would also mean that a mother with three children is expected to live on 17s. 6d. per week, practically the same amount as the sum which the co-operative movement has decided is the minimum wage which ought to be paid to a young single woman of twenty. Considering that a business movement, owned and managed by the industrial classes, recognises this wage as a minimum for women employed in industry, it is not too much to ask that the Government should consider £1 a week as a reasonable sum for women employed in the all-important work of the care of children and the home. This is the sum the Guild wishes to see granted."

Evils of Low Scale on the Future of Mothers and Children.

"It cannot be said that the Government scale is sufficient to secure a decent standard of life for the family, and the higher allowance of £1 a week for the mother is needed for this purpose. Further, when the children's allowances cease, the low allowance of 7s. 6d. to the mother would have serious consequences. In the case of boys, the allowances cease when they are fourteen; in the case of girls, sixteen years old. The children would be forced into immediately paying work, which usually means unskilled and blind-alley occupations, and their pay would hardly suffice for their keep.

"And it is not only the children's lives which must be considered. The mother's maintenance should be adequate for her lifetime, because she will have given the best years of her life to her work, and will be without the support she would have had from her husband's wages. She would either have to make up an adequate maintenance by entering the labour market, or to be subsidised by her children. Women over forty would find it almost impossible to secure decently-paid work in the industrial world. They have lost the experience and technical skill needed, and have not the power to adapt themselves to the speed and strain of industrial life. They could only take casual employment, because ordinary openings for elderly women, such as letting lodgings or setting up a small business, require a little capital. But any chance of saving would have been impossible in the circumstances.

"To expect married children or unmarried daughters to subsidise their parents is to place an unwarrantable burden on their wages at a time when every penny is needed for their families, or to prevent all chance of saving for old age.

"Still worse would be the position of a woman having to support not only herself, but an adult son or daughter who might be unable to earn their own living."

Allowances.

There is also the question of the separation allowances to be made to dependents during the time that the man is away on active service or in the training camps. Here the Guild supports the proposal that the allowances should be £1 a week for the wife and 3s. 6d. for each child. The Workers' War Emergency Committee have given remarkable evidence on this point. They show what hardships are being inflicted on many families by the sudden drop in their family income, due to the man being called up. Cases are quoted where the income from allowances for the woman and four children is now only 14s. 4d. per week, which in practice, after paying rent, coals, light, and insurance, means allowing only 3d. per person per meal! Or in another instance the wife, who is expecting her confinement very shortly, is receiving 12s. 6d., which, after rent, coal, and light have been paid, leaves her 5s. a week for food, clothing, &c. Such a standard of pay will clearly involve the gravest injury to the families of these men who are serving their country, and it is of the greatest importance that the more liberal allowance should be adopted.

Allowances and Pensions for Unmarried Mothers.

There is also the case of the unmarried mother. Under the existing regulations, where it is proved that a woman is solely dependent on the man, he can make an allotment as if she was his married wife, and the Government will then make her the usual allowance. The Workers' Committee hold—and the Guild supports them—that where it is thus shown that the woman is dependent on the man, the allowance should be made without it being necessary to obtain an allotment from the man. The Guild Central Committee's memorandum says: "It is unreasonable that a woman should be deprived of her allowance simply because the man does not recognise his responsibility to pay something towards the woman's support. It is also urged that the same provision should be made for mothers who were on the point of marriage before the war, but where marriage was prevented by the outbreak of the war or by enlistment. Case: A girl under twenty-one had been promised marriage by a young man of about the same age, and he was prepared to have the banns put up. His mother disapproved, and the next thing the girl heard of him was that he had enlisted. She had given up a good place, and is left destitute, with a baby coming in March. Wherever paternity can be proved, the duty of the father to support the mother and child should be recognised and financially provided for. Wives with separation orders should be given the full allowance. All the allowances should be continued as pensions if the man dies."

Administration and Supervision.

The Guild agrees that the administration of pensions should be placed in the hands of Old-Age Pensions Committees. But it desires to see women employed in cases of inquiry, amongst unmarried women in particular. It is suggested that the Pensions Committees should be empowered to call in the help of municipal women officials. These women officials—such as school nurses, women sanitary inspectors, and healt' visitors—should also be employed in connection with questions relating to the children under school age. A strong protest is made against any proposals associating the police in any way with the administration of pensions or allowances.

Allowances on Discharge from the Army.

The Guild memorandum continues: "It is a great hardship that allowances cease immediately on discharge from the Army. Men who have given up good situations are being discharged from the new Army because their health cannot stand the training. It is most necessary that they should be given a period to recover full strength and seek work. Cases: Recently a man was discharged from the Shoreham Camp because varicose veins had developed, due to the severe training. He stated that about forty other men had been discharged from this camp through lack of health. Another case is that of a man who developed heart trouble. When he returned home he went to his former employers, but they refused to take him back because of his health. The doctor said he would recover if he could have some weeks' rest and freedom from anxiety. We urge, therefore, that during the war allowances should continue for at least one month after discharge. At the end of the war the position will require special measures.

Continuity of Allowances.

"The evil of any lack of continuity in the payment of allowances is very serious, the woman having no means other than the weekly payment to carry on her home. The sudden suspension of allowance if the husband is punished for some military allowance, or if his allowance is raised or lowered, causes great hardship.

Allowance for Disabled Men.

"The allowance for disabled men should be in addition to allowances for wives and children, in order that the extra cost to the household may be adequately met."

It is earnestly to be hoped that the fresh regulations of the Government will be in line with the above proposals.

659/9 659

Nottingham Express. 18.1.15.
659.

£1 A WEEK PENSION.

Mr. Will Thorne's Plea for the Soldier's Widow.

ARNOLD WOMEN WORKERS.

Although the women laundry workers of Arnold and district have been organised only four months they already have a membership of 280. At present the particular society to which they are attached is the National Union of Gasworkers and General Labourers, Midland District, of which Mr. A. Hayday is the secretary. It is hoped, however, to bring into the organisation the laundry workers of Nottingham and other towns and cities in the Midland district, and thus be able to form a separate society for laundry workers.

To celebrate the inauguration of trade unionism among the women of Arnold a public tea and concert were held on Saturday in the British schools. Considerably over 200 people were present, and sat down to an excellently served tea. Afterwards a programme of musical items and dancing was proceeded with. During the course of the evening short addresses were given by Mr. W. Thorne, M.P., Mr. A. Hayday, and Mr. W. Hartshorn. Mr. J. W. Willey, branch chairman, presided.

Mr. W. Thorne, M.P., in responding to the toast of "The Union," expressed the hope that they would not take exception to being called members of the Gasworkers' and General Labourers' Union. That body, he said, had done a great work during the past 25 years, having put thousands of pounds in the shape of wages into the pockets of the wage-earners of the country. They had now, he said, 15,000 of their members serving with the colours, or 10 per cent. of the total membership, and in every one of those cases the men's contributions had been remitted.

Organised Laundry Workers.

"As organised workers," said Mr. Thorne, "we ought to make it our business to force the hands of the Government in carrying out what we believe to be the wish of 90 per cent. of the people of this country—a pension of not less than £1 per week for the widows of those men who fall in battle." A special committee of the Government had been appointed to consider the matter, he added, and he was expecting that between now and February 2nd, when the House of Commons opened, that the country would have the report of that committee before it. If it was unsatisfactory, which he expected it would be, it was the duty of organised workers to force upon the members of the House of Commons the need for the £1 per week pension. Concluding, Mr. Thorne stated that although nothing was being actively carried on in industrial circles, and although all classes were being looked upon as one common family in the prosecuting of the war to a successful issue, he did not want organised trade unionists to think that the trade unions were going to allow the employers to take advantage of the situation by not giving increases in wages where there was good reason for such an increase. That was not the case.

Mr. A. Hayday said it was hoped by that little branch of laundry workers to encourage other laundry workers in different towns to join forces. Since the organisation had been formed the wages of the Arnold laundry workers of several departments had been increased, but even now their remuneration was only 3d. per hour for the heavy work previously done by men for a sum of only 25s. a week.

Pharmaceutical Journal 23.1.15.
659.

THE WOMAN IN PHARMACY.

THE Editor is glad to welcome the following contribution from a woman pharmacist whose views regarding the relations of women to the business for which she has been trained appear to be clear and well defined:—

January 18, 1915.

Dear Mr. Editor,

I am glad to see the attitude the majority of your correspondents have taken up over the fatuous decision of the self-styled "Practical" (?) to boycott all wholesale firms who employ representatives eligible by age for military service. Is it always practical for a married man to enlist and leave a wife to exist on the generous Government allowance of 12s. 6d. per week? I imagine it is often far from practical, and I know it is frequently not desirable.

The unfortunate thing from the woman's point of view is that, up till now, there has been a very large and undesirable percentage of married men enlisting. But perhaps the wrongs to the Women and the ruin to the Homes of Belgium appeal more to a married man who realises what might happen to his own wife and home should the Germans invade Britain!

Owing to the War, there is a dearth of qualified, experienced men in our business, and it seems to me that now is the time for "The Woman in Pharmacy" to prove her worth and abandon the apologetic attitude so many of us have hitherto adopted. Why should we be apologetic? We are legally entitled to carry on our trade or profession as pharmacists, though we, perhaps, make the mistake of regarding it more as a profession than as a trade.

There has been a large influx of girls into the ranks of pharmacy, attracted thereto in many instances by the idiotic ramblings of ladies' papers, and of some dailies, the conductors of which ought to know better. "Priscilla," of the Penny Prattler, advises girls to go in for dispensing—nice, easy, dainty work and good salaries! "Priscilla" and her girl followers altogether overlook the expensive training, the seriousness and responsibility of the work, the long hours, and the physical strain involved. Five-gallon jars and pottles are not exactly toys to play with, but a woman who cannot handle them, or anything else in the pharmacy that a man can deal with, is better out of the business.

There are few purely professional posts open, and the woman in pharmacy—unless she can command influence—must make up her mind to take the rough with the smooth and not to shirk unpleasant work because she is a woman. Girls who think they can enter pharmacy so lightly find out what a stiff pull it is to secure the Minor qualification, and many of them, for financial and other reasons, content themselves with the Apothecaries' Hall certificate, to find they have landed in a cul-de-sac where situations are few and salaries small indeed.

The position of women in pharmacy has not been taken seriously enough, either by ourselves or by our men confrères. Why have we no direct representative on the Council of the Pharmaceutical Society, and what is the Association of Women Pharmacists doing to advance pharmacy as a trade amongst women? Why have we not a strong union like the British Medical Women? and why do not the women who are in pharmacy contribute to the Journal notes on their work?

The woman in pharmacy has come to stay, but she must rise to the occasion and have a little more confidence in herself as a business woman and practising pharmacist—not the overweening confidence of the newly passed Minor candidate, who deems the certificate everything and experience nothing.

The woman pharmacist has chances which many a mere man might envy, but she is too busy trying to be ethical and professional to grasp at the trade benefits lying to her hand. Take the ever-increasing trade in toilet creams and sundries. Who is better fitted to handle the delicate question of "Beauty for Every Woman" than the woman in pharmacy? Her professional training and her chemical knowledge should surely tell her the action of the different oils and fats on the skin, and how and when to apply them.

There is big business in Baby Wants, in which women might specialise, and not look blankly at a feeding bottle, wondering which is the right end, as I have seen more than one woman pharmacist do. One suburban shop was made a success the first year solely by catering for Master Baby. The suburb was too healthy for many prescriptions, and something had to be done to increase business. "Everything for Baby" was the motto, and it paid well. A specially pure baby soap sold freely, a cake being sent to every new baby in the suburb, with a letter setting forth the virtues of the soap, and mentioning other "baby lines."

Of course, I can hear the professional woman pharmacist saying, "I didn't pass the Minor to sell soap and feeding bottles." Well, perhaps she didn't at the time, but she has got to do it now to make a living, and why not do it well—better than any man could? The pity is that our studies for the Minor Examination do not teach us how to sell, and the pharmaceutical training we get is altogether wrong for the business life most of us have to lead. But this can be remedied if only the women in pharmacy will work together on right lines, and I shall be glad if those of them who are desirous of improving their position will write to me, care of the Editor of The Pharmaceutical Journal, so that we may enjoy a free interchange of ideas.

I am, dear Mr. Editor,

Yours faithfully,

"PHARMACUTRIX."

Christian World. 28.1.15.

659.

659

659/10

MATTERS OF INTEREST TO WOMEN.

Winter Sales.

These sales seem to have dragged a little this year, and prices have been much lower than I have ever known them in many lines, both in the drapery, furniture and fancy goods trades. The fact is we have lost a good deal of the frivolous side of our nature in these strenuous days, and have become so seriously engaged in taking the "Woman's Part" in the war that there has been far less demand for some articles of clothing or adornment which we thought indispensable a year ago. Still we must not go to the other extreme and become negligent—much less gloomy—in our dress. Perhaps we do not realise what an important part colour plays in our existence, or how much the lack of it tends to depression. We all admire the Frenchwoman who abstained from wearing mourning for her own husband because of the effect it would have on other women whose husbands and sons were at the front. I saw a lady the other day wearing a band of tartan ribbon round her arm to indicate that she had lost her son in a Highland regiment.

Several of the more important London shops have had large consignments of Tussore silk, which is being sold very much below the ordinary prices. Those who have used this material know how easily it is washed and ironed, and that it never seems to wear out. A friend of mine uses it for tunics and knickers for her small boy all the year round, using woollen combinations of various thicknesses according to the season. As the silk washes so easily the little chap seems to get a new suit every week, which is a great advantage. The suggestion is also well worth considering in regard to frocks for girls. Great variety can be produced by the addition of coloured trimmings or sashes.

Those of us who feel that our wardrobe is not complete without a coat and skirt can feel quite comfortable in our pet costume, as they are likely to remain as fashionable as ever. But frocks also have their place, the skirts of which will be much fuller than we have been used to for a long time past. Those arranged with pleats all round are very popular. Of course the style is only suitable for a slim figure, and should be carried out in a thin material.

Short lengths of materials, such as remnants of silk, velvet or embroidery, can easily be worked up into the requirements of present style dresses, with great advantage as to prices.

Soldiers' and Sailors' Dependents.

Great dissatisfaction seems to have arisen in regard to allowances and pensions to be made to the relatives of our fighting men. The suddenness of our great struggle, no doubt, accounts for some of the blundering and muddle that has come to pass, and has given cause for complaint. But it seems quite reasonable to believe that the business could have been better carried out if women had been given a more responsible part in these matters in our army councils.

This idea has been tried, and fully justified by results achieved, in the administration of the National Relief Funds, except that the work is all voluntary. The Central Committee on Women's Employment is entirely composed of women. Women are wholly responsible for carrying out all its relief efforts. Women invent it, scheme it, plan it, supervise it, and execute it in every detail; and not a solitary male is to be found in any of the work centres. The plans followed will, of course, be open to criticism in some respects, and at present, though they have been at work for nearly six months, no public report has been given; but I venture to believe that when we do get a detailed report we shall see that the spending of the money has been on the best lines, devised with common sense and imagination, and a good knowledge of conditions, and that very full and lasting value is being obtained from all the expenditure.

One branch of this work especially appeals to me, and that is the "Sick-room Helpers." A number of women, out of work through the war, are engaged for a week of forty hours at the usual rate of 10s. per week. Part of the time is spent in learning simple lessons in hygiene, cookery, washing, and other every-day household duties. The remainder of their time is spent in assisting in poor homes where the mother or housekeeper is partly or wholly incapacitated through ill-health. If such a mother is in hospital, they tidy up the house, wash the children and start them for school, in fact, do any necessary duty. In maternity cases they make such visits daily for a fortnight. When a mother is recovering from an operation or severe illness, they go once a week and do the family washing. We can all realise how grateful and necessary such deeds of mercy are in such times of dire need as so frequently overtake poor families who have no means of hiring extra help.

A Case of Need.

"Concerned" writes asking me if there are any funds available for helping a respectable woman who cannot earn her living because of ill-health. Her friend is nearly at the point of starvation. If I were "Concerned," I would get as many friends to give, say 6d., a week as will supply the need. This has been done with great success in regard to Belgian families. Of course there is an Out-door Poor Law relief, but few like to apply for that for various reasons, some of which are very real and some sentimental.

VERONA.

659

659/11

Evening News 4.2.15.

659.

THE NEW PENSIONS.

Labour Comment on the Widow's Mite.

The new war pension scale recommended by the Select Committee, by which disabled men are to recive 25s. a week, and widows allowances varying from 10s. to 22s. 6d., is favourably criticised by the Labour Party.

"The report does not come up to our desires and expectations," Mr. C. W. Bowerman, of the Trade Union Congress, told an Evening News representative, "but so far as it goes it is satisfactory."

Mr. W. C. Anderson, who took his seat in the House as Labour member for Attercliffe, said the new scale was a "substantial improvement."

"It appears as if the nation was beginning to realise its responsibilities towards soldiers, sailors, and their dependents," he said.

"The least satisfactory feature of the report is that the childless widow under thirty-five may receive no more than 10s. a week. I am not enamoured of the proposal to supplement the Government payments by grants from the Prince of Wales's Fund and other voluntary funds."

A WOMAN'S VIEW.

Miss Mary McArthur, secretary of the Women's Trade Union League, regretted that the 10s. grant to the childless widow under thirty-five would be a direct incitement for the women to enter industrial life and compete unfairly with other women workers.

Mr. John Ward, M.P., expressed the view that while one might wish to see a more liberal allowance, the financial position of the country was an important factor.

"The difficulty of deciding on any hard and fast line," he pointed out, "is that many of those now in the Army are in quite a different position in life from the men who enlisted years ago.

"Now the Army includes thousands of men who were earning £4 a week upwards, and the State cannot possibly, without bringing itself to a state of bankruptcy, undertake to place those men in exactly the same position they were before."

"The new scale is miserably inadequate" is the sweeping condemnation of Mr. Robert Williams, the secretary of the Transport Workers' Federation.

Le Matin. 20/11/13

LES PENSIONS MILITAIRES

Taux des nouveaux tarifs du projet gouvernemental

On sait que le gouvernement a proposé à la Chambre une législation nouvelle pour les pensions militaires dans le cas de blessures, de maladies ou de décès dont la guerre est la cause.

Ce nouveau régime a été élaboré par une commission extra-parlementaire, présidée par le ministre des finances. Son rapporteur fut M. Romieu, conseiller d'Etat.

Voici les tarifs nouveaux résultant des propositions gouvernementales, en comparaison avec les pensions actuelles.

Le taux maximum des pensions pour blessures ou infirmités est maintenu pour tous les grades. Mais le minimum est abaissé dans des proportions considérables, puisqu'il est :

Pour un général de division ou un vice-amiral de 1.400 francs au lieu de 7.000 ; pour un général de brigade ou un contre-amiral, de 1.200 francs au lieu de 6.000 ; pour un colonel ou un capitaine de vaisseau, de 900 francs au lieu de 4.500 ; pour un lieutenant-colonel ou un capitaine de frégate, de 740 francs au lieu de 3.700 ; pour un chef de bataillon ou un capitaine de corvette, de 600 francs au lieu de 3.000 ; pour un capitaine ou un lieutenant de vaisseau, de 460 francs au lieu de 2.300 ; pour un lieutenant ou un enseigne de 1re classe, 370 francs au lieu de 1.850 ; pour un sous-lieutenant ou un enseigne de 2e classe, de 300 francs au lieu de 1.500 ; pour un adjudant-chef, de 220 francs au lieu de 1.100 ; pour un adjudant, de 200 francs au lieu de 1.000 ; pour un sergent-major, de 180 francs au lieu de 900 ; pour un sergent, de 160 francs au lieu de 800 ; pour un caporal ou un quartier-maître, de 140 francs au lieu de 800 ; pour un soldat ou un matelot, de 120 francs au lieu de 600 ; pour un premier-maître, de 290 francs au lieu de 1.450 ; pour un maître, de 260 francs au lieu de 1.300 ; pour un second-maître, de 220 francs au lieu de 1.100.

Les majorations

Ces diminutions se trouvent compensées par une majoration uniforme de 225 francs, quel que soit le grade, pour le cas où le militaire a à sa charge une tierce personne.

Une majoration également indépendante du grade est accordée pour chaque enfant au-dessous de seize ans. Elle est de 10 à 100 francs, suivant la classe dans laquelle les infirmités ont été rangées.

Pour les officiers, des annuités d'accroissement au delà de vingt ans de service effectifs sont fixées à des chiffres variant de 175 francs pour le plus haut grade à 40 francs pour le grade le plus bas. Une majoration spéciale applicable aux pensions des six dernières classes est en outre accordée pour les années de service effectif au delà de vingt ans suivant les grades ; cette majoration est égale pour la troisième et la quatrième classe à l'annuité d'accroissement du minimum de la pension d'ancienneté ; pour les pensions des quatre dernières classes, elle subit une réduction proportionnelle.

Pour les sous-officiers et soldats, il est accordé des annuités d'accroissement pour les années de services effectifs au delà de quinze ans, variant, suivant les grades, de 44 à 24 francs. Il y a également lieu à majoration spéciale aux pensions des six dernières classes pour les années de services effectifs au delà de quinze ans.

Veuves, orphelins et ascendants

Quant aux veuves, le taux de leur pension n'est point modifié par le projet, mais elles ont droit à une majoration de 100 francs pour chaque enfant au-dessous de seize ans. De même, une majoration de 100 francs pour chaque enfant au-dessous de seize ans, à partir du deuxième, est accordée aux enfants mineurs à défaut de la mère.

Enfin les ascendants, à défaut de conjoint ou d'enfants, bénéficient d'une fraction de la pension de veuve, à savoir : 1/3 pour le père ou la mère ; 1/2 pour le père et la mère conjointement ; 1/4 pour le grand-père ou la grand'mère ; 1/3 pour le grand-père et la grand'mère conjointement.

Des secours pourront être accordés aux ascendants nécessiteux en cas d'existence de veuve ou d'enfants

Sunday Times
April 2nd 1916.

SOLDIERS' PENSIONS

THE CASE OF THE DISABLED

At the annual conference of the Faculty of Insurance, held yesterday, Mr. H. Kingsley Wood, L.C.C., vice-chairman of the London Insurance Committee, moved a resolution, which was carried, welcoming the appointment of the committee in question, and urging the necessity for meeting the excess claims of women. He asserted that a colossal actuarial blunder had been made with regard to the insurance of women, and especially married women, and said that half-a-million was a conservative estimate of the annual deficiency. On the present contribution for sickness benefit, only 6s., instead of 7s. 6d. per week, could properly be paid to women.

Mr. John Hodge, M.P., moved the resolution (which was carried) dealing with soldiers' and sailors' pensions. It welcomed the promise by the naval and military authorities that a pension of four-fifths of that allowed to wounded soldiers and sailors would be paid to men discharged as physically unfit from disease contracted or aggravated by service, and demanded that the promise should have retrospective effect.

Police & Prison Officers Journal
30 1916

REFUND OF RATEABLE DEDUCTIONS.

Mr. W. C. Anderson, M.P. for Sheffield, on July 22nd, 1915, brought to the notice of the Home Secretary a real hardship on the widows of policemen killed in the war.

The majority of these men have not sufficient service to qualify them for police pensions larger than the Army pension, so the death of the husband brings no benefit from the Police Pension Fund to the widow and children. Yet the husband, while in the police service, had contributed weekly to the pension fund, and morally such payments or rateable deductions ought to be returned to the widow or children. Legally this is not provided for under the Police Act, and when Sheffield City Council appealed to the Home Office last year for authority to refund to Mrs. Crich the rateable deductions from the pay of her deceased husband, P.C. Crich, killed in action, the Home Secretary replied that there was no power to allow this to be done.

Clause I. of the Home Secretary's new Bill dealing with the pension question ought to have included a sub-clause to remedy this hardship on the widows of our gallant comrades. This omission must be put right, and we have called attention to this also. We know Mr. Anderson, M.P., will not lose sight of this act of justice, but there are other M.P.'s representing Sheffield and other towns as well, which are equally affected, who ought to be called upon by their police constituents to see that the Home Office do not omit this clause.

Daily Express
10.10.16.

659
659/13

7s. 6d. FOR SOLDIERS' WIVES.

CASE FOR LARGER SEPARATION ALLOWANCES.

During the past two years the food-purchasing power of the sovereign has dropped to 11s. 11d. Workers in almost every trade have received advances in wages to counterbalance this fall. Yet the separation allowance for soldiers' wives remains at 12s. 6d., with 3s. 6d. extra for those living in London, and a small amount for each child. In reality this 12s. 6d. represents only 7s. 6d.

The sub-committee of the War Emergency Workers' National Committee will issue a report on the subject on Thursday, and it is expected that a strong case will be made for increasing allowances.

Mr. J. S. Middleton, secretary of the National Committee, pointed out to a "Daily Express" representative yesterday that two years ago the committee urged that the minimum rate for a wife should be 20s.

"It passes my comprehension," he said, "how these frugal mothers have dragged on as they have, especially in view of the high price of milk. There is only one possible explanation—the mothers must have pinched themselves to feed their children. It is not a pleasant picture for a grateful country to contemplate—the mother of the soldier's children starving herself in order that her young family may be fed."

Willesden Council have decided to give a second war bonus to their employees, ranging from 1s. to 3s. a week.

Common Cause 23-11-17 Daily Express 17-7-19 65-9

659/14

Widows' Pensions.

We are glad to see that in answer to a Deputation from the Parliamentary Committee of the Trade Union Congress on Tuesday afternoon (November 20th), Mr. John Hodge, Minister of Pensions, said that, although he could not give much encouragement with regard to the hope of more adequate provision for the dependents of soldiers and sailors, or pensions for discharged and disabled men, he could give encouragement about pensions for widows and orphans, as the whole matter was under revision. Mr. Hodge added that he himself was opposed to women having to go out to work when they had small children. So is everybody! The articles and correspondence in our columns show that the subject of the State endowment of motherhood is a debatable one, but that even those who object to all large schemes of endowments are generally in favour of some scheme for the pensioning of widows, such as those advocated by Judge Neil and Lady Selborne. The widows of men who have sacrificed all to the service of the State have, of course, the first claim of all to an adequate provision, but we believe that a measure giving pensions to all poor widowed mothers of young children would receive support so general as to be practically unanimous. Very few people can now be found who think it good for anybody that mothers should be obliged to leave the care of their children in order to earn money to support them.

PEER'S DAUGHTER AS LABOUR OFFICIAL.

LADY CYNTHIA COLVILLE ON WORK AND WAGES.

Lady Cynthia Colville, daughter of the Marquis of Crewe, sister-in-law of Viscount Colville of Culross, and a firm believer in the trade union principle, has been elected an honorary vice-president of the Ministry of Pensions Temporary Staff Association, which is a registered union.

Lady Cynthia is an example of the new democracy. She worked for two years as an ordinary clerk at the Ministry, and was, in addition, an organising member of the union of which she has just been elected an official.

"I believe in a scale of wages based on merit alone, regardless of sex," said Lady Cynthia to a "Daily Express" representative yesterday, "and I believe that men are gradually beginning to realise that men and women should receive equal pay for equal work.

WOMEN'S LOSS.

"Men on their return from the war expected, naturally enough, to find their places vacant and everything going on the same as before, but they did not realise that thousands of women had, by the same war, been thrown on their own resources, through the loss of husbands, fathers, and brothers. These women are just as much entitled to good jobs, good pay, and the consideration of the country as are the men themselves.

"Of course, there are women who are clinging to jobs to which they are not entitled—I mean those women who do not need to work. I do not believe that these should compete with men; but the majority of women that I have known have been very reasonable in this matter.

"Human nature is human nature, and it was but natural that jealousies should arise when women who had worked themselves up by slow stages from a salary of 25s. to 35s. were directed to teach their work to men who were going to supplant them at 54s. a week.

"The association, which a few of us organised about a year ago, now numbers over 6,000 men and women members, and is, I am glad to say, recognised by the Ministry. We find it has been a great help to us in the matter of getting our grievances settled satisfactorily."

659

659/15

THE PROBLEM OF THE MARRIED SOLDIER.

SUGGESTED MUNICIPAL SOLUTION.

By HENRY R. ALDRIDGE, Secretary, National Housing and Town Planning Council.

The following memorandum has been prepared by Mr. Aldridge for the use of a special conference that is being called during the present few days. In view of the various schemes and suggestions now under consideration, it has been thought desirable to publish the memorandum in advance of the meeting.—Ed. "M.J."

THE unofficial announcement that several of the earlier groups of married men attested under the Derby scheme may be called up for service in April has brought the question of the treatment of the home responsibilities of these men within the range of what used to be called "practical politics," and presents the question as a problem calling for immediate settlement on just, equitable, and sympathetic lines.

How essential it is that the treatment of this question of the home life of the men called to the Colours should be just, equitable, and sympathetic a few cases will make clear.

Case 1.

A skilled workman, newly married, living in a provincial town, and earning 35s. a week, has followed the advice given to him by advocates of personal thrift and has bought a house for himself through a building society. In interest and purchase money he has contracted to pay about 10s. per week, and in addition has to bear local rates and taxes. The total charge upon his earnings is more than some men would regard as prudent, but he has followed the counsels of thrift preached to him, and has adopted this method of saving part of his wages.

He is now called up, and will receive a separation allowance of 12s. 6d. for his wife and 5s. for his one child. In other words, after the building society charges of 10s. per week and an average of 3s. 6d. per week for rates have been met, a sum of 4s. will remain to feed and clothe his wife and child.

Case 2.

A young clerk employed in a Manchester export warehouse is called to the Colours. He lives in a Manchester suburb—Chorlton-cum-Hardy—and is renting a small villa at a rent of £22 a year, plus rates. His wages are £3 a week, and although he has to spend more on clothes than the artisan, yet he feels justified in spending an annual amount equivalent to nearly 12s. per week in rent. The gathering together of the furniture and the building up of the home has been the work of several years' careful saving. He has two children, and when called up to the Colours will receive for his wife 12s. 6d. and for his children 8s. 6d.—£1 1s. in all. When rents and rates are met, the sum of 9s. will be left for the maintenance of his wife and children.

Case 3.

A young London architect has built up a practice which brings him in about £400 a year. He has taken a suburban villa at a rent of £40 a year, which with rates and taxes involves an expenditure of nearly £55. With the call to the Colours his income ceases, for the "goodwill" of his business rests in his own personal ability, and when this is not available his income drops to zero. For his wife and three children there will be a separation allowance of 16s. per week for the wife (as he lives in the London area) and 10s. 6d. for his children, or £1 6s. 6d. in all.

These three cases are typical of many thousands which call for treatment which, to repeat the terms used above, must be just, equitable, and sympathetic.

The treatment must be just because if it is not so the men who are called up to serve and who may have to make the "supreme sacrifice" will have a sense of injustice rankling in their hearts; they will feel that whilst they are serving their country their fellow countrymen at home are mean and forgetful.

The treatment must be equitable in securing that each case shall be treated on its merits, and that although no difference in the payment of separation allowances can be made as between the ploughman and the clerk, the drygoods warehouseman and the architect, yet the home of each must be regarded as equally worthy of maintenance; in other words, that the standard of home life must be maintained.

It should be sympathetic because no other course of action in the treatment of its soldiers should be permitted by a great nation.

Termination of Tenancies.

During the past few days a great deal of attention has been given to the proposal that an Act should be passed permitting tenants to terminate the tenancies of houses without legal obligations in regard to unexpired terms; in other words, to enable those who have entered into tenancies with periods still to run to quit their dwellings and be absolved from the responsibility for the payment of rent for the unexpired terms.

On examination it will be found that although this proposal may in certain cases be of real value, yet it is "weighed in the balance and found wanting" in regard to general application, if only because it assumes that the home is to be broken up.

The Moratorium Proposal.

The proposal that there should be a moratorium in regard to rent has received so much attention, and is so strongly advocated, that it calls for most careful examination. Before discussing it in detail it will, however, be of service to explain clearly what has been, and is being done, in France.

By the law passed on August 5, 1914, within a few days of the opening of the war, it is provided that, except at the instance of the Government, no action can be commenced or pursued and no distraint or execution can be made against soldiers serving with the Colours. Since that time various decrees have dealt with the subject. In September, 1915, for example, a decree was issued which had for its effect the further postponement of the payment of rent.

The effect of this legislation of August, 1914, and of subsequent decrees has been to pile up colossal rent claims, and unless the matter is dealt with by special after-the-war legislation the claims for arrears will have to be met in full when the war period, or that period for which the special legislation holds good, comes to an end.

How great the arrears of rent are likely to be after the war can be seen by the fact that it has been estimated that already the accumulated arrears come to upwards of eighty million francs (£3,200,000 sterling).

It is of vital importance that this aspect of the moratorium proposal should be realised. The word "moratorium," which means a delaying, is little understood outside business circles, and in the popular mind it is taken to mean that rent claims are to be cancelled and regarded as dead, the word moratorium being wrongly regarded as akin to the word "mortuary." But claims are not dead; they are delayed until the war is over, to be then deal with. When once this cardinal fact relative to the moratorium proposal is generally recognised any prospect of its adoption in Great Britain will disappear, and rightly so.

The strain on the resources of our great Ally at the opening of the war and the necessity for calling up the whole of the manhood of the nation rendered inevitable the adoption in France of this method of dealing with the question. But because our Ally at the outbreak of war was compelled to adopt the moratorium method this should not be regarded as providing any valid reason for our adoption of the same method at this juncture. We must settle the question for ourselves on its merits.

The more, indeed, the moratorium proposal is examined the more faulty it will seem to be. Amongst others, the following criticisms may be tabled:

(1) To allow a burden of debt to be accumulated and paid at the close of the war by our soldiers on the ground that we cannot afford to do otherwise will be to adopt a peculiarly mean and paltry policy. The one thing we cannot afford to do is to lessen the intensity of our men's patriotism.

(2) It may be urged that if a moratorium of rent is arranged, then at the close of the war the arrears will not be paid by the tenant, but by the nation.

But we have no right to deal with the question in this way. The matter should not be left in suspense, for the great mass of men will regard it as a debt which will ultimately have to be met.

(3) But there is another side to the question. It must be clearly recognised that if a moratorium for rent is arranged, a burden of an unfair kind will fall upon various associations and individuals who own property.

659/16

As the secretary of a council which has for many years endeavoured to secure the destruction of all unfit property and to raise the standards of housing and town planning throughout the United Kingdom, my sincerity will not be questioned when I condemn as grossly unfair the adoption of a line of action which will have as one of its results the inequitable treatment of various admirable associations for the supply of houses, and which will inflict great hardships upon those who have invested money in house property.

It is, however, not enough to show that the moratorium proposal is faulty. Destructive criticism is of little value unless accompanied by constructive suggestions. I feel bound, therefore, to explain here one or two general suggestions, which I have prepared for consideration by a special conference of the National Housing and Town Planning Council.

First of all it will be well to state clearly and simply the objects to be attained. These may be defined as follows:—

(a) That the home of the man called up to serve shall not be broken up.

(b) That where private means or allowances from employers are not available for the purpose, the rent of the homes of those who are serving as soldiers shall be, in whole or in part, paid by those whose lives and homes are defended.

If these two main points are agreed to, then it is clear that neither the proposal to terminate tenancies or to pass a moratorium for rent will provide a solution. It is hoped, however, that a satisfactory solution may be found in the direction indicated in the following suggestions:—

(1) That under the auspices of the local authority for each district (great centres like London to be treated as a whole) special committees should be set up for the purpose of preserving intact and without accumulation of debt, the homes of those who have been or are to be called up for the war.

(2) That each committee should administer a fund to be raised under its auspices—the fund to be increased by a contribution from the State. It would probably be better to leave half to be provided locally, and thus ensure that the work is done efficiently and economically.

(3) The committee should sit in camera and deal with each case on its merits. Its work should be severely limited to the question of the preservation of the home; the question of separation allowances should be completely outside its range of operation.

(4) On the recommendation of the committee the local authority should be empowered to remit the payment of all ordinary rates in regard to the dwellings concerned.

(5) The committee should be empowered to require building societies to postpone the repayment of those parts of their charges which relate to redemption of principal sums, but not interest. The best societies are already doing this voluntarily.

(6) In the case of large houses of professional men, the committee should be empowered to act as the local authorities on the East Coast resorts have done, viz., arrive at an agreement with the owners to reduce the rent for the period of the war.

(7) In those cases in which employers are making substantial profits as a result of the war and in which the rest of the staff are working longer hours to make up for the absence of others, the committee should be empowered to require these employers to bear the burden of their employees' rent during their absence.

(8) That part of the fund administered by the committee which is raised locally should be raised either by (a) voluntary contributions, or (b) a tax on the amusements of the district, or (c) by a local or county rate levied on all ratepayers.

For many reasons (c) would be the most valuable way. "Let all pay for a service rendered to all" would be the best answer to those who cry out against increased rates.

(9) It should be made clear that applications from those who have private means (or whose family relations are wealthy enough to render aid unnecessary) will be discouraged.

(10) All payments should be made direct to those to whom rental payments are due—this in order to avoid the diversion of money to purposes other than those for which it is intended.

It is certain that these proposals can be greatly improved upon, but in the main they should meet with general approval if only because they embody the principle that those who stay at home should preserve the home life of those who go out to fight.

Despite minor criticisms I am confident that these proposals will be welcomed by the great mass of men who are called to the Colours. Their family life is inexpressibly dear to them, and the giving of a guarantee to them that without accumulations of debt their homes should be preserved will give the best of all proofs that those who stay at home are not neglectful of the debt they owe to those who serve.

In November last the council which I have the honour to serve brought together representative house-owners and tenants in conference, and placed a series of proposals before the Government. This series of proposals formed the basis of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest Act, which is now proving such a valuable means of keeping peace between tenants and landlords. Next week we shall again bring together in conference representative men to consider this question, and to place well-considered suggestions before the President of the Local Government Board. It is possible that the suggestions outlined above will then be materially modified or added to, but I am confident that the decision to condemn the moratorium proposal will be unanimous.

NATIONAL CONGRESS ON "HOME PROBLEMS AFTER THE WAR."

The detailed arrangements are now complete for the National Congress which will be held in London from April 11 to 14 next, under the auspices of the National Housing and Town Planning Council.

Following as it will on the meetings just concluded of the Chamber of Commerce, and in view of the encouragement given by the Government to the preparation for dealing with the problems of trade and employment which will present themselves for solution at the close of the war, it is anticipated that the Congress will be of great service.

The Council are concentrating their efforts upon the problem of possible unemployment in the building trade. After most earnest consideration they have come to the conclusion that not only in the interests of the housing movement (with all that it means in greater happiness and health to the community), but also in the interests of workmen in the building trade, they should take in hand at once the task of developing public opinion (and more especially opinion amongst members and officers of local authorities) in favour of the preparation of housing and other schemes to be placed in operation at the close of the war.

In effect it is desired that the Congress shall be the starting point of a general movement to secure that, if a wave of unemployment does come upon us at the end of the war, we shall, in the building trade at any rate, be found prepared to meet it by the provision of work of real value to the community.

It is hoped that the Congress will be attended by a large number of representative men, including:—Members of both Houses of Parliament, lord mayors and mayors, town clerks, city engineers, leading members of professional associations, presidents of employers' associations, leaders of great workmen's associations, chairmen and leading members of public utility societies, etc.

Four days will be devoted to the Congress, and the replies already to hand show that it will probably be the most important gathering of leaders in the national housing movement that has been held for many years, for well-known specialists in each subject have promised to speak.

The programme of the Congress will include the following points:—

(1) (a) The preparation of housing schemes for the building of urban and rural cottages, (b) the provision by the Government at the close of the war of the necessary capital to enable such schemes to be carried into effect, (c) general housing finance at the close of the war, and more especially the removal of disabilities hampering the development of the building industry, the consideration of the question of the compounding of rates, etc.

(2) (a) The need for financial aid being given by the Government to local authorities in the preparation of schemes for the clearance of insanitary areas, (b) consideration of the gain to the nation in better citizenship and greater productive capacity, (c) the special housing and town planning needs of mining villages.

(3) (a) The reorganisation of existing methods and the adoption of new methods to secure the provision of capital to and all classes of cultivators of the land, (b) the provision of homesteads as an essential part of the equipment of small holdings, the simplification and cheapening of procedure in small holdings administration, (c) the need for recognition by Parliament and by town dwellers generally that urban and rural problems are interdependent.

(4) (a) The preparation of town planning schemes, in anticipation of future developments, and more especially schemes for the construction of new arterial roads, playgrounds and other open spaces, (b) the preparation of schemes for settling disabled soldiers and sailors on the land, (c) the preparation of schemes for afforestation and for the reclamation of waste lands.

(5) The possibility of adopting new and cheap building materials and securing economies in the design of cottages.

The Staffordshire Sentinel,
October 2nd. 1914.

QUEEN MARY'S NEEDLEWORK GUILD.

Biddulph Working Parties.

Thanks to a good first subscription list, the excellent work of the Biddulph ladies in providing useful garments for our soldiers and sailors has been well maintained. At the various branches organised by Miss Heath, Biddulph Grange, over 100 workers have been busily employed, and large consignments of garments have been despatched to headquarters. These have also been supplemented by substantial gifts of garments and material.

The response to this fund throughout the district has been a distinct credit to Biddulph, but so urgent is the need for a constant supply of necessary clothing that more funds are wanted in order that the work may not stop for lack of material. Miss Heath makes a special appeal for funds, which may be sent to her at Biddulph Grange, and will be gratefully acknowledged.

Since last week's list, the following subscriptions have been received: Mrs. H. Shaw, 5s.; Mrs. G. H. Gaskell, 2s. 6d.; and also the following articles: Mrs. J. H. Cole, 12 yards union; Mrs. C. G. Myott, two pairs socks and one helmet; Mrs. J. Goodfellow, six pairs socks; Mrs. S Gibson, seven pairs socks; Congleton Co-operative Society, 50 yards shirting. Total number of garments received: 51 shirts, 44 night shirts, 48 women's and children's garments, 88 pairs socks, 13 woollen garments, 53 pillow cases, five bedjackets, nine pairs pyjamas.

BIDDULPH MOOR'S RESPONSE.

The ladies of Biddulph Moor have also made a patriotic response to their country's call, and as the result of Mrs. Wheeldon's working parties at the Rectory, the following garments have been despatched: 17 pairs socks, 12 shirts and seven bedjackets. Weekly subscriptions to the fund have also been promised by Mrs. Wheeldon, Mrs. J. H. Cole, Mrs. F. Booth, Miss Dale, Mrs. Biddulph, Mrs. J. Stanway, Mrs. Holdcroft, Mrs. A. Stanway, Mrs. Smart, Mrs. Bailey, Mrs. Sherratt, Mrs. Battersby, Mrs. Simcock, Mrs. Beech, Mrs. J. Booth, Mrs. Alcock, Mrs. R. Bould and Mrs. W. Biddulph.

Staffordshire Sentinel
October 9th. 1914.

QUEEN MARY'S NEEDLEWORK GUILD.

MISS HEATH'S WORKING PARTIES AT BIDDULPH.

The value of the Biddulph Sewing Parties, organised by Miss Heath, Biddulph Grange, in supplying suitable garments for our gallant soldiers and sailors either at the front or in hospital, has been extended to our embryo soldiers nearer home, and this week 48 shirts and 12 pairs of socks were despatched to the Reserve Battalion of the 5th North Staffords at Butterton Hall. A parcel containing 96 pairs of socks was also forwarded to Queen Mary on October 3rd.

The following further gifts of garments have been received by Miss Heath, and the generous response of the ladies of Biddulph in aid of the sick and needy soldiers and sailors is certainly a credit to the district:—Mrs. Bateman helpless case shirt; Mrs. A. Butterworth, nightshirt, belt and scarf; Mrs. C. Pollard, nightshirt and two pairs of socks; Mrs. Buxton, nightshirt and belt; Mrs. J. A. Dyke, three pairs socks; Miss A. Clowes, one pair socks; Mrs. H. Jackson, two pairs socks.

In response to Miss Heath's special appeal for subscriptions, in order that the useful work of the Biddulph Sewing Parties may continue, the following amounts have been received:—Mrs. Noah Boon, £1; Top room girls at the Reliance Fustian Mill, Walleystreet, Biddulph (per Miss Bessie Taylor), 10s.; Premier Picture Palace, Biddulph (per Mr. Geo. Crooks), 4s. 6d.; Mrs. S. Jervis, 2s. 6d.; Nurse Joyce, 2s. 6d.; total subscriptions to date, £42 4s.

Nottingham Guardian,
October 17th. 1914.

QUEEN MARY'S NEEDLEWORK GUILD, ST. JOHN AMBULANCE ASSOCIATION, & THE BRITISH RED CROSS SOCIETY.

OFFICIAL WEEKLY STATEMENT.

The public are asked to send all gifts of second-hand clothing direct to such institutions as the Church Army, the Salvation Army, friends of the poor, &c., as they cannot be dealt with by the above societies.

In the weekly statement all three societies wish to intimate that no more nightingales are required, also that no more helpless case shirts, bed jackets, cotton nightshirts, cotton shirts, bed socks, or pillows, unless of down or vegetable down, are required for the present.

The special requirements of each society for the coming week are:—

QUEEN MARY'S NEEDLEWORK GUILD.

Flannel day shirts, Cardigan jackets or sweaters, sheets, vests, pants (preferably woven), flannel pyjamas, towels, blankets.

Medical requirements: Gauze, lint, boracic lint, cotton wool.

NOTE.—No more women and children's clothes required at present.

ST. JOHN AMBULANCE ASSOCIATION.

Flannel day shirts, flannel pyjamas, sheets, blankets, vests, pants (preferably woven), Cardigan jackets or sweaters, pneumonia jackets, blue knitted helmets for navy.

Medical requirements: Gauze, lint, boracic lint, cotton wool, bandages.

NOTE.—All bandages must be rolled as tightly as possible, and the selvedges torn off.

BRITISH RED CROSS SOCIETY.

Flannel day shirts, flannel pyjamas, Cardigan jackets or mufflers, blankets, towels (Turkish and Huckaback), sweaters, vests, pants (preferably woven).

Special Medical Requirements: Gauze, boracic lint, carbolised tow, potassium antiphlogistine, peroxide of hydrogen.

NOTE.—No more Bracknell helpless shirts are required. No more pillows or pillow slips, hot water bottle covers or splints are required for the present.

The British Red Cross Society beg to inform the public that they have now ready and on sale a new illustrated book of hospital and other garments, with patterns to correspond.

66011 660
The Staffordshire Sentinel,
October 16th. 1914

QUEEN MARY'S NEEDLEWORK GUILD.

MISS HEATH'S WORKING PARTIES AT BIDDULPH.

A generous response still continues to be made to the splendid work carried out by Miss Heath's working parties in Biddulph in connection with Queen Mary's Needlework Guild. Since last week's list the following garments have been received: Mrs. W. Milnes, two pairs socks; Mrs. Griffiths, two pairs socks and piece of flannelette for shirt; Mrs. Buxton, Mrs. Pollard and Mrs. Butterworth, bandages, cholera belt, and muffler; Mrs. Docksey, two pairs of socks and two bandages; Mrs. E. Heywood, one pair socks; Miss Muriel Heathcote, one scarf; Anonymous, eight mufflers, four children's vests, one pair socks, and two pairs children's socks; Mrs. Appleton, two pairs socks and three caps; Miss Jessie Menzies, one pair socks; Miss L. Heath, three pairs mittens; Miss Brundrett, two pairs mittens.

Additional subscriptions have been received as follows: Biddulph Unionist Club, £1 1s.; Dr. A. G. S. Wallace, £1 1s.; the Bottom Room Girls from the Reliance Fustian Mill, 10s.; employees, Co-operative Society, 7s. 6d.; Mrs. Fred Pointon, 5s.; Mrs. Brindley, 5s.; Mr. Webb, 5s.; Mrs. Webb, 5s.; Miss Lees, 2s.; Mrs. Clowes, 2s.; Miss Wentworth, 1s.;. From Biddulph Moor: Mrs. J. H. Cale, £1. Total subscriptions to date, £47 8s. 6d.

A box of bandages has been sent to the St. John Ambulance Association, 15 garments and 13 pillow cases to the Red Cross Society, and a large box of clothes, containing 70 garments, to the Belgian Refugee Relief Committee. The consignment of shirts and socks, reported in our last week's issue as being sent to the Reserve Battalion at Butterton Hall, was sent to the 5th Battalion North Staffordshire Regiment.

REQUIREMENTS FOR SOLDIERS.

Official Weekly Statement.

The Queen Mary's Needlework Guild, the St. John Ambulance Association and the British Red Cross Society in the weekly statement intimate that no more nightingales are required; also that no more helpless case shirts, bed jackets, cotton nightshirts, cotton shirts, bed socks or pillows—unless of down or vegetable down—are required at present.

The special requirements of each Society for the coming week are:—

Queen Mary's Needlework Guild.—Flannel day shirts, cardigan jackets or sweaters, flannel pyjamas, sheets, towels, vests and pants (rpeferably woven), blankets. Medical requirements: Gauze, lint, boracic lint, cotton wool.

Note: No more women and children's clothes required at present.

St. John Ambulance Association.—Flannel day shirts, flannel pyjamas, sheets, blankets, vests and pants (preferably woven), cardigan jackets or sweaters, pneumonia jackets, blue knitted helmets for Navy. Medical requirements: Gauze, lint, boracic lint, bandages, cotton wool.

Note: All bandages must be rolled as tightly as possible, and the selvedges torn off.

British Red Cross Society.—Flannel day shirts, flannel pyjamas, cardigan jackets or mufflers, blankets, towels (Turkish and huckaback), sweaters, vests and pants (preferably woven. Special medical requirements: Gauze, boracic lint, carbolised tow, potassium antiphlogistine, peroxide of hydrogen.

Note: no more Bracknell helpless shirts are required. No more pillows or pillowslips, hot water bottle covers or splints are required for the present.

Accrington Observer, 17.10.14

The ladies in charge of the local Queen Mary's Needlework Guild have had an arduous task this week in distributing clothing to the families of soldiers and sailors. The distributions have taken place at Union-street School, and the four honorary secretaries of the movement have been hard at work for at least three afternoons this week. I caught a glimpse of the Mayoress (Mrs. Harwood), Mrs. J. Walmsley, Mrs. A. S. Bury, Mrs. Thomas Walmsley, Miss C. M. Kenyon, Miss E. M. Kenyon, Mrs. Rawson, and Mrs. Bolton all busy with supplies. There was hardly time to examine the neat piles of woollen "undies," and frocks before they were whisked away by brisk dames who helped the children in their "fitting-on" in an adjoining schoolroom. One thing was evident, though, the supply of finished garments was not equal to the demand. Still, the ladies marshalled the really needy cases admirably, and to the rest issued the firm order to right turn, quick march, and come again later.

Daily Call, October 6th. 1914.

WANTED—40 TONS OF SOCKS.

THE QUEEN'S APPEAL

FOR OUR TROOPS AT THE FRONT.

A SPLENDID RESPONSE.

The appeal made last week by the Queen to the women of the Empire to join with her in sending a gift to our troops at the front of a pair of socks and a knitted belt has already met with a very gratifying response.

A note reproducing the Queen's handwriting will be placed in each pair of socks intimating that it is a gift from her Majesty and from the Women of the Empire.

Gifts of large quantities of socks have been received from many generous donors. In addition to the gift of 1000 pairs previously acknowledged from Lady French's fund, a further 1500 pairs have been received. A magnificent gift of 6900 pairs from the women of Dundee, per Colonel Hill, the chairman of the Dundee Territorial Association, was received last week.

AT DEVONSHIRE HOUSE.

Many people who have not the time to knit belts and socks are purchasing them in accordance with specification, which will be sent on application to Devonshire House, and presenting them to the fund. The Queen has expressed a desire that as far as possible those who are kind enough to give belts and socks should purchase all the materials from which they are made in their own towns and villages so as to divide the trade as far as possible all over the country.

At Devonshire House Lady Isobel Gathorne-Hardy, the lady in waiting to her Majesty, and Lord Farquhar, the treasurer, are superintending the work. Twelve people are engaged in sewing together individual socks which otherwise might become separated and lost.

In another room thousands of socks are being examined separately, measured for size, and done up in bundles. In the stables at Devonshire House large bins lined with clean drugget material have been prepared for the reception of the socks before they are finally packed for transport. Some idea of the scope of the work may be obtained when it is stated that the quantities asked for by the Queen represent nearly 40 tons of socks and about 30 tons of belts.

TOMMY GETS HIS BLANKETS.

Thanks to the generous response which the public has given to Lord Kitchener's appeal the military authorities have now been able to meet the pressing demand for blankets which arose simultaneously in connection with the various new military stations in different parts of the country. Orders have been placed which will cover all future demands.

Huntingdonshire Post, October 17th. 1914.

THE QUEEN'S APPEAL.

GIFTS FOR THE TROOPS FROM THE WOMEN OF THE EMPIRE.

Bearing the following message in the Queen's handwriting: "Gift from Mary R. and the Women of the Empire," a pair of warm woollen socks and a warm body-belt are to be presented to every soldier in the British Expeditionary Force at the Front. The proposal to afford the women of the Empire this opportunity to give immediate and highly practical expression to their gratitude for the gallant work of our brave soldiers was made by the Queen at the instance of Lord Kitchener. The task of securing the 300,000 pairs of socks and the 300,000 body-belts which will be required—representing a money value of about £50,000—is being undertaken by an energetic body of ladies under the personal supervision of the Queen who has delegated the general direction to one of her Ladies in Waiting. It is hoped that all the articles required will be obtained by November 1st. It is the special desire of the Queen that in every way possible the provision of the socks and belts should be a means of giving employment to women workers who are suffering as the result of the war, and, that this may be done, it is asked that those who are able to do so should either send money gifts—which will be directly utilised to provide material and wages—or purchase their gifts in the ordinary way at the shops in their localities at which they are in the habit of dealing. The greatest interest in the progress of the scheme is being taken by both the King and Queen, who recently spent a considerable time at Devonshire House, the headquarters of the Fund dealing with Her Majesty's Appeal, inspecting the work and its results. The Queen is a frequent visitor, and samples of the articles sent and the list of money donations are examined by Her Majesty.

During last week more than £17,000 in money gifts, more than 100,000 pairs of warm woollen socks, and a considerable quantity of body-belts were received by the Lady in Waiting to the Queen at Devonshire House, Piccadilly, London, W. Up to the present, more socks than body-belts have been sent, and, while an undiminished supply of both is desired, it is hoped that a larger number of body-belts may be received in order that the maximum number of complete sets of socks and body-belts may be available for distribution. Recent gifts include a very substantial present sent by an American lady who desires to remain anonymous except for the initials "A.B.B.," and who has forwarded a parcel containing 2,084 pairs of socks and 545 body-belts. The Women of Dundee have sent a third gift of 3,150 pairs of socks, making their contribution to date 10,150 pairs. A gift of 300 pairs of socks has been received from Lady French, making the total for which she has been responsible 2,800 pairs. An Edinburgh Organisation of Women Workers has sent 1,000 pairs of socks, and 1,000 pairs of socks and 600 belts have come from a Brecknockshire Organisation. Newspapers are sending gifts secured from their readers, and big business concerns gifts made by their staffs. The fact that the Fund offers an opportunity to everyone, rich and poor alike, is being generally realised, and the manner in which the Queen's timely thought for the bodily comfort of our troops has touched the hearts of the women of the nation is evidenced by the letter received at Devonshire House.

It is estimated that warm and long-wearing woollen socks can be purchased at about 2s. a pair, and body-belts of the best quality for about 2s. 6d., or from 4s. 6d. to 5s. per set, of socks and belt. At Devonshire House, each article is thoroughly and carefully examined for size and quality, and then packed in parcels of ten, each of the four different sizes which are required being tied by a different coloured tape in order to expedite the work of distribution at the Front. The sets of ten are later made up in bales of 300 for export. Those sending quantities and buying in dozens will greatly aid the packers and examiners if they re-divide their parcels into sets of ten, seeing that each sock in a pair is connected with its companion by a strand of wool at the top, and attach their names and addresses to their parcels. The smallest size of sock has been fully supplied, and what are now required are socks measuring 10½ inches, 11 inches and 11½ inches from heel to toe. While the work is being completely carried out by women, and the Queen's appeal is addressed to women, men can aid by contributing money, which will not only buy a useful and necessary gift for the soldiers, but will also help to find employment for those in need of it. All donations of money, socks and belts, and all enquiries should be sent to the Lady in Waiting to the Queen at Devonshire House, Piccadilly, London, W. The immediate distribution of the gift of the Queen and the Women of Great and Greater Britain has been undertaken by Lord Kitchener, and the socks and belts will be delivered to the troops at the earliest possible moment.

Evening Standard, October 17th. 1914.

SOCKS AND BELTS.

THE QUEEN'S APPEAL TO THE WOMEN OF THE EMPIRE.

NEED FOR KNITTERS.

A very gratifying response is being made to the Queen's timely appeal to the Women of the Empire immediately to supply 300,000 pairs of warm woollen socks and 300,000 woven or knitted body-belts for the British Expeditionary Force.

While it is hoped that the supply of socks will continue in undiminished numbers, it is asked that a special effort shall be made to meet as quickly as possible the urgent demand for body-belts. Full particulars of the sizes, etc., of the body-belts required can be obtained on application to the Lady-in-Waiting to the Queen, at Devonshire House, London, W., the headquarters of the fund dealing with the appeal.

Sizes Required.

Body-belts being most urgently needed, it may be stated for the information of those who are now commencing to make, or are intending to purchase, these articles that the sizes required are body-belts measuring 20 inches in circumference and 12½ inches in depth, and 22 inches in circumference and 13 inches in depth. To those who are at present engaged in making, or who may already have purchased or ordered, body-belts of the smaller size, this notification does not, of course, apply.

In a large number of cases letters have been received at Devonshire House promising, or notifying, the dispatch of parcels of gifts, and parcels have then been sent without the names and addresses of their donors being attached. It is requested that in every case gifts forwarded in fulfilment of such notifications should be accompanied by the names and addresses of those by whom they are sent. We are also asked to state that no wool or other material is supplied for working parties from Devonshire House. Money donations are, in accordance with the Queen's desire, used to supply, through certain selected organisations, employment for women workers adversely affected by the war.

Children's Letters.

Peculiar interest invariably attaches itself to the sentiments and actions of little children. Many gifts received at Devonshire House, in response to the Queen's appeal, have come from little ones who are anxious to do something for our "brave soldiers." A little boy living at Newton Heath, Manchester, writes: "Dear Soldiers,—I, my brother and two sisters, are sending five belts we have bought with some of our pocket money. We hope the war will soon be over, and wish you 'good luck.' I am only six, so I cannot fight." From Lymington, Hampshire, a little girl writes: "I have knitted a woollen belt for a soldier. I am only a little girl, so will you please ask her Majesty to overlook any mistake there may be. I did so want to help, and I am now making mittens for the brave soldiers."

Eight working girls at Glasgow formed a private knitting club, and sent a supply of socks "to our good Queen," and other gifts of socks was made and sent in by the elder girls of a Westminster London County Council School.

It is requested that all cheques, etc., should be made payable to Lord Farquhar, who is acting as treasurer to the fund dealing with the Queen's Appeal.

All gifts and all inquiries should be addressed to the Lady-in-Waiting to the Queen, Devonshire House, Piccadilly, London, W.

66012

The Scotsman,
October 22nd. 1914

COMFORTS FOR SOLDIERS AND SAILORS.

GIFTS FROM SCOTLAND.

From aid Committees, work parties, and other county, town, and parish organisations throughout the country large numbers of articles are being sent to the Red Cross Society, and also for distribution among sailors and soldiers on active service.

GOOD WORK BY THE EDINBURGH COMMITTEE.

At a meeting of the Edinburgh and East of Scotland Committee for providing comforts for men on active service at the front held in the City Chambers yesterday, a report covering the Committee's work from its inception to the 17th of the present month was submitted. The total income for the period stated was £506, the expenditure £198, so that the balance in hand is £308. The principal items of expenditure are £108 for materials for work party, and £32 for pipes, tobacco, &c., for the Expeditionary Force. Among the contributions in cash since the last meeting of the Committee were £100 from Mr Stewart Clark, Dundas Castle; £94, 17s. 10d.—the proceeds of three Saturday evening concerts in the Waverley Market; and £50 from Mrs Ramage, Kinnear Road.

The goods received make a formidable list. Of the 11,454 pairs of socks received 9900 have been dispatched. Out of a total of 2209 shirts 1730 have been sent away, while 2329 blankets have been forwarded to the proper quarter out of the 2870 sent in. All the cigarettes received, 4030, have been sent on, along with about 20 lb. of tobacco and a quantity of chocolate and confections. But besides these articles a large quantity of other miscellaneous goods sure to be appreciated by our soldiers and sailors have been received and disposed of to advantage, and it is of interest to note that 621 pairs of socks were sent to the depôt especially for Territorials. Those units benefitting by the "large mixed parcels" go to make up a long list, and it is gratifying to know that Scottish regiments have been well looked after.

PROVISION FOR UNEMPLOYED WOMEN.

At the last meeting of the Committee a subcommittee was appointed to endeavour to make arrangements for the provision of work for unemployed women and girls, and they reported that they had been in communication with the Advisory Committee of the Prince of Wales's Fund. A joint committee had been formed, and it is hoped that in a week or so arrangement will be made for giving out work to women and girls, and also to assist workshops that have been thrown idle. It is hoped that a grant will be received from the Queen Mary section of the Prince of Wales's Fund in order to assist the work.

MESSAGE FROM THE QUEEN.

The Committee has received a message from Her Majesty the Queen, through the Lady-in-Waiting, who states that she is commanded by Her Majesty to thank the Committee for their splendid contribution of 1000 pairs of socks and 470 body-belts. This is the third consignment which the Committee have dispatched from the Central Bureau at the City Chambers. Altogether 3000 pairs of socks have been forwarded.

Dublin Evening Herald,
Oct 26th. 1914.

COMFORTS FOR THE TROOPS

Work of the Dublin Depot

Gifts of garments and small comforts still continue to arrive at the Clothing and Comforts Depot, 9 Ely place, Dublin, for Red Cross work, for the troops at the front, and for the recruits in training, and are being despatched for headquarters.

At the beginning of the week twenty-three large bales of garments and various comforts were despatched to the British Red Cross Society, 83 Pall Mall, S.W., consisting of:—

36 small pillows, 23 large pillows, 42 pillows, 99 pillowcases, 70 cotton night shirts, 40 night shirts, 49 day shirts, 10 flannel shirts, 13 helpless case shirts, 10 hospital shirts, 97 bed jackets, 10 hospital jackets, 26 Nightingales, 40 mufflers, 40 hot water bottle covers, 12 rubber hot water bottle covers, 6 sheets, 54 triangular bandages, 165 roller bandages, 168 bandages, 6 bundles boracic cotton, 8 bundles boracic pads, 10 vests, — vests, bed socks, 400 pairs socks, 12 woollen drawers, 10 sleeping suits, 11 blanket, 3 rugs, 5 dressing gowns, 38 pyjamas, 20 cholera belts, 40 handkerchiefs, handkerchiefs, 2 pairs slippers, 1 hug-me-tight, 12 kit bags (furnished); also the following: Parcel of old linen, box of cup covers, knitted eye shields, boric powder, bootlaces, notebooks, pencils, playing cards, cigarettes and tobacco

To the Expeditionary Force consignments have been sent of:—

Blankets, shirts, socks, towels, mufflers, helmets, wristlets, gloves, handkerchiefs, cholera belts, and smaller comforts such as cigarettes, tobacco, pipes, vaseline, chocolate.

The Women's Employment Section of the W.N.H.A. have ha da very busy week. Six workrooms, in some of which up to thirty people are employed, are now open, and are working on garments of various kinds. This section have been successful in obtaining contract orders for shirts, socks, palliasses, and bolster cases, and expect soon to open additional working centres and thus employ more people. Further orders will, therefore, be most gratefully received. 1,000 shirts and 1,000 socks were sent during the week to Island Bridge depot as the first instalment of an order, and a further 1,000 shirts are now ready. Some difficulty has been experienced, owing to the enormous demand for flannel, to get material for making the shirts, as so many of the mills have been commandeered by the Government, and the output to the general public outside of military circles has been considerably lessened, and the demand considerably increased owing to working parties, etc. A good many orders for socks have been received, and we have thus been enabled to employ people knitting in their own homes who are greatly in need of relief. Others are engaged in knitting cholera belts for the Queen's gift to the troops, and a larger supply of these articles is urgently required.—A Hill Tickell, K. O'Sullivan, Secretaries.

660/3 660.
Warwickshire Times,
Oct 31st. 1914.

COMFORTS FOR TROOPS.

SPLENDID RESPONSE TO THE QUEEN'S APPEAL.

BUT £10,000 STILL REQUIRED.

Only another £10,000 is required to close the Queen's Appeal to the Women of the Empire immediately to supply 300,000 woven or knitted woollen body-belts, and the same number of pairs of socks, for the troops at the front. It is hoped that every effort will be made to subscribe the £10,000 during the next week. Although this Fund was only opened about a fortnight ago, so admirable has been the response that it has already been found possible to send large quantities of body-belts and socks to the front.

The distribution of the gifts is being expedited in view of the arrival of the cold weather, and Field-Marshal Sir John French's special and urgent appeal for the immediate dispatch of body-belts. For these reasons those whose gifts take the form of articles personally knitted are asked to endeavour to complete and forward their work at the earliest possible date, and in any case by November 1st, to the Lady-in-Waiting to the Queen at Devonshire House, Piccadilly, London, W. The articles are now going out to the front in daily quantities of not less than 10,000. More than 60,000 pairs of socks and 30,000 body-belts have already been sent.

WOMEN WORKERS BENEFITED.

In response to the Queen's expressed desire that the women's gift to the troops should also to the greatest extent possible benefit women workers who are adversely affected by the war, those who have been able to do so have made their contributions in the form of money, which has been directly used through certain selected organisations to give employment. So many communications have been received at Devonshire House by the Lady-in-Waiting to whom the Queen has delegated the organisation of the appeal, that it has been found impossible immediately to acknowledge the receipt of each gift, but acknowledgment will be made in the course of a few days.

The total value of the women's gift is estimated to be between £50,000 and £60,000. It will be seen that in about two weeks subscriptions varying from two shillings to £3,000 and gifts in kind have already supplied more than four-fifths. It is hoped that this remarkable response will be continued until the £10,000 now required to complete the gift has been received.

All cheques, etc., should be made payable to Lord Farquhar, who, at the Queen's request, is acting as Treasurer of the Fund dealing with the Appeal, and all gifts should be addressed to: The Lady-in-Waiting to the Queen, Devonshire House, Piccadilly, London, W.

660/4 660.

Whitehaven Advertiser, Nov: 7th. 1914.

THE QUEEN'S FUND CLOSED.

SUCCESS OF THE WOMEN'S GIFT TO THE TROOPS AT THE FRONT.

So swift and generous a response has been made by the Women of the Empire to the Queen's Appeal for 300,000 body-belts and 300,000 pairs of socks for the troops at the front that it has been found possible to close the Fund well in advance of the date by which it was hoped sufficient gifts would have been received.

We are informed by the Lady in Waiting to the Queen that no new gifts are required, as it is estimated that those already being made by a generous public, or promised, will prove sufficient to meet all outstanding requirements. It is, however, asked that those who have kindly written promising gifts shall redeem their promises at the earliest possible date, and that those who are at present engaged in making body-belts and socks will finish and send in their gifts as soon as possible, in order that the distribution of the Women's Gift to the Troops may be speedily completed.

The timely and gracious suggestion made by the Queen has been put into force in a manner beneficial not only to the troops, but also to women workers who are adversely affected by the war, the money gifts being used to provide wages and materials for unemployed women.

Her Majesty's Appeal only concerned the men of the Expeditionary Force, and the closing of this Fund does not, of course, affect any other appeals that are being made for similar articles for other divisions of our Army or for the men of the Navy.

Eastern Morning News, Nov: 12th. 1914.

HOW WOMEN ARE WORKING FOR THE TROOPS.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "EASTERN MORNING NEWS.")

Sir,—We quote the following from a letter to hand from our Shanghai office this morning, as we imagine it will be of interest to your lady readers to learn that even in remote Shanghai British women are hard at work in order that they may contribute something to the comfort of our soldiers at the front. The extract reads:—

"As you are aware, for a long time now, we have held a supply of wool in connection with knitting machines, and we have now offered this to the British Women's Association here. Every British lady here is doing something for the soldiers, just in the same way as is being done at home, and we have lent them a knitting machine. They are employing one of our native women experts with these machines, and are turning the wool into socks. This woman this week has made about six dozen pairs of socks. We feel sure that this action will meet with your approval."—Yours, &c.,

(For Rose, Downs, and Thompson, Ltd.)
CHAS. DOWNS, Managing Director.
Old Foundry, Hull,
11th November, 1914.

Aberdeen Daily Journal, Dec: 2nd. 1914.

GRANTOWN-ON-SPEY LADIES' WORK PARTY.

During November the ladies' work party, Grantown-on-Spey, despatched 338 articles of clothing, including 100 pairs socks, 30 mufflers, 40 belts, 10 shirts, 20 pairs gloves, mitts, and cuffs, 9 cardigans, and 7 helmets, to Lady French for the Expeditionary Force; 20 children's new garments, 77 second-hand garments to the Belgian Relief Committee; to Lieut. Napier Beckett for the men of H.M.S. Legion, 15 mufflers, 3 helmets, 7 pairs mitts.

Lieut. Beckett, whose parents are well known in Grantown, writes that the weather is very cold, and it is rather hard to keep comfortably warm at sea. The Legion has been a lucky ship. It has taken part in every "show" up to date, and only two men have been slightly wounded. They have had some narrow "shaves" from time to time, but the only thing they desired was the appearance of the enemy.

Scotsman, Nov: 10th. 1914.

COMFORTS FOR THE INDIAN TROOPS.

EDINBURGH COMMITTEE TO BE FORMED.

Our brave Indian troops are, it appears, beginning to feel the rigour of the approach of winter in the North of France, and have need of warm clothing to help them to sustain the change of temperature. At the instance of Mrs Fletcher and Mrs MacEwan, Edinburgh, whose husbands are officers at the front with our Indian troops, it has been resolved to form a Committee in Edinburgh to assist in immediately procuring the necessary comforts for our dusky Indian warriors. Lady Redford has undertaken this task; Mr C. W. Shepherd has agreed to act as hon. secretary; and in the meantime, until other arrangements are made, it is requested that donations of warm clothing or money subscriptions to purchase such comforts, should be sent to the Tramway Offices, 1 South Charlotte Street. It is suggested that cardigan jackets and "sweaters" and woollen belts are forms of gifts which would be highly prized.

Daily Mirror, Dec: 1st 1914.

VICTORY OF THE SHIRTS.

Garments for Soldiers Made in Home of Fanciful Fashions.

(From Our Own Correspondent.)

PARIS, Nov. 28.—Many of the Paris "mannequins" are now knitting and sewing warm garments for the soldiers, and the workrooms of M. Poiret, the famous dress designer, are now given over to the making of shirts and underclothing of military pattern.

Midinettes' luncheon parties are also being held on these famous premises, and to-day I was a guest at one of these gatherings.

Thanks to the generosity of Mme. de Serbonnes, who contributed £200 for the purpose, Mme. Léra (in literature "Marc Helys") has organised a "cantine" for workgirls and women temporarily in distress.

After a visit to England to learn how it could be done cheaply, she opened a "cantine" on the lines of the girls' clubs in London.

The result is a substantial meal can be had at the Poiret workshops for fivepence.

After luncheon I made a round of the Poiret workrooms, where about 200 girls and women were making gloves, slippers, haversacks, blankets, flannel waistcoats, shirts and bandages.

All the marvellous Poiret creations are gone, and Mlle. Andrée, who designed the dresses for the last ballet at the London Alhambra, and until war broke out gave play to her imagination in evolving wonderful gowns, now sits in a workroom corner and cuts out patterns for army shirts.

W. L. McALPIN.

Sydenham Gazette, Dec: 5th. 1914.

Queen Mary's Needlework Guild.

MAYORESS'S FUND FOR WORK FOR WOMEN.

The Mayoress states that there are at present about 40 workers employed in the workrooms at Catford, the majority of whom are dressmakers, some of the more skilled of whom are employed at ladies' houses. But there are a few who have been trained as clerks, and endeavours are being made to find suitable situations for them. The whist drive which is being held at the Forest Hill Baths on the 5th inst is in aid of the funds, and ladies and gentlemen who wish to support it may obtain tickets of Mrs. R. H. Jackson, 22, Northwood-road, and Mrs. J. T. Gaymer, "Newlands," Brockley-view, Forest Hill. Gifts and comforts have been received from the following: Rating Staff per Mr. Oxenham, £20; Mr. T. Fletcher-Adams, £1 1s.; anonymous, 5s.; Mrs. Skinner, 12s.; Mr. and Mrs. Wells, £2 2s.; Mrs. Theobald, £1; Mr. W. P. Ginner, J.P., £5; Mr. E. Phillips, 10s. 6d.; Mrs. Jones, 10s.; Kilmorie-road L.C.C. School; Mrs. J. Little; Silver Star Society; Mrs. A. J. Skinner and Mrs. M. Gardner.

Parcels have been sent from the Town Hall to the Indian Soldiers' Fund, the Navy League, Greenwich Hospital, and the 9th County of London Regiment, France.

Glasgow Herald, Nov: 11th. 1914.

AYR RED CROSS HOSPITAL FOR WOUNDED SOLDIERS.

November 4.

Sir,—Owing to the pressure upon the hospitals in Glasgow, it is proposed to establish, with the approval of the War Office, under the auspices of the British Red Cross Society, and to be under the management of the branches of the Society in the Ayr districts of Ayrshire, a Red Cross hospital for 50 wounded soldiers, with an efficient staff of doctors and trained nurses, at Carrick House, Ayr, the use of which has been kindly offered by Mrs Arthur. The cost of establishing, equipping, and maintaining the hospital will be large, and to ensure the success of the proposed undertaking it is necessary for the Society to appeal to the public for subscriptions and donations. Funds are urgently required, and as the object is one which it is believed will heartily commend itself to the public sympathy, it is earnestly hoped that this appeal will meet with an immediate and liberal response. Donations of money or monthly subscriptions should be sent to Mr John H. Robb, solicitor, 5 Wellington Square, Ayr, the honorary secretary and treasurer of the Hospital Fund. Subscribers of £50 and upwards will be entitled to name one bed. Donations of provisions, groceries, vegetables, dairy produce, etc., will be gratefully accepted when the hospital is occupied, and these should be intimated meantime to the secretary, who will arrange later for delivery.—I am, etc.,

(Mrs) MAUD OSWALD, Convener,
Scottish Branch (Ayrshire Division) British Red Cross Society.

East London Advertiser, Nov 21st. 1914.

CARING FOR THE WOUNDED.

To the Editor "East London Advertiser."

Dear Sir,—The Secretary of the Division has received a letter from Headquarters pointing out that there seems to be some misapprehension on the part of the public with regard to the quantity of stores at their disposal. Far from there being a large amount of stock, further supplies of garments, hospital stores and comforts of all kinds are urgently needed. It is impossible to send too much of anything in the shape of hospital garments and comforts for the sick and wounded soldiers and sailors. In addition to the casualties amongst British soldiers a considerable number of Belgian wounded are beginning to arrive in this country and the need for assistance in the French hospitals is daily increasing.

We have pleasure in stating that the Committee of the Poplar Division have forwarded a quantity of shirts, pyjamas, socks, mufflers, bed jackets, and mittens to Headquarters to be sent to the front, and it has also contributed material to the workrooms organised by the Committee of the Queen Mary's Work for Women Fund who are very kindly making it into shirts and other useful garments.

The Graysilver Military Band (employees of Messrs. the India Rubber and Gutta Percha Co. Works, Silvertown, E.), which has already sent £11 17s., has sent us a further generous contribution of £13 16s.

We shall appreciate it very much if you will permit us to make the claims of this patriotic work made known through the columns of your valuable paper and to ask all who can do so, to send gifts of garments and materials to the Secretary, Bow House, 83, Bow Road, E., and subscriptions and donations to the Hon. Treasurer, the London and South Western Bank, Ltd., 90-92, Bow Road, E.

Yours faithfully,
NORA ST. DAVID,
Vice President.

British Red Cross Society,
Poplar Division, Bow House,
83, Bow Road, E.
17th November, 1914.

660/5 660

Newcastle Chronicle 26.12.14.

WOMEN WORKERS' COMMITTEE AT GATESHEAD.

Meeting Place for Soldiers and Their Wives.

'Through the instrumentality of the Gateshead Women Workers' Committee, which is composed of representatives of the various women's organisations in the borough, the house 21, High West Street, Gateshead, has been opened for the convenience of soldiers. The object of the institution is to provide a place where the soldiers can meet their wives and families or friends. The house, which is open from 2.30 to 9 p.m., has been placed at the disposal of the Women Workers' Committee by the Mayor of Gateshead (Alderman A. E. Wardill), and has been comfortably furnished through the generosity of other friends. Donations for the upkeep of the house will be gladly received by Miss Eleanor Sheard, hon. secretary of the Women Workers' Committee.

Daily Express. 31.12.14.

REPAIRING SOLDIERS' CLOTHING.

A practical method of helping the soldiers has been adopted at Haslemere. It consists of undertaking the repairing of the clothing of soldiers stationed at Bramshott Camp. Over 100 lady workers are grouped under ten or eleven leaders, who are responsible for the quality of the work, and for punctually returning all the articles repaired to the centre which has been established at the Haslemere Hall. The laundry delivers such garments as require mending on Wednesdays, and collects them on Saturdays. Each leader makes her own arrangements as to her working party. The men who are benefited belong to Highland regiments.

The Nottingham Guardian
31-3-15

Aberdeen Even. News.
19.10.16

660
66016

THE WOMAN'S PART.

HOW SHE IS SERVING HER COUNTRY.

The scope that is offered in present circumstances for work on the part of the women of the country, more particularly those already organised in some such a form as in the National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies, formed the subject of an instructive address delivered at yesterday's annual meeting of the Nottingham branch of the union by Mrs. Rackham, of Cambridge. Mrs. Bolton presided over a large attendance, the meeting being held in the Church Parlour at the Albert Hall Institute.

THE CARE OF INFANTS.

The chief work of women, Mrs. Rackham pointed out, was to sustain the vital forces and energies of the nation in view of the immense strain which was being put upon the life of the nation at the present time. The country had got to realise more and more how tremendously important it was that the lives of those who were now being born must be preserved at the fullest strength. The realisation, to some extent, of this had been responsible for the striking increase in maternity centres, schools for mothers, and other institutions of a like character. Since the war began, woman's sphere of work had been very much enlarged, more particularly in connection with the relief of distress resulting from the war, which, however, was happily much less widespread than had at first been anticipated.

On the whole, the speaker thought they had every reason to be gratified at the position which women had occupied in connection with relief work. All relief was controlled by a central Government Committee. There was, however, one woman member of this committee, and there were three women on the National Relief Fund Committee, while the Central Committee on Women's Employment was composed entirely of women. As a result of the efforts now being made by women, thousands of women and girls would emerge from this crisis definitely fitted to take their places as wage-earners in the industrial community.

MEDICAL SERVICE.

Another important sphere of woman's work at the present was that which was being done for wounded soldiers at the front. The National Union now had three units of Red Cross workers actually in the field, with others in preparation for departure. Already the sum of £12,000 had been subscribed in the union for this work, which was of the utmost importance both from the point of view of the work itself and of the position of women in medicine. Then in connection with relief work—week by week the Central Committee of the union had been sending parties of unemployed German girls back to Germany. On one of these visits one of the members who had conducted the party across, came back through Flushing, and there had a glimpse of the appalling state of the refugees, herded together with no food and no shelter, in thousands, on the railway station and quays of the docks. This terrible state of affairs was immediately reported to the committee, and that same night four truck loads of food were despatched to the refugees, and every day more was sent for distribution. This was before such work was taken up by any other organisation in this country.

Another duty of women in time of war was watchfulness—they should see how best they could guard against all the dangers which might attack the country. Moral dangers were bound to crop up with which it was very difficult to deal—dangers which abounded in time of war. Such a danger, which was not by any means so large in time of peace, was the question of soldiers and young girls—not that the soldier was any less moral than other men. In Cambridge they had a very large number of soldiers, and they were just starting women patrols. These patrols had no actual authority, but they hoped that this movement might lead to something more definite.

WORK FOR THE FUTURE.

It was to be hoped that in the near future the influence of women would be brought to bear on the question of arrangements for the accommodation of motherless children of a soldier. It would undoubtedly be a great relief to many a man to think that there were those who, if he so desired, could make adequate arrangements for the proper care of his children during his absence.

New demands were going to be made on women in consequence of the war. For instance, there was bound to be a large number of girls and young women who would at the end of the war have to rely on themselves all their lives for their livelihood. There must be a system formed whereby these young girls could learn to become more efficient at their particular trade—and more particularly where they could be taught trades and professions in which there was ample scope for their labour. It was not fair that girls should crowd men out of the labour market by working for less wages because they were accepted as less efficient.

"Finally," concluded Mrs. Rackham, "while men are giving their lives to save the nation, women have got to see to it that the nation is worth their fighting for."

Mrs. Bolton, who presided, said it was a remarkable thing that women had unconsciously been preparing for this war for years, by their gradual attainment of the art of co-operation. They would require every effort to make them efficient to cope with the questions and the work which would face them at the conclusion of the war. They had a great deal to learn from men's work, and she liked the thought of co-operation. Perhaps women in this respect needed a little more humility. Women

£1000 Wanted from Aberdeen.

WOMEN'S WAR-WORK.

There was a large attendance in the Town Hall, Aberdeen, yesterday at an influential meeting in support of an appeal for £12,000 to be spent on war work among women and girls in Scotland. The appeal is issued by the National Young Women's Christian Association, and the special object is to secure funds towards the provision of clubs, hostels, canteens, and rest rooms for women and girls engaged in war-time work. Lord Provost Taggart presided. He was accompanied by Professor Stalker, the Rev. Dr Hastings, the Rev. G. H. Donald, Sir John Fleming, the Hon. Emily Kinnaird, of the Scottish Appeal Committee, and Mrs Galloway, St Andrews.

Imperial Importance.

Mrs Galloway said that every day saw an increase in the clubs, canteens, and hostels. The work was well worth the sacrifice of something, so that a donation might be given to it, because much could be done for the welfare of the women and girls at all the centres. Since 1914 the Y.W.C.A. had started over 30 clubs in military centres, and over 40 hostels and canteens for munition workers. Since February, 1915, £40,000 had been asked, and that sum was nearly all spent. They now wanted £30,000, and in Scotland there were many places where they could open fresh clubs, so that £12,000, or even more, required to be raised.

Army and Navy Benefited.

The Hon. Miss Kinnaird said it was felt by the leaders of the Y.W.C.A. that what was needed for girls was a club life to keep them off the streets in the evenings. By the rest huts good work was also being done for the Army and Navy. The lads wanted women's society and advice, and she had seen the "boys" coming in, and enjoying games and music in the company of the girls they were going to leave behind them. Almost everywhere they had their "open evenings," when the girls acted as hostesses. The girls of all social grades were learning to know and appreciate each other, and were learning also that it was not the work each did, but what she was, that mattered. It was no use to talk about everybody engaged in war work having tremendously high wages. Two girls she knew got 21s a week, and they had had to go back to service. They would have served their country, but could not live on the wages they got. At some places, however, if they applied themselves to their job, the girls would get a good and sufficient wage. In the third year of the war there was a tremendous need for hostels. She had heard it whispered that Aberdeen might give £1000. (Laughter and applause.)

Steps to Aid Scheme.

Professor Stalker moved—

That this meeting of the citizens of Aberdeen has heard with great interest of the work being done by the Young Women's Christian Association amongst women and girls in Scotland, and commends the appeal to the sympathy and help of the people of Aberdeen and the north; and that, to carry out the object of the appeal, the following committee be appointed—Lord Provost Taggart, Sir John Fleming, Mr William Smith, ex-Lord Provost Maitland, Mr G. M. Cook, Colonel Stewart, Professor Stalker, the Rev. Dr Hastings, and the Rev. G. H. Donald. Convener, Sir John Fleming; and secretary, Mr James Pyper, advocate.

The Rev. G. H. Donald seconded. Aberdeen, he said, would consider £1000 a mere bagatelle. Practical and spiritual, a great work was going on. Money was required for it, and Aberdeen would do its share.

Professor Gilroy at the close of the proceedings called for a vote of thanks to the chairman.

All relief was controlled by a central Government Committee. There was, however, one woman member of this committee, and there were three women on the National Relief Fund Committee, while the Central Committee on Women's Employment was composed entirely of women. As a result of the efforts now being made by women, thousands of women and girls would emerge from this crisis definitely fitted to take their places as wage-earners in the industrial community.

MEDICAL SERVICE.

Another important sphere of woman's work at the present was that which was being done for wounded soldiers at the front. The National Union now had three units of Red Cross workers actually in the field, with others in preparation for departure. Already the sum of £12,000 had been subscribed in the union for this work, which was of the utmost importance both from the point of view of the work itself and of the position of women in medicine. Then in connection with relief work—week by week the Central Committee of the union had been sending parties of unemployed German girls back to Germany. On one of these visits one of the members who had conducted the party across, came back through Flushing, and there had a glimpse of the appalling state of the refugees, herded together with no food and no shelter, in thousands, on the railway station and quays of the docks. This terrible state of affairs was immediately reported to the committee, and that same night four truck loads of food were despatched to the refugees, and every day more was sent for distribution. This was before such work was taken up by any other organisation in this country.

Another duty of women in time of war was watchfulness—they should see how best they could guard against all the dangers which might attack the country. Moral dangers were bound to crop up with which it was very difficult to deal—dangers which abounded in time of war. Such a danger, which was not by any means so large in time of peace, was the question of soldiers and young girls—not that the soldier was any less moral than other men. In Cambridge they had a very large number of soldiers, and they were just starting women patrols. These patrols had no actual authority, but they hoped that this movement might lead to something more definite.

WORK FOR THE FUTURE.

It was to be hoped that in the near future the influence of women would be brought to bear on the question of arrangements for the accommodation of motherless children of a soldier. It would undoubtedly be a great relief to many a man to think that there were those who, if he so desired, could make adequate arrangements for the proper care of his children during his absence.

New demands were going to be made on women in consequence of the war. For instance, there was bound to be a large number of girls and young women who would at the end of the war have to rely on themselves all their lives for their livelihood. There must be a system formed whereby these young girls could learn to become more efficient at their particular trade—and more particularly where they could be taught trades and professions in which there was ample scope for their labour. It was not fair that girls should crowd men out of the labour market by working for less wages because they were accepted as less efficient.

"Finally," concluded Mrs. Rackham, "while men are giving their lives to save the nation, women have got to see to it that the nation is worth their fighting for."

Mrs. Bolton, who presided, said it was a remarkable thing that women had unconsciously been preparing for this war for years, by their gradual attainment of the art of co-operation. They would require every effort to make them efficient to cope with the questions and the work which would face them at the conclusion of the war. They had a great deal to learn from men's work, and she liked the thought of co-operation. Perhaps women in this respect needed a little more humility. Women had not learnt their lessons in business habits yet, and these they must learn, for their usefulness in the end would depend upon their own personal habits. Their aim should not be so much the striving to get things, but to fit themselves and to be worthy of the attainment.

THE BUSINESS MEETING.

At the business meeting Mrs. Dowson, sen., was elected chairman of committee, Miss Stainer treasurer, and Mrs. G. Dowson secretary (in place of Mrs. Percy and Mrs. D'Anson).

The secretary's report stated that in consequence of the war the active advocacy of women's suffrage had shared the fate of every other movement, by being placed in abeyance. The work of the society had been one of co-operation with other constitutional suffrage societies in financing and managing a mothers' and babies' welcome, and with the help of women's organisations in Bulwell, including the Women's Adult School, a "welcome" was established under the title of the "Suffrage Welcome." The total amount of money, apart from gifts of food and coal, contributed by suffragists and their friends to the "welcome," was £80 5s. 3d. In addition to the "welcome," Mrs. W. E. Dowson had interested herself in an emergency workroom, and much effective and good work had been done. The workroom had been running for four months, when the committee of the Queen's Work for Women Fund offered to take over the whole scheme, and this was agreed to.

The society had provided from amongst its members helpers to various organisations, including nurses for Red Cross work. Two consignments of scarves, mittens, and socks had been sent to the Belgian Soldiers' Fund, and a third parcel to the British depôt.

The report was adopted.

---

and in Scotland there were many places where they could open fresh clubs, so that £12,000, or even more, required to be raised.

Army and Navy Benefited.

The Hon. Miss Kinnaird said it was felt by the leaders of the Y.W.C.A. that what was needed for girls was a club life to keep them off the streets in the evenings. By the rest huts good work was also being done for the Army and Navy. The lads wanted women's society and advice, and she had seen the "boys" coming in, and enjoying games and music in the company of the girls they were going to leave behind them. Almost everywhere they had their "open evenings," when the girls acted as hostesses. The girls of all social grades were learning to know and appreciate each other, and were learning also that it was not the work each did, but what she was, that mattered. It was no use to talk about everybody engaged in war work having tremendously high wages. Two girls she knew got 21s a week, and they had had to go back to service. They would have served their country, but could not live on the wages they got. At some places, however, if they applied themselves to their job, the girls would get a good and sufficient wage. In the third year of the war there was a tremendous need for hostels. She had heard it whispered that Aberdeen might give £1000. (Laughter and applause.)

Steps to Aid Scheme.

Professor Stalker moved—

That this meeting of the citizens of Aberdeen has heard with great interest of the work being done by the Young Women's Christian Association amongst women and girls in Scotland, and commends the appeal to the sympathy and help of the people of Aberdeen and the north; and that, to carry out the object of the appeal, the following committee be appointed—Lord Provost Taggart, Sir John Fleming, Mr William Smith, ex-Lord Provost Maitland, Mr G. M. Cook, Colonel Stewart, Professor Stalker, the Rev. Dr Hastings, and the Rev. G. H. Donald. Convener, Sir John Fleming; and secretary, Mr James Pyper, advocate.

The Rev. G. H. Donald seconded. Aberdeen, he said, would consider £1000 a mere bagatelle. Practical and spiritual, a great work was going on. Money was required for it, and Aberdeen would do its share.

Professor Gilroy at the close of the proceedings called for a vote of thanks to the chairman.

Birkenhead News. 29. IV. 1916.

Dundee Courier. 6-7-16.

660

660/7

WOMEN'S PATRIOTIC WORKROOM.

An Appeal for More Helpers.

An appeal is made through our columns to the wives, mothers, and relatives of our soldiers and sailors to come in larger numbers to the workroom and do "their bit" in making sandbags and comforts for our men at the front.

The appeal, which is signed by Mrs. Alsop and Mrs. Jager, hon. superintendents, is in the following terms:—

At 73, Cathcart-street, Birkenhead, in the "Friends' Hall," which has been lent for the purpose, "The Women's Patriotic Workroom" has carried on its working parties three afternoons a week since last November. The women who have come have worked bravely, and two of them have given more than 50 afternoons, and many others 30 and 40 afternoons each to making comforts for our soldiers and sailors and sandbags for their protection. But our workers are far too few, and we want more and more of them.

URGENT NEED OF SANDBAGS.

At the present moment the need for sandbags is very great, and the urgent cry for good thick hand-made socks never ceases. They make the long marches easier.

Sandbags! Sandbags! Sandbags! More and more are needed, and we are told by those who have the sending of them to the front that for Mesopotamia alone 20,000 a week are necessary. A fortnight ago 600 sandbags went to Mesopotamia from our workroom, and some hundreds have gone to France and more are going. Everywhere we hear the same story "a sandbag means a life." "those sandbags made by machine often give way at the critical moment, they do not last." Everywhere those made by hand and of the best material are eagerly waited for and welcomed, and in response for the last 600 we sent came back a letter containing these words:—

"One cannot forget that too many sandbags cannot hurt any battery or regiment, whereas too few in a 'tight place' means men and guns wiped out; and they can never be restored! . . Re-placed is a different story."

In face of this can any of us stand idle who can possibly stretch forth a hand to help?

We appeal now for more women workers. If, as we all expect, there must, before victory come, be some great forward movement, let us help to get ready now this means of protection for our brave men to whom we owe so much.

The workroom is open from 2 to 5 every Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday afternoons, and if parties of friends come they can always find a nice quiet corner in which to sit and work together, and generally have music to listen to during the afternoon, and any one who can give us a song is heartily welcomed.

All seem to enjoy these working parties, and those who come once generally come often, and seem very glad of this opportunity of giving their work without the expense of buying materials.

A very nice tea is served during the afternoon for a trifling sum, two cups of tea for a half-penny, and a large slice of very good cake for a half-penny also.

We hope when we re-open the workroom on Tuesday next, May 2nd, after our week's holiday that we shall see many new faces amongst our old and faithful workers.

TACKLING WINTER'S WORK.

What Dundee Women Are Doing for War Relief.

There was a large attendance of members at yesterday's meeting of the Dundee Women's War Relief Fund Committee held in the Town House, with Mrs Don presiding over the earlier part of the proceedings and Miss Kynoch later. The minutes of previous meeting having been read and adopted, Miss Duncanson intimated that 4718 comforts had been received at headquarters during the past six weeks for the men at the front, this bringing the grand total up to 140,570. Miss Duncanson also notified the meeting that letters of thanks had come to hand from the Indian Soldiers' Fund; from Lieut.-Colonel Taylor, of the 8th South African Infantry; the Commanding Officer of Royal Naval Air Station; London Scottish at the front, per Mrs Malcolm; 1st Seaforth Highlanders, per Major Anstruther—parcel sent at request of Dundee Highland Society; the 5th Battalion Royal Irish Regiment, M.E.F., per Capt. Stephen; Lieut. Lindsay; 4th Black Watch Committee; Scottish Women's Hospitals for Foreign Service; and from the Base Hospital, Mombasa, B.E.F.

Mrs Kerr (hon. treasurer) read the financial statement, which showed that the balance at the central depot amounted to £160 10s 9½d. At this juncture Miss Kynoch took the chair, intimating that a letter had been received from Miss Constable thanking the committee for having nominated her as their joint secretary, but expressing inability to accept the position. Miss Kynoch then submitted the name of Miss Duncanson as honorary interim secretary, and this was agreed to. A letter of resignation had also been received from Miss Maitland Dougall, Scotscraig, who intimated that she very much regretted, for health reasons, having to resign her position as a member of their committee.

The reports of the various wards and subcommittees were next submitted, all of which showed that the winter's work was being tackled with unabated enthusiasm. Concerning the Soldiers' Hostel, it is interesting to note that since its recent inauguration no fewer than 418 men had found lodging within its walls. Another item of business was that connected with the proposed Dundee Lifeboat Flag Day. A letter had been received from the local branch of the Royal National Lifeboat Institution asking the assistance of the D.W.W.R.F.C. in the working of the Flag Day. The committee decided to place the ward depots at the disposal of the Lifeboat Committee and to give them any local information possible.

On the proposal of Miss Meehan, seconded by Miss Muckersie, the names of Mrs Allan, Arbroath Road; Mrs Fettes, Baxter Park Terrace; and Mrs Robertson, Ringham Terrace, were added to the list of membership.

Sussex Express
— 22-9-16

THE MOSS GATHERERS OF SUSSEX.

—:o:—

The women of Sussex have found many ways of helping their country in the War, and not the least ingenious device is that of collecting bog-moss, known as Sphagnum, which has valuable properties as a dressing for wounds. Of late the pages of the "Sussex Express" have borne witness to the thoughtful enterprise of ladies at Mayfield, Ticehurst, and other places in the county, who make regular expeditions into the woods near their homes, collecting the moss, and dispatching it to the Red Cross for treatment as dressings for hospital use. It is not impossible that the exigencies of war which have called forth this new enterprise may lead to the establishment of an industry, which may play a part in the rural development which it is believed must be one of the foundations of the reconstruction after the War. It has come as a revelation to many people that this important article for the treatment of the wounded is available in many parts of Sussex, and some interesting facts with regard thereto are disclosed in an article which appears in "The Treasury" on "Moss Gathering in the Sussex Forest."

The patriotic instincts of our Red Cross ladies will not we hope be offended by the statement that the surgical value of Sphagnum was discovered thereby years ago in the peat moors of Northern Germany through its chance application to a workman's injury. Since then it has been in general use in the enemy's country as a hospital dressing. The writer, M. Paige Wood, tells us that

> "Spreading upwards and outwards on the peat bed formed of its own decay, with a persistent growth that elsewhere has built up the high moor on the mountain side, the Sphagnum has driven back all other vegetation from the spot it thrives on. It will have nothing between it and the open sky. For the thirsty sponge-like tubules of the moss drink in their moisture from the atmosphere, and dependent neither on stream nor surface water to supply its needs, the Sphagnum makes for itself the bog on which it flourishes. Leaves and stems are composed of a network of capillary cells, freely perforated, and capable of storing a prodigious quantity of fluid, with walls at once so strong and so resilient that they may be squeezed dry without collapse, remaining as wonderfully absorbent as before. The fresh moss as it is gathered will retain seven times its own weight of water."

It appears there are two varities of bog moss—Sphagnum Cuspiatum and Sphagnum Cymbifolium—and both possess the peculiarly absorbent properties which constitute its usefulness to man. The moss gatherers of Sussex are playing a noble part in alleviating the pains of the battlefield, and it is due to the voluntary workers that our hospitals are now well supplied.

> "To-day moss dressings are being generally employed in the base hospitals in France, and in many of our large military hospitals at home, supplied by the efforts of voluntary workers alone. A shortage of cotton-wool has made itself felt, and the demand for Sphagnum far exceeds present possibilities of supply, although the gathering and preparation of the moss, organised more than a year ago in Scotland by the War Dressings Supply Centre, is now supplemented by collecting depots in other parts of the Kingdom, and among the Cumberland fells, on the moors of Somerset and Devon, and here in the Sussex 'forest' moss gatherers are incessantly busy."

When the moss is dried and sterilised it provides pads and dressings ready for the surgeon's use, and it is found to be softer, cooler, and far more absorbent than any cotton-wool. It is a matter for infinite satisfaction that a natural product of Sussex is proving so beneficial for the alleviation of the sufferings of our gallant soldiers, and we can hardly conceive a more noble occupation for our women at the present time than that of moss gathering. This is a mission of mercy and labour and love which will not call for workers in vain.

Aberdeen Evening News.
13.10.16

660
660/8

Women War Workers.

SIR EDWARD WARD'S TRIBUTE TO ABERDEEN.

Mr John Duthie of Cairnbulg, deputy director-general of voluntary organisations, was the principal speaker at the general meeting of the County of Aberdeen War Work Association, held in the Town and County Hall, Aberdeen, this afternoon. The audience was large and representative.

School Rolls of Honour.

Mr Duff of Hatton, Convener of the County, who was called to the chair on the motion of Mrs Gammel, Countesswells, chairman of the association, congratulated the association on the work it had been doing since its inception in January. They had despatched 32,100 substantial comforts, including 15,000 pairs of socks, for the fighting forces, military hospitals, and our Allies; subscriptions had amounted to £745, and by flag days in various parts of the counties no less than £1211 had been received. Richer districts might be expected to provide material for themselves, but their funds would provide material free of charge for poorer districts. All classes and ages had been taking part in the work. They had workers of 80, and some even over 90, and, at the other end, a considerable number of school children who had been giving useful assistance. The association was prepared to provide rolls of honour for schools and badges for children deserving the distinction.

On his motion, seconded by Mr Leith Hay of Leith Hall, the office-bearers were thanked and re-elected, and the services of the work parties and workers were acknowledged, on the motion of Mr William Smith, clerk to the Lieutenancy, seconded by Mr M'Lean of Breda.

Well and Patriotically Done.

Sir Edward Ward, Director-General of the Voluntary Organisation, in a letter regretting his inability to come north, said he should have liked to testify in person to the excellent work which was being so well and patriotically done by the associations of the county and city of Aberdeen.

Value of Sphagnum Moss.

Mr Duthie said that fine meeting was an indication of the spirit with which the voluntary workers were entering upon the third winter's campaign. A front extending from the Straits of Dover to the Persian Gulf depended upon their efforts for comforts not included in what was known as Government issue. Both in the county and the city the department had been loyally, liberally, and promptly supported. Commenting on the value of the sphagnum moss, Mr Duthie said the average demand at present was 80,000 dressings per month, but they had reason to expect that it would increase very largely, probably doubled, within the next six weeks.

Of Incalculable Value.

The organisation had been of incalculable value. Much depended on local effort, and it was there that the women of the country had become entitled to the greatest share of praise. The soldiers in the trenches and in the hospitals had been supplied in a manner that would be a consolation to many and a gratifying recollection to all when the victory was won, and it was for the share Aberdeenshire was taking in that work that he thanked them on behalf of the Director-General. (Applause.)

On the motion of Colonel Mellis, Huntly, seconded by Mrs Carter, Aberdeen, Mr Duthie was thanked for his address, the former remarking that that part of the War Office at least, under Sir Edward Ward and Mr Duthie, who was one of themselves, had been exceedingly well managed. (Applause.)

Newcastle Chronicle
2/11/16

660
660/9

ENTERTAINING THE WOUNDED.

The report of the Military Committee to the Newcastle Chamber of Commerce yesterday was interesting from more than one point of view. It told us, for instance, of the great amount of work which has been done in this district in entertaining wounded soldiers since the war broke out. In the past two years over twenty thousand soldiers have been entertained at concerts and other indoor gatherings, and nearly thirteen thousand at al fresco assemblies, such as garden parties, not forgetting the eighteen river trips made in the River Tyne Commissioners' steamer Sir William Stephenson. Mr. Daniel Stephens took a very valuable part in the organising of the excursions on the Tyne, and his cheery presence among the men was no little asset in the pleasure of an afternoon's outing. The soldiers enjoyed the trips immensely, particularly the Australians, Canadians, and New Zealanders, to whom our busy river was a fine and inspiring sight.

Dundee Courier.
30/10/16

GIRLS' RESPONSIBILITY IN TIME OF WAR.

Successful Gathering in Dundee.

Another milestone in the life of the Dundee Y.W.C.A. has been reached, and that the last ground covered has been fruitful and successful was eloquently testified at the largely-attended annual gathering held in the Kinnaird Hall on Saturday afternoon. The speakers included Sir George Baxter (presiding), the Hon. Emily Kinnaird, who spoke on "A Girl's Responsibility in Time of War": the Rev. Marshall B. Lang, the Rev. A. W. Fergusson, and Mrs Thomas Maitland, who were accompanied to the platform by Mrs Anstruther Duncan, the Rev. John Mansie, the Rev. Alex. White, the Rev. R. Prenter, Mr J. C. Robertson, Mr J. C. Low, Mr James Thomson, Miss Jessiman, Miss Doddrell, &c.

The proceedings were opened by the singing of "O, God of Bethel," followed by prayer delivered by the Rev. Marshall B. Lang. In introducing the speakers, Sir Geo. Baxter said they rejoiced that in the year that had passed they not only saw a continuance of excellent management, but an average of more than 5000 persons visiting the buildings of the Y.W.C.A. The work among the juniors had been of a most encouraging nature, while the Association Club, founded in 1915, was amply justifying its existence. The Holiday Home at Abernethy had had many visitors during the year, chiefly factory girls and munition workers, while one great event which must have given much gratification to every person associated with the Y.W.C.A. was the opening of the new Boarding House in Tay Street. This was rendered possible by the generosity of Lady Ogilvy Dalgleish and a great many other friends.

The Rev. Marshall B. Lang gave a resumé of the aims, objects, and achievements of the Association, and thereafter the Hon. Emily Kinnaird addressed the gathering. She said that whenever she looked into the faces of a number of girls she wondered if they were awake to their responsibility.

Girls' Opportunities.

There were three great opportunities before the girls of to-day. There was an opportunity for them in national work, an opportunity in municipal life, and there was an opportunity for them in the Church, and she pointed out how they in the Y.W.C.A. were trying to be an educative force among the girls in our land in respect to these three objects. The call of the country had come to girls to go into munition works and to take the place of men in Government offices, &c. Often at the request of the Government the organisers of the National Y.W.C.A. were asked to get dinners ready for 1000 girls at a day's notice. The work in military centres was hard, and it was felt that if the girls were to serve the nation successfully they must be kept in good health and good spirits, and, as it was the desire of the Y.W.C.A. leaders to surround the girls with comfort and facilities for recreation they were always glad when letters came to them from employers and the Government asking them to arrange and take over the management of a canteen or hutment.

Concerning the second opportunity, the girls had to bear in mind that they had got to build up our city, and to become good citizens. The new patriotic club life was to help them to do so. Club life as arranged by the Y.W.C.A. was a new thing for women. They had now one in Dundee. The idea was not that the organisers took the girls away from home, but rather that they were fitting them for the home. They were teaching the girls to do things not only for themselves, but for other people, so that they might carry the brightness of the club back to their homes. Thirdly, women were to take a better and more responsible place in the Church, and they must tend to the highest side of their nature. They must have in their clubs some opportunity of strengthening the ideal and spiritual side of a girl's nature. She wanted them to take this work into their heart and conscience.

In conclusion, Miss Kinnaird said that although Government and employers pay a lot for equipment they needed much more. They had asked the National Finance Department to arrange an appeal for £12,000 for Scottish work in connection with their national appeal for £50,000. The Duchess of Hamilton was chairwoman of the Scottish Appeal Committee, and in the near future an important public meeting would be held in connection with this appeal.

During the afternoon solos were rendered by Mrs Yule, while under the conductorship of Mr J. C. Fyffe, several splendid choruses were given by the Y.W.C.A. choir. Mr Thomas also took part in the programme, while Mr Henry Marshall presided at the organ.

urope: Timber-Cutting in France.

See inside

NG A LIGHT RAILWAY TO BRING UP TIMBER; ADJUSTING A SAW.

o the wood-felling stations is illustrated above. The first illustration shows the structure of saw-mill sheds being put together oodland clearing where the mill is being built. The second shows the timber-supply system being prepared laying down a ra way track to the saw-mill. The third illustration shovs a circular saw being got ready. [Official Photographs.]

660/10

WOMEN AND THE WAR.

FOR months British people, and especially the British women, have been spending money and time sending out parcels of food and clothing in the hopes of lightening the dreary lot of Tom or Dick or Harry condemned to pass his days in the cheerless surroundings of a German camp for prisoners of war. More than that, generous-hearted ones with neither Tom nor Dick nor Harry to care for, have "adopted" prisoners.

. . .

And now the Government has stepped in and changed things, and the Central (Prisoners of War) Committee is the best-abused institution in the United Kingdom, because, in its common-sense official way, it sets more value on the satisfaction of a prisoner's physical appetite than on the sentiment that inspires the sending of a piece of "fat bacon because I know Tom loves it," or "sticky gingerbread because Harry likes it at night." That, at least, is the attitude of people who view the whole of the recently devised scheme for providing all our prisoners of war (with the exception of officers) with food as merely an arbitrary act especially designed to deprive them of the pleasure of feeding absent friends.

. . .

That, of course, is very far indeed from being the truth. Man cannot live on affection alone, and there's no doubt that the thought that prompted the sending of a parcel, and the note announcing its despatch, was in many cases the only evidence the prisoner received of bulky packages of food stuffs chosen by affectionate friends at home. Generally the tragedy was not due to Hun greed, but to the want of foresight displayed by the senders, whose imagination was unequal to the effort of visualising the conditions of transit, and who were often led by carelessness or enthusiasm to include "prohibited" articles.

. . .

There were other considerations. Human nature being frail, it happened that some of the "lonely" ones managed to "corner" sufficient sympathy to secure fifty or sixty parcels a week for themselves, the contents of which they sold to their less fortunate comrades who, whether from modesty or a lack of friends, never had any parcels at all. Finally, even the Hun was shocked, and declined to deliver any parcels except to prisoners bearing the name of the sender. Then, too, national interests had to be considered. The haphazard sending of parcels to prisoners of war—over a thousand associations existed for the purpose—opened a way for abuses, which quickly crept in. Alien spies and enemies used the parcels to prisoners as a method of conveying information to the enemy. Finally, the Central Committee, of which

[Continued on

PIGS IN CLOVER: A MOTOR PIONEER'S ASSISTANT.

Recognising the national importance of the food supply, Mr. S. F. Edge, the well-known motor expert, is breeding prize pigs and pigs for slaughter, at his beautiful home in Sussex. His stock of eight hundred or more is chiefly made up of Black Berkshires. They are allowed to range through the woods instead of being penned in sties, and the system is proving very successful. Our photograph shows his assistant, Miss Martin, with a prize boar.

Photograph by L.N.A.

A PEERESS AND HER WOUNDED GUESTS: LADY ORMONDE "MARKS."

The Marchioness of Ormonde is working assiduously as a nurse in her hospital for soldiers with facial injuries, in Upper Brook Street, and takes part in their recreations, as seen in our photograph, where the Marchioness is "marking" while some of the inmates are playing billiards.—[Photograph by Newspaper Illustrations.]

660/11

A Royal Nurse and Some of Her Patients.

WITH INMATES AND MEMBERS OF HER WARD: QUEEN AUGUSTA VICTORIA OF PORTUGAL.

Queen Augusta Victoria of Portugal, who, with the young King and his mother, Queen Amelia, has displayed the most anxious care and sympathetic consideration for the wounded during the war, has now taken up duties in the Orthopoedic Hospital, Shepherd's Bush, and, like so many other royal and noble ladies, is helping in the beneficent work of mitigating the sufferings of men wounded in the Great War. Our first photograph shows the young Queen, who is a Lady of the Order of St. Elizabeth, in her ward in the hospital, wearing the uniform of the Red Cross, and surrounded by inmates and members of the ward. Photograph No. 2 shows her Majesty practising bandaging; and in No. 3 the Queen is again seen.—[Photos. by News Illustrations.]

660/12

Starr Jameson is Chairman, was formed, with its offices at 4, Thurloe Place, London, S.W., with the object of co-ordinating and centralising the business of feeding our hungry men in Germany. It is true that the system adopted does, to some extent, eliminate the personal note, but it also ensures that food is despatched to every single man, each of whom would, I fancy, vote for a parcel of eatables properly packed and scientifically selected that arrived regularly, in preference to spasmodic, sentimentally inspired ones, any hungry day of the week.

ONE MORE VOCATION FOR WOMEN: THE WOMAN BAKER AT WORK.

The "bakeresses" are seen in our photograph carrying a batch to the shop. Photograph by Alfieri.

. . . . .

In the organisation at Thurloe Place, women play an immensely important, if not the most important part. The packing of the parcels on which the life and health of our men depend lies in their hands. Every day some three hundred of them devote many hours to the business of sorting the items, and packing and labelling them ready for despatch. Some work the addressograph that stencils the address on the specially designed labels; others sit at the long tables in the packing-rooms packing box after box with the foods selected by a War Office and American expert. At another the workers tuck the address label into the side of the parcel, and insert a card with printed questions asking the prisoner whether the parcels arrive regularly, and whether a change of contents is desired. When the food-packers have done their job, others check the contents, settle them into position and tie them up neatly. Each worker who finally fastens the box marks it with her number, so that in case of defects the parcel is returned to her by the final checking department. Lastly, the boxes are sent down a slide to the despatch-room, overhauled, passed, and transferred to the vans en route for Germany.

. . . . .

Under the new scheme each man receives 30 lb. of food per fortnight, packed in three parcels, together with 14 lb. of bread sent from Berne or Copenhagen. Private generosity can step in to the extent of sending through the Central Committee, the Regimental Care Committee, and certain recognised associations, "luxury" parcels, provided the amount received by any one man does not exceed 60 lb. a fortnight. The personal element is not altogether eliminated, for individuals may "adopt" prisoners—a bureau exists for the purpose at Thurloe Place—and will be given a post-card to be sent to the prisoner adopted, telling him to expect the parcel subscribed. This "adoption" costs £2 3s. 6d. a month, though no one is obliged to "adopt" a man entirely. There is another point. Special invalid parcels can be sent to prisoners in Turkey, with food specially adapted to climatic conditions.

. . .

One other point needs emphasising. In the sense that it is recognised by the Government, and is a sort of branch of the Censor's Department, the Central Committee is an official institution. But the entire expenses of the WOMEN BAKERS: DRAWING A BATCH OF BREAD FROM THE OVEN.

Mr. W. J. Barton, of Forest Gate, is well content with his experiment of replacing his male staff, with the exception of two, by women.—[Photograph by Alfieri.] undertaking are borne by the British Red Cross Society and the Regimental Care Committee, except where "adopters" defray the amount.

. . . . .

Any visitor who saw the pitiful remnants of private parcels that come to Thurloe Place to be repacked and censored would be convinced of the necessity of the new scheme. CLAUDINE CLEVE.

66/1

The Co-operative News,

November 14th. 1914.

Soldiers' Wives and the Police.

In connection with this matter, another problem has arisen. The War Office is entrusting the police authorities with the task of visiting soldiers' wives in connection with the separation allowances. The indignation of the leaders of the women's movement in London is naturally great, and Dr. Marion Phillips (of the Women's Labour League) tells me she is bringing the matter before the Women's Co-operative Guild, whose hearty association with her denunciation of this new espionage may be anticipated. A deputation to the War Office is being arranged, and Mr. Arthur Henderson, M.P., has promised to introduce it. Mrs. Gasson, Miss Mary MacArthur, and Miss Bondfield will be among the members, and resolutions of protest from branches of the Guild will be helpful. If such work is needful, it should be undertaken by women officers of the local authorities. To suggest the policeman as the suitable person is almost indelicate: certainly it is not right.

61.

The Co-operative News,
November 21st. 1914.

OUR SOLDIERS' WIVES, WIDOWS, AND MOTHERS.

Tyrannical Order of Home Office Opposed by Women Co-operators.

As we stated last week, the Government has decided to increase the pensions and allowances of soldiers' and sailors' dependents. And while the scale, which is given below, is an improvement on the old one, it is not up to the standard demanded by the Workers' National Committee and by our Guild branches. The worst features of the scheme are the 7s. 6d. weekly pension to the soldier's widow—a sum on which no woman can be expected to live—and the fact that the police have been given the power of supervision over the wives, widows, and dependents of those of our men fighting at the front.

Naturally, this police "surveillance" has called forth indignant protests from all quarters, and at the two Guild sectional conferences just held in Manchester and London, the voting on an emergency resolution dealing with this matter was instant and unanimous, again showing that the Guild is, as ever, fully alive to the interests which touch most closely upon the rights of citizens, both men and women.

In their attitude towards these important questions, guildswomen have again proved the value of the self-imposed education in social economics which they have undertaken during the last thirty years, and it is this ready power of expressing opinions on the vital matters of everyday life, as they concern the women of the nation, which is such a valuable asset to the co-operative movement as a whole.

If, as was stated at the Manchester Conference, it is necessary to place the wives and mothers of our men at the front under police supervision; it is also necessary to place the wives of officers and others under the same supervision. But so unjust and unfair does the order seem, that one cannot really believe it will be carried out. Instead of carping in this way, would it not be more useful to start "Working Women's Clubs"? Could not some of our co-operative rooms be used for this purpose, where the women could meet and have the newspapers read to them? And those connected with relief work know what a blessing ink and paper would be to many of these women; while someone who could volunteer to write a letter would be a veritable godsend

The resolution of protest sent out by the Central Committee of our Women's Guild reads as follows:—

The Central Committee of the Women's Co-operative Guild, representing 32,000 co-operative women, protests against the new War Office order providing for the withholding of separation allowances to the "unworthy," and giving the police power to investigate cases and "try to check misconduct before it reaches a point at which it may become subject to official notice."

We consider such differentiation between sexes and classes as is entailed in such an order utterly out of place in a democratic country, and that to place such power in the hands of the police is an intolerable interference with the freedom of individual action.

We ask that this tyrannical order may be withdrawn immediately; that any measures taken to ensure proper behaviour should be of general application (such as the early closing of public-houses), or should be in the nature of counter-attractions; and we affirm that a woman's right to her separation allowance should be no more connected with what the police may consider "worthy" conduct than a man's right to his wages.

Reynold's Newspaper,
December 6th. 1914.

61.
61/2

SOLDIERS' WIVES.

Protest at Tactless Regulations by War Office.

POLICE SURVEILLANCE.

[Special to "Reynold's."]

Great disappointment prevails everywhere, but more especially amongst representative people in the Labour movement, at the issue this week-end of the revised circular by the Home Office relating to the duties of the police towards the wives and families of soldiers. The question, it will not readily be forgotten, was raised in the House of Commons when the first circular was issued, and a storm of protest took place. It seemed clear from that extraordinary document that the police were to have the duty of spying upon the dependents of soldiers, and that upon their reports was to depend the continuance of the allowance. The Government explained that their intention was really to help the women concerned, and as the language of the circular had given rise to misapprehension it was withdrawn for amendment. The amended circular was issued on Friday afternoon, and those who expected the Government to take the opportunity of rectifying a blunder are disappointed at the result.

What is the present situation under the amended order? The War Office is to give to the local police all over the country names and addresses, and all particulars of the wives and dependents of soldiers. These are to be supplied through the Army Paymaster's Department. They are to be carefully card indexed, and the register is to be kept at the police station. What is the object of all this? The order directs that "When a woman is arrested for being drunk and incapable, drunk and disorderly, or drunk in charge of children, she will be detained at the police station until sober. If she is the wife of a soldier or sailor, the station officer will not proceed with the charge, but will appeal to her better nature, warn her of the serious consequences, including the loss of separation allowance that must ensue if she persists in such irregularity of conduct, and urge upon her to prove herself worthy of the husband who is away fighting for his country."

This seems not so bad on the face of it, but the objectionable thing is that the police are to be entrusted with a delicate task which is quite outside their normal work, and for which their regular duties unfit them. Granted that some women, in the absence of their husbands, and at a time of anxiety and also of excitement, may not behave so wisely as they should, is the policeman quite the right person to give her sympathy and friendly counsel?

A "Reynolds's" representative yesterday sought the opinions of representative people who are familiar with working-class conditions, and there was a singular uranimity of condemnation.

Mr. C. W. Bowerman, M.P., Secretary of the Parliamentary Committee of the Trade Union Congress, described the circular as "monstrous." "I do not think," he added, "that any man leaves his wife and his home thinking that she is going to sit there drinking. To the women it is a deliberate insult. I do not know who is responsible for suggesting this line of action or for drafting the regulations, but it is an astounding course to pursue. The general opinion of the public, quite apart from that of the soldiers' wives themselves, will be strongly opposed to it. It is a thousand pities the House is not sitting.

Dr. Marion Phillips, secretary of the Women's Labour League, was in favour of some action being taken. "I do not think," she said, "that any body of working people would object to the State giving special attention to these children whose fathers are away, with a view to ensuring that they get the full benefit of allowance, but I am convinced they would never agree that the police are the right authorities. If the War Office knew anything about it they would go to the Public Health Department or the education authority. That would subject the soldier's wife to no indignity, but would, in fact, be helpful to her. She is very lonely without her husband, and would in most cases welcome a capable woman who holds a responsible official position, to turn to for advice and sympathy. But just imagine her turning to the policeman?"

Mr. W. C. Anderson, Chairman of the Independent Labour party, took a similar view. "The separation allowances," he said, "are not so liberal that the average woman can afford to spend much time or money in the public house. "In so far as there is a problem, and the interests of the children have to be protected, there could be no worse method of dealing with it. The names of the wives and dependents are to be indexed in the police stations. The only other people so dealt with are criminals and ticket-of-leave men. Such a thing will be properly resented by every self-respecting woman in the country, and they will have the sympathy of all right-thinking civilians. I cannot imagine anything less calculated to promote recruiting. I recognise that these women are anxious, and that news comes from them to time which causes great jubilation. What they principally need is some social centre where they can meet one another. At present the public-house is the only place. If something can be done to establish social centres for them, that will be a move in the right direction."

Calling at the office of the Police and Prison Officers' Union, our representative was told that from the point of view of policemen themselves the policing was [illegible] of citizens, both men and women.

In their attitude towards these important questions, guildswomen have again proved the value of the self-imposed education in social economics which they have undertaken during the last thirty years, and it is this ready power of expressing opinions on the vital matters of everyday life, as they concern the women of the nation, which is such a valuable asset to the co-operative movement as a whole.

If, as was stated at the Manchester Conference, it is necessary to place the wives and mothers of our men at the front under police supervision ; it is also necessary to place the wives of officers and others under the same supervision. But so unjust and unfair does the order seem, that one cannot really believe it will be carried out. Instead of carping in this way, would it not be more useful to start "Working Women's Clubs"? Could not some of our co-operative rooms be used for this purpose, where the women could meet and have the newspapers read to them? And those connected with relief work know what a blessing ink and paper would be to many of these women ; while someone who could volunteer to write a letter would be a veritable godsend

The resolution of protest sent out by the Central Committee of our Women's Guild reads as follows :—

The Central Committee of the Women's Co-operative Guild, representing 32,000 co-operative women, protests against the new War Office order providing for the withholding of separation allowances to the "unworthy," and giving the police power to investigate cases and "try to check misconduct before it reaches a point at which it may become subject to official notice."

We consider such differentiation between sexes and classes as is entailed in such an order utterly out of place in a democratic country, and that to place such power in the hands of the police is an intolerable interference with the freedom of individual action.

We ask that this tyrannical order may be withdrawn immediately; that any measures taken to ensure proper behaviour should be of general application (such as the early closing of public-houses), or should be in the nature of counter-attractions; and we affirm that a woman's right to her separation allowance should be no more connected with what the police may consider "worthy" conduct than a man's right to his wages.

What is the present situation under the amended order? The War Office is to give to the local police all over the country names and addresses, and all particulars of the wives and dependents of soldiers. These are to be supplied through the Army Paymaster's Department. They are to be carefully card indexed, and the register is to be kept at the police station. What is the object of all this? The order directs that "When a woman is arrested for being drunk and incapable, drunk and disorderly, or drunk in charge of children, she will be detained at the police station until sober. If she is the wife of a soldier or sailor, the station officer will not proceed with the charge, but will appeal to her better nature, warn her of the serious consequences, including the loss of separation allowance that must ensue if she persists in such irregularity of conduct, and urge upon her to prove herself worthy of the husband who is away fighting for his country."

This seems not so bad on the face of it, but the objectionable thing is that the police are to be entrusted with a delicate task which is quite outside their normal work, and for which their regular duties unfit them. Granted that some women, in the absence of their husbands, and at a time of anxiety and also of excitement, may not behave so wisely as they should, is the policeman quite the right person to give her sympathy and friendly counsel?

A "Reynolds's" representative yesterday sought the opinions of representative people who are familiar with working-class conditions, and there was a singular unanimity of condemnation.

Mr. C. W. Bowerman, M.P., Secretary of the Parliamentary Committee of the Trade Union Congress, described the circular as "monstrous." "I do not think," he added, "that any man leaves his wife and his home thinking that she is going to sit there drinking. To the women it is a deliberate insult. I do not know who is responsible for suggesting this line of action or for drafting the regulations, but it is an astounding course to pursue. The general opinion of the public, quite apart from that of the soldiers' wives themselves, will be strongly opposed to it. It is a thousand pities the House is not sitting.

Dr. Marion Phillips, secretary of the Women's Labour League, was in favour of some action being taken. "I do not think," she said, "that any body of working people would object to the State giving special attention to those children whose fathers are away, with a view to ensuring that they get the full benefit of allowance, but I am convinced they would never agree that the police are the right authorities. If the War Office knew anything about it they would go to the Public Health Department or the education authority. That would subject the soldier's wife to no indignity, but would, in fact, be helpful to her. She is very lonely without her husband, and would in most cases welcome a capable woman who holds a responsible official position, to turn to for advice and sympathy. But just imagine her turning to the policeman?"

Mr. W. C. Anderson, Chairman of the Independent Labour party, took a similar view. "The separation allowances," he said, "are not so liberal that the average woman can afford to spend much time or money in the public house. "In so far as there is a problem, and the interests of the children have to be protected, there could be no worse method of dealing with it. The names of the wives and dependents are to be indexed in the police stations. The only other people so dealt with are criminals and ticket-of-leave men. Such a thing will be properly resented by every self-respecting woman in the country, and they will have the sympathy of all right-thinking civilians. I cannot imagine anything less calculated to promote recruiting. I recognise that these women are anxious, and that news comes from time to time which causes great jubilation. What they principally need is some social centre where they can meet one another. At present the public-house is the only place. If something can be done to establish social centres for them, that will be a move in the right direction."

Calling at the office of the Police and Prison Officers' Union, our representative was told that from the point of view of policemen themselves the scheme was very objectionable. The war has thrown an enormous amount of extra duties upon them without this. They feel themselves unfitted to "preach sermons" to women, and they apprehend that their best meant efforts are liable to be resented, not only by the women but by the soldiers upon their return.

Daily Citizen,
Dec: 8th. 1911.

WHEN POLICE CAN ENTER HOMES.

"SINISTER POWER IN THEIR HANDS."

"No police supervision" was the emphatic cry of the Workers' National Committee yesterday with regard to the action of the Home Office, inspired by the War Office, in giving power to chief constables of counties and towns to index, supervise, and generally get policemen to play the "heavy father" to all the wives of soldiers and sailors on active service. There are at present 750,000 wives and dependents receiving separation allowances, and in each police district they are to be subject to the invidious attentions of uniformed officers. "A gratuitous insult to all British women," is the description of this treatment embodied in a strong resolution passed by the Workers' Committee, as follows:—

This committee learns with profound astonishment and resentment that the Home Office, at the instigation of the War Office, has re-issued the Order imposing upon the police the duty of supervising the conduct of wives of all soldiers and sailors. The committee reiterates its protest against this Order, and while admitting that certain changes have been made in the phrasing, claims that these alterations leave the Order still a document full of gratuitous insult to all British women and to every man fighting for the country. In addition, the Order holds the women of Great Britain up to the contempt of all other nations. The committee protests that an Order which makes it compulsory for the name of every soldier's and sailor's wife to be registered in a police office and gives the police the right of entry to the houses of these wives places a sinister power in their hands—a power which the Order leaves entirely without regulation. The committee further protests against the refusal of the Home Office and the War Office to receive a deputation, including representatives of the organised working women appointed by the Workers' National Committee to place before the authorities more reasonable and constitutional methods to deal with any difficulty likely to arise. The committee still press upon the departments concerned their right to be heard on this important matter, and personally to demand the withdrawal of this odious Order.

BECAUSE THEY WERE WOMEN

It may be recalled that the deputation referred to consisted of five Labour women (Miss Mary Macarthur, Miss Bondfield, Miss Susan Lawrence, Dr. M. Phillips, and Mrs. Gasson), and Messrs. A. Henderson, M.P., and W. Brace, M.P. On the day fixed for the reception of the deputation it was found that neither Mr. Henderson nor Mr. Brace could possibly be in London, and on that ground Mr. McKenna (Home Office) and Mr. Baker (War Office) refused to have anything at all to do with the remaining members, presumably because they were women.

Among the more objectionable features of the Supervision Order which has not been singled out for separate condemnation in the above resolution may be mentioned the ludicrous assumption of Messrs. Baker and McKenna that their action has been rendered necessary owing to the munificence of their separation allowances!

"The allowances granted to the wives and dependents of soldiers," observes the covering circular to chief constables, "are now on a more liberal scale than hitherto, and the result has been to put into the hands of many of them larger sums than they have ever previously enjoyed."

Then there is this unctuous paragraph: "The police selected for this duty will be able to warn them of the serious consequences which are certain to ensue from a course of misconduct, and persuade them by admonition and encouragement to show themselves worthy of the work which their husbands are doing in the cause of the country and of the recognition of their necessities granted by the State."

Daily Citizen,
Dec: 11th. 1911.

INSULTED WIVES.

PROTESTS AGAINST POLICE ORDER.

Letters protesting against the police supervision of soldiers' wives continue to pour into the office of The Daily Citizen.

"I wonder what the officers of the British Army would say?" writes "One of the private's wives," from Leicestershire, "if such an insult had been offered to their wives and dependents. The wives of privates live as cleanly and honestly as the wives of the officers. They send their husbands and brothers to defend our country, and are rewarded with insults. How can the War Office expect men to join the Army in such circumstances?"

Mrs. Underdown, Plumstead, writes: "I always understood that an Englishman's home was his castle, but apparently a soldier's home is the Government's. What self-respecting man will leave his home and wife to the mercy of any policeman who is detailed to enter it?"

A soldier's wife now under police supervision, writing from Burton-on-Trent, says, "Can anyone think that after five months' absence from our husbands our hearts are so light that we shall behave as this order seems to imply. Surely, if our men can leave us and trust us it is a pity the Government can't."

Manchester Relief Committee passed a resolution yesterday afternoon protesting against police inquiries into the conduct of soldiers' wives as suggested by the Home Office Circular and others have reached us from the Mansfield and District Trades and Labour Council, the Radstock National Union of Railwaymen, and the Gorton branch of the Electrical Trades Union.

Daily Citizen,
December 12th. 1911.

POLICE & SOLDIERS' WIVES.

OFFICIAL EXPLANATION OF NEW ORDER.

There was an official "explanation" and form of apology last night for the order that placed the wives of sailors and soldiers under police surveillance.

It came in the following statement:—

"In view of prevalent misconceptions as to the purpose of the recent circular to the police authorities on the subject of those in receipt of separation allowances, the Army Council wish it to be understood that the action of the police is strictly limited to the cases of the few who, by excessive drinking or otherwise, have rendered themselves liable in the ordinary course to prosecution. No surveillance of soldiers' wives who have not thus brought themselves under the notice of the police is contemplated, and no lists are necessary.

"Apart from cases in which specific complaint has been made to the War Office, the intention is, in view of the special anxieties and temptation to which soldiers' wives are now exposed, to show special consideration to them, and to proceed, in the first instance, by way not of prosecution but of admonition and friendly warning."

All action such as the removal of the children to other homes or the transfer of the allowance to the management of a responsible person was reserved to the War Office.

The Times,
Dec: 11th. 1911.

661.

THE SOLDIER'S WIFE.

PROTEST AGAINST POLICE INSPECTION.

There are many signs that the Home Office, acting at the instigation of the War Office, have committed a grave error of judgment in persisting with the order which, in effect, places the wives of soldiers and sailors under police supervision. The raison d'être of the order is that there has lately been a noticeable increase of drinking among women. The fact is vouched for by dignitaries of the Church and by social workers of responsible position. But this does not seem to warrant a general order placing the wives of all the men of the new Armies on a police register.

Protests against such a system of police surveillance have been made from many parts of the country. The police themselves do not like it, because they realise that it is at once unpopular, irritating, and mischievous. Sir E. Henry, the Commissioner of the Metropolitan Police, as stated in The Times of December 9, has decided not to send the lists of soldiers' wives who are in receipt of allowances to the district police stations, and has simply given instructions as to how to deal in a kindly helpful way with women who misconduct themselves.

A modification of the plan seems to be indicated in the Army Council's letter to the Board of Education suggesting that local education authorities should keep an eye on the children of persons drawing Army separation allowances and report to the War Office any cases of neglect.

Miss Mary MacArthur, secretary of the Women Trade Union League, which has a membership of over 200,000 organised workers, expressed a very strong objection in conversation with a representative of The Times, to what she called the stigma cast on the wives of our defenders by suggesting that the police should be in possession of their names and addresses. "I saw a letter," she said, "from a soldier in which he declared that instead of defending his country's honour he ought to be at home protecting his wife's honour."

Miss MacArthur testified that there was great and growing indignation in Labour circles at the order. "I know," she continued, "that in certain circles there is great indignation among the soldiers' wives themselves. Some people seem to think that these women belong to a dissolute and drunken class. Nothing could be farther from the truth."

Miss MacArthur's practical suggestion was that the Health Authority, and not the police, should be responsible in the case of all unsatisfactory homes or neglected children. "For my part," she concluded, "I strongly object to its being considered more necessary for the police to pay attention to the homes, wives, and children of soldiers and sailors than to any other class of the community."

By a large majority the Manchester Relief Committee yesterday passed a strong protest against the Home Office circular, which was denounced as inquisitorial and insulting. The Chief Constable said that all the circular did was to advise the police to give the women a chance and assist them if they became intoxicated. So far from harassing anyone, the circular was one of the kindest documents he had ever seen from a Government department.

661/4 661.

Hull Daily Mail 11.12.14 Votes for women 11.12.14

THE HOME OFFICE AND SOLDIERS' WIVES.

At a meeting of the Manchester Relief Committee, yesterday, a resolution was passed strongly protesting against the issue of the circular from the Home Office, suggesting inquiries by the police into the conduct of soldiers' wives. The circular was denounced as inquisitorial and an insult to women. The Chief Constable said all the circular did was to advise the police to give the women a chance and to assist them if they became intoxicated. So far from harassing anyone, the circular was one of the kindest documents he had ever seen from a Government Department.*—To-day's paper.

There is evidently a distressing difference of opinion in regard to the action of the Home Office and the wives of soldiers at the Front. Many newspapers have constituted themselves the champions of the women and their husbands, denounced the authorities as senseless and brutal, and charged the Government with insulting the suffering wives of gallant men. That is one side of the question, and it seems impossible to do otherwise than admit that the Government has acted with singular shortsightedness. But, on the other hand, we have the Chief Constable of Manchester describing the circular as one of the kindest documents he had ever seen from a Government Department, and saying that all it did was to advise the police to give the women a chance, and to assist them if they became intoxicated. The real error seems to have crept in by making the police the helpers, but the Home Office is in a good deal of a difficulty. There are police everywhere, and there is no other department equally ubiquitous. Police surveillance stinks in the nostrils of decent people, and as, after all, it is only a very small percentage of the wives of the men at the Front who require even a mild degree of supervision, it is easy to see how galling it must be to the rest of the women who are keeping the home together whilst their men are at the Front.

The simple, unhesitating patriotism of these men, who, in addition to risking their lives, make big pecuniary sacrifices for their country, has been a revelation to their fellow-countrymen. They have every possible claim on the gratitude and support of the people at large, and it would be nothing short of an egregious blunder, amounting to almost a calamity, if they or their families got the idea that they were being treated in an unworthy way. Sir E. Henry, the Commissioner of the Metropolitan Police, has, so far as his important district is concerned, taken the bull by the horns, and has decided not to send the lists of soldiers' wives who are in receipt of allowances to the district police stations, and has simply given instructions as to how to deal in a kindly helpful way with women who misconduct themselves. This action of a responsible official seems conclusively to prove that the circular was not fully considered before issue. Another point which may throw more light on the matter is a statement by Miss Mary McArthur, secretary of the Women's Trade Union League. She said:—"Some people seem to think that these women belong to a dissolute and drunken class. Nothing could be farther from the truth." At a period when few enlisted except those who could not get work, the morale of the soldier was not what it is to-day, when a great citizen army is enrolled. A teetotal army at the Front does not leave an army of drunken wives behind. The apparent reason for the circular is an alleged increase in drinking amongst women. This is very largely imaginary, and the remedy is exactly the same as that provided by the Soldiers' Institute in the Beverley-road.

The Tipperary League Social Clubs, which were once more advocated by Lady Jellicoe last evening, at a meeting in London, seek to provide a remedy. If in Hull there was a large hall in the centre of the city where wives of soldiers and sailors could see the papers, rest, have light refreshments, and enjoy the opportunity of conversation with one another, it would be an inestimable boon. This is pre-eminently a women's question, and if any supervision is needed it would come much more acceptably from other women, not necessarily women of the upper classes, than from the best-intentioned policemen.

There is another grievance which has found voice in our correspondence columns, and that is the question of free passes home for Christmas. Our soldiers in France travel free, but they have had to pay their fare home, whilst within the limits of the United Kingdom the stationing of men far from their homes, such as Scottish troops in Bedford, and Hull men at Newcastle, leave has been rendered nugatory because it has been accompanied with prohibitive railway fares. It is now stated, however, that all men allowed Christmas leave will be able to obtain free passes enabling them to travel home and back to the training centre. This is as it should be, but why in the name of Red Tape cannot such simple matters be made clear from the first, and not require an "agitation" to bring about? The British soldier is a fine fellow, and he and his wife and children deserve all the consideration we can afford them at these trying times.

The Workers' National Committee have passed a strong resolution condemning the circular issued by the War Office and Home Office for the supervision of soldiers' wives, and also protesting against the refusal of these two departments to receive a deputation on the subject from the Committee, which would have included women like Miss Susan Lawrence and Miss Mary Macarthur.

The Morning Post, Dec. 11th. 1914.

661.
661/5

SOLDIERS' WIVES.

In that once-powerful Empire of China, now the helpless prey of all nations, the practice of war is considered a degradation, and soldiers are looked upon in China as pariahs and outcasts. The result is two great evils: one that China is helpless to defend herself, and the other that such soldiers as she possesses are often hated by and hostile to the rest of the population. There has always been in this country a certain party which takes the same attitude towards the soldier, and if it had been allowed its way we should now be as helpless to defend our honour and interests as the unfortunate Celestial Empire. As it is, the evil of this point of view is known to those who are familiar with our Army. There is a certain latent jealousy on the subject which, if aggravated by any untoward incident, might have most pernicious results. For our part, we regard the Army and the Navy as, upon the whole, the best part of our population. They have their generous failings, officially described as "crime": months of good conduct are sometimes marred by a reckless midnight orgy, in which good spirits and bad drink combined produce shocking results; but they are singularly free from those meaner vices of avarice, cowardice, hard-heartedness, and dishonesty. In the same way, the wives of our soldiers and sailors are too much looked upon as a class apart by a section of the public. One reason is that soldiers' wives if they are on the strength live like the soldiers, a life separate from and unknown to the civil population. They are segregated in barracks and form a society of their own. Those who know them know that they have certain generous virtues more largely developed than is often to be found elsewhere. They are simple, generous, brave, devoted; but as a soldier's life is more elemental than the civilian's, and more subject to the terrible vicissitudes of war, soldiers' wives have also sometimes certain failings—which we might sum up in the word recklessness. Those weaker vessels among them who are suddenly bereft of their husbands, and whose lives are made at one stroke a sorrow and a blank, are sometimes given to drowning their troubles in a manner which among superficial people might bring their class into disrepute. It is unfortunately true also that those who are married off the strength have in the past been so scantily provided with money—through no fault of their husbands—that they have sometimes found it difficult to live in what is called a respectable way.

Now this great war, which is working so many social revolutions, good and bad, has had the effect of depriving a very large number of soldiers' wives of their natural stay and support—their husbands—and of suddenly throwing them upon their own resources. This stroke of ill-fortune has been aggravated in a good many cases by the maladroit administration of pay and allowances, due to the lack of national preparation for this great emergency. Soldiers' wives left without their husbands, and frequently ejected from their barrack quarters to make room for new regiments, have in the great majority of cases turned to their sad and widowed life with admirable stoicism and fortitude. But there has been a minority of cases—in the aggregate no doubt considerable, but in proportion small—which has relapsed upon a reckless way of life. It is unfortunately true that when a woman takes to drink her more delicate nervous system leaves her with less power of resistance and recovery than a man. The result is a difficult problem which ought to have been handled with quite peculiar delicacy and sympathy, because (1) of the abnormal position of these poor people, and (2) on account of the sensitiveness to civilian criticism which is too well justified by long years of misunderstanding and prejudice on the part of the civilian population. We are always hearing that it is a very fortunate thing that the present Government was in office when this country went to war. However that may be, it is one of the minor attendant misfortunes that the Radical Party has for years been associated with an attitude of hostility to the Army. Since the war the Government had done its best in several ways to redeem itself from this most unfortunate position. "The Army versus the People" cry has been put away, we trust for ever, in the dusty cupboard of disused political bogeys, and long-standing grievances in the way of allowances and pay have been substantially reformed. But, unfortunately, some amount of prejudice seems still to be blinding the vision of one or two Ministers. The HOME SECRETARY, in particular, is not distinguished by his lightness of touch in any department of his work, and he has succeeded more by lack of tact and sense than by any want of good intention in "putting up the backs" of a large number of people—particularly soldiers and their wives. At the same time, in fairness, we would add that a great deal of harm has been done by sensational misrepresentations as to the intention and effect of the order which has aroused so much controversy.

This war has bereft the population of a good many of its liberties—such liberties as were left to us by a long course of so-called "social legislation" in time of peace. The majority of the public are content to put up with these deprivations of liberty on the ground that after all their own Government, however inquisitorial, is less to be dreaded than the heavy hand of a VON DER GOLTZ. But what would make these minor deprivations more bearable are a certain tact and good sense which, it must be said, have not always been conspicuous. And so in the case of soldiers' wives. If a certain civic guardianship had been in a minority of cases, necessary, a Government which understood the soldier and the soldier's wife would have proceeded with more delicacy and circumspection. It would have proceeded in harmony with the regimental organisations and would in particular have been careful to sound the feelings of the rank and file of the Army itself. As a matter of fact, we understand that as a result of the Order a deputation of non-commissioned officers visited headquarters at Aldershot, and when the intention and effect of the measure were explained their outraged sense of self-respect was considerably mollified. It is a very great mistake for statesmen to ignore or underrate the human feeling of prejudice. The Unionist Party long suffered from the effects of neglecting human prejudice in the matter of Chinese labour. In the same way there is a prejudice—and in some respects a very healthy prejudice—against anything in the nature of police supervision. Therefore when such measures are taken, it should be made abundantly clear at the outset that they are for exceptional cases. The suspicion of a measure of general police supervision over the whole class of soldiers' wives has given rise to a very natural and, in some respects, justifiable agitation which, we may hope, has already had the desired effect. The policeman is usually an honest and kind-hearted fellow; but most of us would not, without very good reason indeed, entrust him with a sort of family latch-key. It is the suspicion of a measure of universal supervision that has raised this storm, and we are glad that steps have already been taken to prove it unfounded. We note that Socialists like Mr. HYNDMAN, who in theory would have everyone under the absolute control of the State, are the most energetic agitators on this subject, which shows how deeply individualism is engrained in the British character. At the same time we would drop a word of warning in season to the publican. Unless he is more careful as to the sale of drink he may find that some of his remaining rights as a tradesman will altogether disappear

The Gentlewoman,
December 12th. 1914.

The Gentlewoman's Opinion :—

On "The Persecution of the Soldier's Wife."

MR. REGINALD M'KENNA has added another to the list of blunders with which his name has become unenviably associated since he has been Home Secretary. His last mistake is a particularly obnoxious one and is calculated to inflict upon the wives of those who are fighting and dying for us at the Front a species of indignity which will render their lives almost intolerable. An order has been issued by the Home Office to local police officers throughout the country. instructing them to keep an index card of all wives and dependents of soldiers in receipt of separation allowance and these poor women are to be publicly visited by a policeman in uniform and warned that, if they squander their allowance in a manner not in accordance with some sort of official decorum, the sum they receive from the nation will be stopped immediately. This most objectionable form of censorship unquestionably implies that the wives of our fighting men are all tarred with the same brush and that they are likely to spend their allowances in undesirable ways which will become a scandal to the community in which they live. A more flagrant insult to the women of England has never been conceived.

I do not for a moment deny that there have been obscure cases in towns and villages where women of lax habits have been tempted to spend money in drink, but the evidence which has been forthcoming from police authorities all over the country tends to prove that these are rare exceptions indeed, and that the bulk of our soldiers' and sailors' wives are respectable women who, during a time of great trial, are doing their best to make both ends meet and are exercising the most rigid economy while their breadwinner is at the Front. If the same regulations were applied to men, the homes in every town and village in the kingdom where a small percentage of drunkenness existed, would logically have to be visited by a police officer who would inquire how each man spent his wages. Because it must be remembered that the allowances which are made to soldiers' wives represent wages earned legitimately in the service of the country, and the Government has no more right to dictate as to how that money shall be spent than that Mr. Lloyd George, or any other Minister, should be asked how he spends his £5,000 a year.

The Home Secretary seems to be personally ignorant of the fact that the classes from which our fighting men are now drawn are totally different from that comparatively small section of the community which used to supply our soldiers when our Army was on a peace footing. Scores of thousands of men earning good salaries and occupying onerous positions in the commercial life of the country have given up their posts in order to demonstrate their patriotism. Not only so, but sons of great families who have chafed at the delay in obtaining a commission have gone into the ranks. Wives of these men are to be found in comfortable villas in the suburbs of all towns and some in large mansions. These are not to be exempt from the hateful index. What must be the feelings of the man in the trench who is undergoing the most frightful hardship and the most deadly peril, when he hears that the loved one whom he has left behind, because a few women misbehave themselves, is to be subjected to a system of police espionage which must make her position in the social life of the community in which she lives a by-word and a scorn? One can conceive of no greater retarding influence on recruiting than this egregious piece of folly, and unless the order is promptly withdrawn Lord Kitchener will find that the respectable men of the country (and we are to assume that they constitute by far the large majority) will refuse to enlist. What our grandmotherly Home Secretary must get rid of is the idea that the Army Council grants are charitable donations. They are nothing of the kind. They are the

Morning Post,
December 11th. 1914.

661

SOLDIERS' WIVES AND POLICE INQUISITORS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE MORNING POST.

SIR,—There is an almost universal opinion that the House of Commons, now a paid assembly, has done itself no credit by taking another long holiday at this critical juncture in the affairs of the nation. It is true that the overwhelming majority of the people is in favour of fighting this great war to a finish, and deprecates any action which may interfere with the successful conduct of our great campaign by land and by sea. But nobody would, I think, contend that, had it been known we were entering upon the most tremendous war in all history, the present Cabinet would have been selected as the most capable body of men in this island to manage our affairs. Yet with Parliament prorogued, and an agreement come to between the two largest political parties, there is no power of effective criticism except through the Press. And even the immediate value of such criticism depends upon whether it is taken up and supported by the public at large.

Several things are being done at the present moment which, if Parliament were sitting, would inevitably become the subject of acrimonious discussion. But not one of them is more serious than the order issued by the Home Office putting the wives of our soldiers engaged at the Front under the control of the police. I am myself a member of the National Workers' Committee, which represents not fewer than 4,500,000 organised workers, most of them heads of families. There is absolute unanimity on that committee as to the nature of this order. It is regarded as a deliberate insult to the whole of the working class of this country. Wherever I go I hear the measure denounced from all sides. It gives the police, in effect, unlimited authority to spy into and control the homes of soldiers' wives: to caution, to superintend, to supervise, to correct their habits, and to censure their morals. All this virtually without appeal.

Why has this monstrous enactment been formulated by Mr. McKenna? Because an insignificant minority of women, having been paid their money at first in a lump instead of weekly, regarded the receipt of this considerable amount (for them) as an occasion for drinking more than was good for them. I say "an insignificant minority," because I am informed by those who have looked into the matter and are in a position to know, that the number of those who have thus misconducted themselves is not more than between one and two per cent. of the whole. Is that sufficient reason for giving power to the police to interfere in all the households of men fighting at the Front? Most emphatically not.

If, after public argument in the House of Commons, it had been decided that some such supervision in certain cases was desirable or necessary, even then the police were the very worst possible people to entrust with such arbitrary power of interference. As has been pointed out, this power, if to be exercised at all, should be entrusted to women holding such an official position that they could be held responsible for what they might say and do. However handled it calls for great tact and delicacy on the part of the persons told off for this ungrateful duty. It is no reflection upon the police as men to say that they could not perform their task without giving grievous offence.

It is sometimes brought up as a reproach against Social Democrats that we preach the class war. Say that we do from the economic side, have we ever proposed anything nearly so offensive against rich women as this measure of Mr. McKenna's against poor women whose husbands are risking their lives for the country? I say most emphatically we never have. I hope that the Morning Post, as one of the very few independent journals left in our caucus-ridden nation, will take this matter up and will help to force the Government to withdraw this order without loss of time.—Yours, &c.,

H. M. HYNDMAN.

9, Queen Anne's-gate, Dec. 10.

PUBLIC PROTESTS.

At a meeting of the Manchester Relief Committee yesterday a resolution was proposed strongly protesting against the issue of the circular from the Home Office suggesting inquiries by the police into the conduct of women whose husbands are soldiers on active service. The circular was denounced as inquisitorial and an insult to the women. The Chief Constable said that all the circular did was to advise the police to give the women a chance and assist them if they became intoxicated. So far from harassing anyone the circular was one of the kindest documents he had ever seen from a Government Department. The resolution was carried by a large majority.

The Women's Local Government Society has sent to the Prime Minister, Earl Kitchener, and the Home Secretary a letter of protest against the circular. One passage of the communication says: "The indignation so widely felt at the Departmental proposals seems to indicate that they would check recruiting; and, in fact, most men would be loth to subject their wives are likely to spend their allowances in undesirable ways which will become a scandal to the community in which they live. A more flagrant insult to the women of England has never been conceived.

I do not for a moment deny that there have been obscure cases in towns and villages where women of lax habits have been tempted to spend money in drink, but the evidence which has been forthcoming from police authorities all over the country tends to prove that these are rare exceptions indeed, and that the bulk of our soldiers' and sailors' wives are respectable women who, during a time of great trial, are doing their best to make both ends meet and are exercising the most rigid economy while their breadwinner is at the Front. If the same regulations were applied to men, the homes in every town and village in the kingdom where a small percentage of drunkenness existed, would logically have to be visited by a police officer who would inquire how each man spent his wages. Because it must be remembered that the allowances which are made to soldiers' wives represent wages earned legitimately in the service of the country, and the Government has no more right to dictate as to how that money shall be spent than that Mr. Lloyd George, or any other Minister, should be asked how he spends his £5,000 a year.

The Home Secretary seems to be personally ignorant of the fact that the classes from which our fighting men are now drawn are totally different from that comparatively small section of the community which used to supply our soldiers when our Army was on a peace footing. Scores of thousands of men earning good salaries and occupying onerous positions in the commercial life of the country have given up their posts in order to demonstrate their patriotism. Not only so, but sons of great families who have chafed at the delay in obtaining a commission have gone into the ranks. Wives of these men are to be found in comfortable villas in the suburbs of all towns and some in large mansions. These are not to be exempt from the hateful index. What must be the feelings of the man in the trench who is undergoing the most frightful hardship and the most deadly peril, when he hears that the loved one whom he has left behind, because a few women misbehave themselves, is to be subjected to a system of police espionage which must make her position in the social life of the community in which she lives a by-word and a scorn? One can conceive of no greater retarding influence on recruiting than this egregious piece of folly, and unless the order is promptly withdrawn Lord Kitchener will find that the respectable men of the country (and we are to assume that they constitute by far the large majority) will refuse to enlist. What our grandmotherly Home Secretary must get rid of is the idea that the Army Council grants are charitable donations. They are nothing of the kind. They are the just property of the persons who receive them and any investigation into the manner in which they are expended constitutes an interference with the liberty of the subject which is intolerable in a free country.

of families. There is absolute unanimity on that committee as to the nature of this order. It is regarded as a deliberate insult to the whole of the working class of this country. Wherever I go I hear the measure denounced from all sides. It gives the police, in effect, unlimited authority to spy into and control the homes of soldiers' wives: to caution, to superintend, to supervise, to correct their habits, and to censure their morals. All this virtually without appeal.

Why has this monstrous enactment been formulated by Mr. McKenna? Because an insignificant minority of women, having been paid their money at first in a lump instead of weekly, regarded the receipt of this considerable amount (for them) as an occasion for drinking more than was good for them. I say "an insignificant minority," because I am informed by those who have looked into the matter and are in a position to know, that the number of those who have thus misconducted themselves is not more than between one and two per cent. of the whole. Is that sufficient reason for giving power to the police to interfere in all the households of men fighting at the Front? Most emphatically not.

If, after public argument in the House of Commons, it had been decided that some such supervision in certain cases was desirable or necessary, even then the police were the very worst possible people to entrust with such arbitrary power of interference. As has been pointed out, this power, if to be exercised at all, should be entrusted to women holding such an official position that they could be held responsible for what they might say and do. However handled it calls for great tact and delicacy on the part of the persons told off for this ungrateful duty. It is no reflection upon the police as men to say that they could not perform their task without giving grievous offence.

It is sometimes brought up as a reproach against Social Democrats that we preach the class war. Say that we do from the economic side, have we ever proposed anything nearly so offensive against rich women as this measure of Mr. McKenna's against poor women whose husbands are risking their lives for the country? I say most emphatically we never have. I hope that the Morning Post, as one of the very few independent journals left in our caucus-ridden nation, will take this matter up and will help to force the Government to withdraw this order without loss of time.—Yours, &c.,

H. M. HYNDMAN.

9, Queen Anne's-gate, Dec. 10.

PUBLIC PROTESTS.

At a meeting of the Manchester Relief Committee yesterday a resolution was proposed strongly protesting against the issue of the circular from the Home Office suggesting inquiries by the police into the conduct of women whose husbands are soldiers on active service. The circular was denounced as inquisitorial and an insult to the women. The Chief Constable said that all the circular did was to advise the police to give the women a chance and assist them if they became intoxicated. So far from harassing anyone the circular was one of the kindest documents he had ever seen from a Government Department. The resolution was carried by a large majority.

The Women's Local Government Society has sent to the Prime Minister, Earl Kitchener, and the Home Secretary a letter of protest against the circular. One passage of the communication says: "The indignation so widely felt at the Departmental proposals seems to indicate that they would check recruiting; and, indeed, most men would be loth to subject their wives or other dependents to police surveillance."

661/7 661

Western Mercury. 12.12.14 Weekly Dispatch 13.12.14

The Admiralty's Thanks.

The Admiralty has undoubtedly acted wisely in deciding on a series of meetings at which Dr. Macnamara and others will convey to the workmen engaged upon ships and the manufacture of armaments the gratitude of the Government. Something of the sort has been urged by trade union leaders for some time as an excellent way of promoting good feeling among men whose service to the Empire is no less important, if less spectacular, than that of the men in the trenches and in the North Sea.

A less pleasant incident is the renewed expression in labour circles of what is clearly a growing indignation at the order placing the wives of soldiers and sailors under police supervision. In the last few days, I learn, several resolutions have been addressed to the Home Office, from all parts of the country, including one from the Manchester Relief Committee, which denounces the new order as "inquisitorial and insulting."

The principal objection appears to be to the choice of the police for the work of supervision, and Miss MacArthur has suggested the substitution of the Health Authority. But many of the resolutions object to any supervision at all.

SOLDIERS' WIVES AND THEIR HONOUR.

New Explanation of the War Office Action.

SEQUEL TO MANY PROTESTS

The Press Bureau has now issued the following official statement explaining the intentions of the authorities in regard to soldiers' wives:—

In view of prevalent misconceptions as to the purpose of the recent circular to the police authorities on the subject of those in receipt of separation allowances the Army Council wish it to be understood that the action of the police is strictly limited to the cases of the few who by excessive drinking or otherwise have rendered themselves liable in the ordinary course to prosecution. No surveillance of soldiers' wives who have not thus brought themselves under the notice of the police is contemplated and no lists are necessary. Apart from cases in which specific complaint has been made to the War Office, the intention is, in view of the special anxieties and temptations to which soldiers' wives are now exposed, to show special consideration to them, and to proceed in the first instance by way not of prosecution but of admonition and friendly warning. All action such as the removal of the children to other homes or the transfer of the allowance to the management of a responsible person was reserved to the War Office.

Sir E. Henry's Plan.

According to the plan adopted by Sir E. Henry for London any woman—not a soldier's wife only—who is arrested for being drunk is to be detained at the police station until sober. If then it turns out that she is the wife of a soldier or sailor the station officer will not proceed with the charge, but will appeal to her better nature, warn her of the risk she runs of losing her separation allowance, and then send her home, a record being kept of the admonition. This discrimination is thought to be all in favour of the soldier's wife; Sir E. Henry's circular does not state that any other woman is to be immune from the ordinary process of law after arrest.

This explanation follows upon The Weekly Dispatch campaign against the original Home Office circular to the police, which certainly caused the "misconception" which the latest official statement removes. This circular, suggesting as it did a nauseous general police surveillance of all wives of soldiers and sailors, gave rise to strong protests from many important bodies, including the War Emergency Workers' National Committee, which represents the whole of the trade unions, and condemned the Home Office circular to the police as "a document full of gratuitous insult to all British women and to every man fighting for his country." Miss Mary MacArthur, secretary of the Women's Trade Union League, representing over 200,000 workers, the Manchester Relief Committee, the Women's Local Government Society, and Mr. H. M. Hyndman all denounced the circular, and the official attitude and intentions, as now explained, will be generally welcomed.

661/8 66

Manchester Guardian 14.12.14

Soldiers' Wives.

It is not very hard to see how the War Office circular to the police, which has roused so much anger, came to be written. And if one sees this, one will be half-way to forgiving whoever drew up the circular, though the circular itself will not do at all. It was clearly drawn up, in all good faith and with the best intentions, by someone who had in mind the soldier's wife as she exists in barrack. It is not that she is any less respectable there than she is outside. But in barrack she is part of a community the whole of which is under a stricter and a more inquiring discipline than would be borne in civil life. All the inmates of a barrack, married quarters and unmarried quarters alike, are members of a kind of huge family patriarchally and strictly governed. A soldier's child obeys orders as no civilian's child obeys them—the obeying of orders is in the barrack air. The wife of a soldier "on the strength" puts up with a kind of imperative beneficence which few civilian matrons would stand, for it is also in the barrack air that everyone must be looked after for his or her good. Obviously, this kind of world, the pre-war barrack world, and nothing else, was before the mind of the man who drew up the War Office circular to the police. To him the whole thing was simple. If a soldier's wife was not steady, she must be kept from spending at the canteen. And what more simple than to ask the police, who were more in the way of knowing than anybody else, to send word of any case in which things were going wrong? No sooner said than done. Round goes the circular.

Of course it was a mistake. Of course you cannot transfer to the world of ordinary civil life the rigid regulations, the definite traditions, and the ingrained instincts of submission that have a proper place in the artificial community in barrack. Of course the new soldiers—who are more like the soldiers of the French revolutionary armies than the soldiers of the old Regular Army—were sure to resent the proposed police surveillance of their wives. Of course the police would dislike the job, though, equally of course, they would try to do it carefully and kindly; and of course the circular has been condemned by newspapers of all parties, relief committees, and everybody who knows all the circumstances to be dealt with. And yet we are a little sorry that the man who made this unlucky shot should be fallen upon with quite so much fury as has been his fate. He or they, if there are more than one of them, are condemned in the press as if they were experienced civil administrators who had sinned against the light and made an inquisitorial, undemocratic, and inhuman proposal out of the sheer perversity of their hearts. But do let us all remember, and go on remembering, that we are a body of friends confronting together a very difficult emergency, and that many of us, including probably the author of this unlucky circular, are trying our best to do jobs for which we were not trained. One practises some charity towards the efforts of amateurs to put out a fire, or of landsmen to man a ship's boat in time of need. We might as well practise as much towards the honest effort of some well-meaning military man of the pre-war days to deal with the domestic economy of a new, enormous army of a kind foreign to his whole experience. Of course the circular must go. Indeed, it is as good as gone already, in all but form. For on Friday night the War Office published through the Press Bureau a notice that the circular was to be taken as meaning about a tenth of what it had said. We do not see why the War Office should not have simply said, as it were, "Sorry, our mistake," and trusted to the good nature and good sense of the public to take the frank admission of error well. But do not let us grow angry about that either. The habit, in Government departments, of never saying that they have made a slip, but always that they have been "misconceived," is so deep-seated that even the greatest of emergencies cannot reasonably be expected to uproot it. All we need ask for is that none of the soldiers' wives be put under any sort of police surveillance from which the wives of general officers and of Cabinet Ministers are exempt. It would be fussy to ask that the circular be burnt by the public hangman in front of the Royal Exchange, as some of its critics would seem to wish. Better let it moulder, if the authorities cannot make up their minds at once to its withdrawal, like some of the sage enactments, still unrepealed, under which we might all be whipped through our parishes at the cart's tail for various inconsiderable offences.

Of course there was a reason for the mistake. It had become known that a few soldiers' wives, who had less to do through the war and more to spend—by no means the usual lot of the absent soldier's wife,—had taken to hard drinking. The Army Council, feeling as if dipsomania had broken out in Wellington Barracks, thought itself bound to do something. As a matter of fact it was bound to do nothing. Any special drunkenness of the kind, so far as it is an offence against law, is seen to by the law. So far as it is not an offence against law, but against morals only, it is a matter for moral suasion only, and Government departments, especially when they are overworked already at their proper business, are no good at moral suasion in the home. No doubt the War Office wanted to help those few husbands who, having dissipated or weak wives, wish some restraint to be placed on them, short of arrest—such restraint, in fact, as might be exercised in barrack. But it is now clear that for every husband who wishes this there are a thousand husbands who feel that the circular is a slur on their wives and resent it. No doubt, too, the War Office relied upon the police to do the proposed work of surveillance in a friendly, unofficious, neighbourly way. They had good reason to do so, but so far as such work can be done inoffensively the police will certainly do it without any official circular to order them. Policemen, of all ranks, are not machines; they know at least as well as anybody else that these special cases of drunkenness call for special forbearance and consideration, and anybody who knows the spirit in which the police, as a body, do their work will feel pretty sure that they will do, anyhow, anything that can be done by a friendly word to help a neighbour, man or woman, who is led by trouble to do something foolish. It is true imperative beneficence which few civilian matrons would stand, for it is also in the barrack air that everyone must be looked after for his or her good. Obviously, this kind of world, the pre-war barrack world, and nothing else, was before the mind of the man who drew up the War Office circular to the police. To him the whole thing was simple. If a soldier's wife was not steady, she must be kept from spending at the canteen. And what more simple than to ask the police, who were more in the way of knowing than anybody else, to send word of any case in which things were going wrong? No sooner said than done. Round goes the circular.

Of course it was a mistake. Of course you cannot transfer to the world of ordinary civil life the rigid regulations, the definite traditions, and the ingrained instincts of submission that have a proper place in the artificial community in barrack. Of course the new soldiers—who are more like the soldiers of the French revolutionary armies than the soldiers of the old Regular Army—were sure to resent the proposed police surveillance of their wives. Of course the police would dislike the job, though, equally of course, they would try to do it carefully and kindly; and of course the circular has been condemned by newspapers of all parties, relief committees, and everybody who knows all the circumstances to be dealt with. And yet we are a little sorry that the man who made this unlucky shot should be fallen upon with quite so much fury as has been his fate. He or they, if there are more than one of them, are condemned in the press as if they were experienced civil administrators who had sinned against the light and made an inquisitorial, undemocratic, and inhuman proposal out of the sheer perversity of their hearts. But do let us all remember, and go on remembering, that we are a body of friends confronting together a very difficult emergency, and that many of us, including probably the author of this unlucky circular, are trying our best to do jobs for which we [illegible] misconceived, is so deep-seated that even the greatest of emergencies cannot reasonably be expected to uproot it. All we need ask for is that none of the soldiers' wives be put under any sort of police surveillance from which the wives of general officers and of Cabinet Ministers are exempt. It would be fussy to ask that the circular be burnt by the public hangman in front of the Royal Exchange, as some of its critics would seem to wish. Better let it moulder, if the authorities cannot make up their minds at once to its withdrawal, like some of the sage enactments, still unrepealed, under which we might all be whipped through our parishes at the cart's tail for various inconsiderable offences.

Of course there was a reason for the mistake. It had become known that a few soldiers' wives, who had less to do through the war and more to spend—by no means the usual lot of the absent soldier's wife,—had taken to hard drinking. The Army Council, feeling as if dipsomania had broken out in Wellington Barracks, thought itself bound to do something. As a matter of fact it was bound to do nothing. Any special drunkenness of the kind, so far as it is an offence against law, is seen to by the law. So far as it is not an offence against law, but against morals only, it is a matter for moral suasion only, and Government departments, especially when they are overworked already at their proper business, are no good at moral suasion in the home. No doubt the War Office wanted to help those few husbands who, having dissipated or weak wives, wish some restraint to be placed on them, short of arrest—such restraint, in fact, as might be exercised in barrack. But it is now clear that for every husband who wishes this there are a thousand husbands who feel that the circular is a slur on their wives and resent it. No doubt, too, the War Office relied upon the police to do the proposed work of surveillance in a friendly, unofficious, neighbourly way. They had good reason to do so, but so far as such work can be done inoffensively the police will certainly do it without any official circular to order them. Policemen, of all ranks, are not machines; they know at least as well as anybody else that these special cases of drunkenness call for special forbearance and consideration, and anybody who knows the spirit in which the police, as a body, do their work will feel pretty sure that they will do, anyhow, anything that can be done by a friendly word to help a neighbour, man or woman, who is led by trouble to do something foolish. It is true that in time of war one must submit cheerfully to the rigid regulation of many things which it would be unbearable to have thus regulated always. But rigidity is not a thing to be desired for its own sake; it is only a sometimes necessary evil. Where it is not necessary it should be avoided, as unnecessary exposure to shell-fire should. But these are all points on which amicable agreement is, surely, attainable almost in a moment. We shall do nobody any good, except the Germans, if we all follow the examples of Mr. Blatchford and Lord Northcliffe and Mr. Bernard Shaw and devote ourselves to establishing rhetorically the wickedness or stupidity of some group or other of Englishmen whom we do not like or do not understand. That is the Kaiser's work, not anybody's here. Let us all assume, in perfect good temper, that the circular is dead and that somebody who made a pardonable slip in doing a novel task quite sees the point now.

Cotton Factory Times.
December 18th. 1914.

POLICE, SOLDIERS' WIVES, AND SWEATERS.

An example of the widely different views which it is possible to take of a given circumstance was afforded by the proceedings at the meeting of the Manchester Relief Committee, when the War Office order relating to police supervision of soldiers' and sailors' wives was under discussion. The circular, which the Chief Constable described as of a most kindly nature, was condemned by Councillor Margaret Ashton as unseemly and infamous, by Alderman Holt as abominable, and by Councillor Tom Fox as an insult to the men in the trenches. How possibly can the same thing be good and bad at the same time? Doubtless all the speakers were equally in earnest, and it may be taken for granted that neither the War Office nor the Home Office had any deliberate intention of rasping anybody's feelings in doing what they did. How, then, could the circular be construed so differently? The explanation lies in the official lack of understanding and sympathy, in the failure to realise that the country's fighting men and their womenkind have like passions and feelings with the Olympian heads of the Departments which control them.

A simple test may be applied to ascertain the proper or improper character of the offending circular, and it is this: Were the police asked or expected to spy upon officers' wives as well as upon those of ordinary soldiers and sailors? Of course, they were not, and why? Because that would have been an unheard-of outrage upon both the absent officers and their spouses. Society would have been dreadfully shocked at the mere suggestion of so grave an insult. Exactly; and that is just the case of the equally deserving rank and file. If the same "discreet and tactful action" which was called for on the part of the police had been manifested by the Army Council in the first instance, they would have saved themselves the commission of an egregious blunder. The many indignant protests have borne fruit. The action of the police is now "strictly limited to the cases of the few who by excessive drinking have rendered themselves liable, in the ordinary course, to prosecution," no general surveillance is contemplated, and no lists are considered necessary. In other words, the police are to carry out their usual duties, and nothing else. That may be taken as tantamount to a withdrawal of an order that ought never to have been issued. The soldier's wife may retort to the military authorities: "Perhaps it was well to dissemble your love, But why did you kick me downstairs?"

If the Army Council had any surplus energy to dispose of, it would have been far better applied to the prevention of sweating than in reflecting, however distantly, on a class of women who are entitled to everybody's sympathy. Parliament is committed to a Fair Contracts Resolution, and has passed a Trade Boards Act expressly aimed against the sweater, yet he is being allowed to thrive on War Office and Admiralty contracts almost under the Government's nose. The Workers' National Committee reports that it has received numerous complaints with regard to conditions of labour in connection with war contracts which are now offering so freely. A number of properly authenticated instances are quoted, and the authorities will be looked to for stern redress. A London West End firm is having sailors' flannel shirts made for 2s. 6d. per dozen, the worker finding her own cotton. A provincial firm is paying 3s. 3d. per dozen for Army shirts, whilst other firms in the same town are paying 4s. 6d. For the making of soldiers' beds the remuneration in one case is 1d. each, which enables a woman, after a long day's work, to earn the handsome sum of one shilling. A neighbouring firm pay 4½d. per bed, less cotton, the cost of which is reckoned at 1½d. per bed. That is 3d. against 1d. in the other case. In another case 1s. 3d. per dozen is paid.

Workers making thread for the Government sometimes earn on piecework no more than 5½d. per day. Outworkers on bed cushions are receiving rates enabling them to earn a penny an hour, and one firm, situate in London, offers 4d. each for the making of coats. Complaint is also made that a large number of firms in the Yorkshire area are paying below the standard rates for the weaving of khaki cloth. Now the Government cannot be held directly responsible for this glaring exploitation of the labour of deserving workers, but it has a responsibility, nevertheless. The least it can do is to satisfy itself of the abuse, and put a firm stop to it. We have not heard of any order being sent out to Chief Constables and Education Committees to interest themselves in rooting out sweaters or in offering friendly warnings to scampers of war contracts. Why not? The Government has so far declined to publish the list of Army and Navy contractors, which would help in the detection of those who are profiting unduly out of the country's needs, and helping its enemies. These it is who ought to be harried, and not soldiers' wives. The appointment of Sir George Gibb on the Army Council to supervise contracts is a step in the right direction. but what can one man do? As the Workers' National Committee points out, the only way to protect the workers and the public purse is to establish a powerful committee containing representatives of organised labour. And it must be [illegible]

[illegible] woman keep the whole [illegible]

661.

The Nation Dec 19/14. Licensing World Dec 19-14.

661/10

WOMEN AND MILITARY LAW.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Will you allow me to call attention to the trend in recent regulations towards sacrificing the liberties of the unrepresented section of the community—the women? The three particular cases to which I wish to refer are (1) the agreement reached between the police authorities and the licensed dealers to serve no drink to women in London before 11.30 a.m.; (2) the order of the Commanding Officer at Cardiff to forbid certain women being out of doors after 7 o'clock; and (3) the circular letter re the wives of soldiers and sailors issued by the Home Office to the Head of the Metropolitan Police and to other Chief Constables at the instigation of the Secretary for War and the Army Council. Each of these regulations has been made applicable, apparently, to women only, women without votes, and it is difficult to see how they can be defended on the ground of justice. In each case, too, it would seem that there is reasonable ground for questioning the legality of the action taken by the authorities.

(1) The refusal to serve drink to women in London before 11.30 is an arrangement made between the Chief Commissioner of Police and certain representatives of "the Trade." It has no legal sanction, and it may be questioned whether the licensed dealers can legally refuse to serve their women customers. I would commend to your legal readers the question whether the parties entering into this agreement to deprive the women subjects of the king of their legal rights by instigating the publicans to boycott women before 11.30 a.m., have not thereby laid themselves open to a charge of conspiracy. I speak as a layman, but is it not conspiracy for several people to agree to act jointly in doing illegal things? The Licensing Acts do not even give power to the licensing justices to discriminate between one section of the community and another. It required an Act of Parliament to exclude children under fourteen from public houses.

(2) The Commanding Officer at Cardiff has issued an order directed against certain individual women, forbidding them to be out of doors after 7 o'clock. Now, Mr. Asquith, on behalf of the Government, recently stated that there was no intention to reintroduce the C.D. Acts either in letter or in spirit. On what authority, therefore, does this Commanding Officer issue such an order against women said to be of the prostitute class? If these women have committed offences, the ordinary law provides for their imprisonment. If they have not committed offences, why should individuals be picked out and have a special new penalty imposed on them? Any law, to be just, should lay down a principle applicable to all cases falling within it.

(3) I did not see extracts from the original circular issued to the police regarding the behavior of soldiers' wives, which has now been withdrawn, but it is difficult to believe that it can have been worse than the present documents. The circulars do not explicitly state that women are to be deprived of their allowances for drunkenness, immorality, or neglect of children, but this may be presumed as these matters are dealt with in the circulars. A question requiring an answer is: Would others receiving pay from public funds, civil servants, cabinet ministers, &c., have their allowances affected by drunkenness or immorality? The public should demand a clear statement of the grounds on which the wife of a soldier or a sailor is to be deprived of her allowance, and these should not be different from those applicable to others in Government pay.

The circulars would seem also to put a dangerous power into the hands of the police—a power they do not have, I believe, over any other section of the community. The wife of a soldier or sailor taken drunk to the police office is not to be charged. She is, however, to be admonished, and a record of this admonition is to be kept. This power of acting as judge and jury is conferred on the station officer. She is to have no chance of clearing herself of the charge. Surely such power has hitherto been confined to the magistrate or judge in a properly constituted court, and even the magistrate cannot convict without giving the prisoner before him the right to clear himself. These admonitions, made and recorded by the station officer only, are to be counted against the woman in the future!

If such an innovation is to be made in police administration, it should not be confined to one small section of the community. It is specially objectionable when directed against this particularly helpless section of the public, and is quite out of keeping with the spirit of British justice.—Yours, &c.,

CHRYSTAL MACMILLAN.

[illegible] Cranley Gardens, S.W.

A Storm of Protest.

Quite a storm of protest has, in fact, been roused by the order. The Executive of the Lancashire and Cheshire Federation of Trade Unions—which represents over 200,000 members—have protested; a similar line has been taken by the Yorkshire Miners' Association, and a vigorous protest was recently made by Mr. Arthur Henderson, M.P., while speaking at a recruiting meeting at Bury. "Though it may be true that we have amongst our soldiers' wives, just as we have amongst the wives of other people, a few women who do not know how to spend economically, still, when it comes to a question of wages—and the separation allowance is nothing more—why should we interfere with freedom?" Miss Mary MacArthur, Secretary of the Women's Trade Union League, which has a membership of over 200,000 organised workers, has also expressed a very strong objection, in conversation with a representative of "The Times," to what she called the stigma cast on the wives of our defenders by suggesting that the police should be in possession of their names and addresses. "I saw a letter," she said, "from a soldier in which he declared that instead of defending his country's honour he ought to be at home protecting his wife's honour." Miss MacArthur testified that there was great and growing indignation in Labour circles at the order. "I know," she continued, "that in certain circles there is great indignation among the soldiers' wives themselves. Some people seem to think that these women belong to a dissolute and drunken class. Nothing could be farther from the truth." By a large majority the Manchester Relief Committee has also passed a strong protest against the Home Office circular, which was denounced as inquisitorial and insulting.

Evening Standard.
23. 2. 15.

POLICE SURVEILLANCE FOR SOLDIERS' WIVES.

The Women's Local Government Society has sent the following signed letter to Lord Kitchener:—

My Lord,—The undersigned respectfully urge the repeal of the War Office memorandum entitled "Cessation of Army Separation Allowances and of Allotments of Pay to the Unworthy," and of the covering letter from the Home Office, under date November 28, for the following reasons:—

1. That the alarming statements as to drinking by soldiers' wives which called forth the circulars cannot be maintained in the face of the results of careful investigations.

2. That to subject a woman to police supervision, instead of taking her case into court where her guilt or innocence can be proved, is really, however kind the intention, to deprive her of the protection of the law—thus to their injury differentiating wives and dependents of soldiers and sailors from every other class of the community.

3. That such employment of the police would be likely to impair the good relations between the people and the force.

4. That for State interference directed towards checking misconduct and protecting children, the law (which includes the Children Act) is adequate if efficiently administered.

5. That the so-called allowances are actually wages offered for work, and hence there should be no question of withholding, except after conviction, and for the benefit of the family.

6. That the withdrawal of the departmental circulars referred to will terminate discontent and restore confidence.

We have the honour to remain, my Lord, your lordship's obedient servants,

Lady Strachey, President W.L.G.S.; Mrs. Theodore Williams, chairman of Comm. W.L.G.S.; Lady Lockyer, Mrs. W. N. Shaw, hon. treasurers W.L.G.S.; Miss Leigh Browne, hon. sec. W.L.G.S.; Miss Kilgour, M.A., Met. B.C. (Paddington), hon. deputy sec. W.L.G.S.; Mrs. Creighton, National Union of Women Workers; Miss Bertha Mason, National British Women's Temperance Association; Miss Wyatt Papworth, M.A., Women's Industrial Council; Mrs. Percy Bigland, Criminal Law Amendment Commitee; Dr. Marion Phillips, Women's Labour League; Mrs. Pember Reeves, Fabian Women's Group; Mrs. Haslam, Irish Women's Suffrage and Local Government Association; Mrs. Arnold-Forster, Councillor Miss Margaret Ashton (Manchester), the Lady Frances Balfour, Miss Mary Beeton, M.A., Met. B.C. (Paddington), Councillor Miss Maud Burnett (Tynemouth), Miss Chadwick, Mrs. Chaloner, Miss Beatrice Chamberlain, the Lady Cowdray, Miss Llewellyn Davies (secretary Women's Co-operative Guild), Mrs. Despard, Miss Duncan, P.L.G., Mrs. Felkin (visitor for the Soldiers' and Sailors' Families Association), Miss I. O. Ford, P.C. (Adel.), Miss Gittins, Mrs. Price Hughes, Dr. Elsie Inglis, Lady Kinloch, Miss C. Keeling, Met. B.C. (Paddington), Miss Susan Lawrence, L.C.C., Alderman Mrs. Lees (Oldham), Provost Mrs. Malcolm (Dollar), Miss M. H. Mason (late senior inspector, B.O., Local Government Board), Miss Morgan, T.C. (ex-Mayor of Brecon), Mrs. Osler (Birmingham), Lady Roxburgh, the Countess of Selborne, Mrs. Shakespear (Birmingham), the Lady Henry Somerset, Councillor Miss Sutton (Reading), Mrs. Cobden Unwin.

662/1

662.

The Times, January 20th. 1913.

THE NATION'S FOOD.

ACTION OF THE LABOUR PARTY.

QUESTION OF STATE CONTROL.

When Parliament meets on February 2, the Government will be urged by the Labour Party to take more stringent measures for providing the community with sufficient food supplies at reasonable prices than they have yet thought fit to adopt. The exact nature of the proposals of the Labour Party will be disclosed in a report which is to be published to-morrow afternoon. This report, as The Times has already announced, is being prepared by a sub-committee of the Workers' National Committee which was formed to look after the welfare of the working classes during the war.

The National Committee appears to be thoroughly representative of the interests they have at heart. The bodies which have appointed delegates to it are :—

The Trades Union Congress, the Labour Party, General Federation of Trade Unions, Miners' Federation of Great Britain, United Textile Factory Workers, National Union of Railway Men, National Federation of Transport Workers, Independent Labour Party, the Co-operative Union, Women's Trade Union League, Women's Co-operative Guild, Women's Labour League, National Union of Teachers, London Trades Council, the Fabian Society, and the British Socialist Party.

This body has already formulated a policy in regard to wheat. They recommend the Government to commandeer all present stocks of English wheat at prices from 35s. to 40s. per quarter (which, they think, allows a reasonable margin of profit for home growers), to sell the wheat at current market prices, and in case of a surplus to pay a bounty of 5 per cent. to the growers and the balance into the Treasury. It is of interest to mention, incidentally, that, according to the latest return of market prices issued by the Board of Agriculture, the prices of English wheat in the markets during the week ended January 16 ranged from 46s. 7d. to 52s. 9d. per quarter of eight bushels. The Sub-Committee on Food Prices, to whom the subject has been referred for further consideration by the Workers' National Committee, consists of the following :—

Mr. Sidney Webb and Miss Susan Lawrence, L.C.C., of the Fabian Society ; Mr. H. M. Hyndman, British Socialist Party ; Mr. J. A. Seddon, President of the Trades Union Congress ; Mr. J. Ramsay MacDonald, M.P., and Mr. W. C. Anderson, M.P., of the Labour Party ; Mr. W. Brace, M.P., Miners' Federation ; Mr. B. Williams, Co-operative Union ; and Mr. J. S. Middleton, Secretary of the Workers' National Committee.

It may be anticipated that the policy of the National Committee with regard to the State control will be made more comprehensive by the report of this sub-committee. It will be noticed that the present policy of the National Committee is confined to the buying by the Government—or "commandeering," as they prefer to put it—of home-grown wheat. Since it was come to, a couple of months ago, the very vexed question of high freight rates and their effect on the prices of imported grain and meat has arisen, and, accordingly, the courses which the Government are urged to take have become considerably wider, more drastic, and complicated. It is said they ought to buy wheat direct from foreign growers, as they have bought sugar, to take over the food cargo boats and import supplies themselves until the end of the war, or else to fix what they conceive to be legitimate freight rates, as they have fixed maximum prices of groceries, provisions, and meat.

THE BOARD OF TRADE AND PRICES.

From these suggestions there emerges a point that does not seem to be clearly understood. That is that the Board of Trade do not themselves really fix the prices of groceries, provisions, and meat. The Board acts in each case on the recommendations of an advisory committee of persons engaged in the trade. Their announcements of the prices are thus prefaced :—"The Board of Trade are informed that the following list of maximum retail prices for cash was agreed upon by the advisory committee of retail traders in groceries and provisions" ; or, in the other case, "The advisory committee of the National Federation of Meat Traders' Associations." If the Government were to decide to control freights or the prices of home-grown and imported wheat, presumably they would likewise act upon the recommendations of advisory committees of shipowners and merchants. Another point that needs to be borne in mind is that even as regards groceries, provisions, and meat the Board of Trade are unable compulsorily to enforce their prices, for they have no power to punish by fine or imprisonment any retailer who chooses to charge more than the maximum prices for his commodities. Nevertheless, the plan is working very well. The forces behind it are competition and public opinion. If a grocer or butcher declines to let you have your butter, bacon, sugar, or steak at Board of Trade prices, you can go to his competitor across the road. It is true that the Board have received some complaints of over-charging which had actually been paid by the customers, but on inquiry these transactions were due, in towns, to credit being given, and in country districts to the goods having had to be delivered a long way from the village shop.

As regards wheat, the Government are unlikely to take any precipitate or high-handed action. Under the Food Supplies Act—one of their war emergency measures—the Government have full power to intervene if there were unreasonable withholding of any foodstuffs, if imported supplies showed signs of running short, or if prices should rise to an extent which causes hardship to the consumers. It is said to be the opinion of the Government that none of these contingencies has arisen. Their present policy, therefore, is to keep the trade routes open and safe, and to encourage in other ways shipments of wheat to this country. They think that by this means plentiful supplies of wheat can best be maintained, and the prices kept low.

Daily News. 8 Jan 13

FOOD PRICES CONTROL.

A deputation from the Joint Food Supply Committee of Associated Women's Societies to the secretary of the Cabinet Committee on Food Prices, asked: That steps be taken by the Government to regulate food and fuel prices, so that the increased price to the consumer may not be beyond the actual increase in cost, and that any corresponding fall may be secured to the consumer; and also that the Government take into immediate consideration the desirability of appointing a Board of Consultation of women housekeepers, trade workers, wholesale dealers, and retail distributors.

The secretary promised the deputation to lay the suggestions before the Cabinet Committee.

662/2 662.

The Christian Commonwealth. January 20th. 1915.

The World of Labour.

(By our Own Correspondent.)

Food Prices.

The jump in food prices has been so abnormal in the last few weeks that it will certainly be necessary to meet it by some general increase in wages—and relief scales of pay—or by some organised attempt to push prices down again. I hear that the Workers' War Emergency Committee are taking special steps to deal promptly with the matter, and have appointed a sub-committee to investigate and report without loss of time. The urgency is indeed patent to all. A cautious economist tells me that the rise is between 20 and 30 per cent. on an ordinary working-class budget, and I think that is sufficient to point the demand for vigorous action to be taken instantly. A municipal worker told me the other day that although he was in regular work and his wages were the same as before the war, he found himself quite unable now to feed and clothe his six children properly: he wanted to know whether he could get help from the Prince of Wales's Fund! And he clearly needed help. He had found 26s. a week little enough in easier times, and now his 26s. is not worth more than 21s. It seems to me that if the rise continues the Government Committee will have to revise its scale of 8s. to 10s. for an adult, with a maximum of £1 a week for a family, and the Central Committee on Women's Employment will have to increase its 10s. weekly maximum to 12s.

Contracts and the Workers.

The Workers' War Emergency Committee has won a great success in its contracts campaign, and merits the thanks of the nation. The deputation received by Sir George Gibb was told that "if all complaints which appeared to be well founded were sent to him they would be dealt with at once." Admittedly the complaints about the erection of huts for the soldiers were proved, and it was stated that improvements were being made. The presence of Sir George Gibb as head of the Contracts Department at the War Office is in itself a good sign. One of the most important things the War Office has to learn is that a soldier is not necessarily or likely to be a capable man of business, and that the contractor at home is in some ways a more dangerous and wily foe than the enemy in the field. Perhaps the best ally the War Office could have in circumventing this particular enemy is the trade unionist, and Sir George Gibb has quickly seen the importance of enlisting this help.

Child Labour and the War.

There seems to be good reason to fear that one result of the war will be to push back the movement for extending the age-limit at which children can leave school to fifteen or sixteen. At the beginning of these months of horror efforts were made by the Board of Education to induce local authorities to keep the children in school for a longer period instead of throwing them at fourteen years of age upon an overstocked labour market. The Labour movement pressed strongly but unsuccessfully for widely extended maintenance grants to enable this policy to be enforced. On the whole, I gather, it has failed. The Central Committee on Women's Employment has done something by securing the establishment of juvenile training schemes in which the local representative committees usually obtain the co-operation of the education committees; but these only affect girls. Now a sinister movement in the opposite direction is to be observed. In the agricultural districts there is a shortage of cheap labour. The farmers, seeing their opportunity, have not drawn upon the plentiful labour resources of the towns—for such labour might be dear—but have turned their attention to the boys in the schools, who are cheap. There are fortunes waiting for farmers in these days of scarcity and high prices, and with cheap boy labour the fortunes will be bigger. It may appear a difficult task, but I have good authority for saying that already with quiet persistency this detestable policy is succeeding. Apparently the Board of Education ic not objecting to it. In fact, in August, when the harvest was being gathered in, that authority appears to have acquiesced in the policy. The child of the industrial towns is being dealt with in a very different way from the child of the enslaved countryside.

How It Is Done.

To understand this policy it is necessary to explain what powers are possessed by the local education authorities. If a child is to be employed in agriculture he may be released from school for half the year at so early an age as eleven years. This means that as soon as he has made 250 attendances at school he may, under the provisions of Robson's Act, leave school for the rest of the year. This provision is made in the by-laws of most rural authorities. It has not until this year been often used, except in very exceptional cases. Further, the responsibility of deciding whether a child is to be prosecuted for non-attendance at school rests with the local authority; and all authorities do, from time to time, excuse individuals. The by-laws are no security at all if the authorities agree not to prosecute; and I am told that what is happening in the country is not so much that applications are being made to alter the by-laws (though even this has in some cases been done) but to use the power to release children who have attended for half the school year, and not to prosecute those who leave school.

Daily News 3.2.15

WORKERS' PROPOSALS.

The following proposals for the reduction of prices, recommended by the Workers' National Committee, are to be considered at a conference at the Memorial Hall on Feb. 13 of representatives of trade union branches, Socialist societies, and Co-operative and Industrial Women's organisations:

That the Government should intervene to remedy the deficiency in wheat-carrying ships, and should take steps to obtain the control of more ships, and itself bring the wheat from Argentina and Canada at the bare cost of transport.

That maximum prices for coal should be fixed by the Government.

That railway trucks belonging both to the separate railway companies and to private traders should be pooled and run to their fullest economic use.

That in fixing shipping freights for vessels under their control the Government should have regard to normal rates rather than to the excessive rates inflicted by private shipowners.

That the Government should commandeer coal supplies and distribute to household consumers through municipal or co-operative agencies.

662/3 662.

The Times, January 22nd. 1915.

STATE CONTROL OF FOOD SUPPLIES.

LABOUR PARTY PLAN.

GOVERNMENT AS WHEAT IMPORTERS.

The Workers' National Committee ascribe the abnormal increase in wheat prices to the excessive freight charges imposed by shipowners. In order to bring down prices to a reasonable level they urge the Government to use 10 or 12 of the liners which they have taken over for transport purposes in connexion with the war, or to commandeer additional steamers of the Mercantile Marine, and themselves bring the wheat from the Argentine and Canada at the bare cost of transport. This marks a departure from the original recommendation of the National Committee, which was that the Government should take possession of all home-grown stores of wheat at a fixed rate, about 35s. per quarter, and resell at market prices from time to time as required.

The meeting of the National Committee at which this new policy was adopted was held yesterday at the offices of the Trades Union Congress. Mr. J. A. SEDDON, president of the Congress, was in the chair, and among those present were :—

Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, M.P., Mr. Ben Tillett (Dockers' Union), Mr. Sidney Webb, Mr. H. M. Hyndman, Miss Susan Lawrence, Mr. W. Brace, M.P. (Miners' Federation of Great Britain), Mr. B. Williams (Cooperative Union), Mr. A. Bellamy (President of the National Union of Railwaymen), and Mr. Robert Williams (Secretary of the National Federation of Transport Workers).

The report of the sub-committee on food supplies was presented. It states that wheat and flour to the amount of 103,944,543cwt. were imported in the year 1914. The home supply for 1914 is not given; but in 1912 it was 28,500,000cwt. and 29,500,000cwt. in 1913. To show the rise in prices the report quotes the following comparative table from The Times of January 18 :—

	Jan. 16, 1915.	Jan. 17, 1914.
Wheat—
Best English	60/-	36/-
Best Canadian	61/-	36/-
Best Australian	62/-	38/-
Best Russian	60/-	35/-
Best American	61/-	37/-

As Russia is only credited with 7,234,827cwt. out of the total wheat import of 103,944,543, the report declines to attribute the rise in prices to the blockade of the Black Sea and the Baltic, but admits that the shrinkage of shipments since the year opened, on account of the war, has affected prices to some extent. The chief blame, however, is laid on the freight charges. In regard to freights on grain, the following figures are quoted from the Corn Trade News :—

	Jan. 18.	Year Ago.
New York to Liverpool	21/6	6/5
River Plate—Down River	65/-	10/-
Up River	67/6	11/6
Bahia Blanca	67/6	12/-

CAUSES OF HIGHER RATES.

The report mentions the various causes assigned by shipowners for the increase in freight charges—the taking over by the Government of a large number of vessels for transport purposes, the delay in unloading at British ports, the increased cost of labour (which it disputes)—and says that while these factors are appreciable they form no justification for the rise. It calculates that 25s. per ton excess on freightage is equivalent approximately to 6s. per quarter of wheat, or something like three farthings per quartern loaf. As it has been pointed out by a shipping authority that the wheat at present selling at the prices given above was not subject to the high freightage charges now being obtained, these increases having only been recently imposed, the report says :—"There is every prospect that unless effective steps are taken immediately cargoes at present being shipped and not due to arrive in this country until February will reach prices much in excess of those ruling at present."

The report continues :—Another important point is that large quantities of British-owned vessels are as usual trading between foreign ports, and are lost to Britain as a nation. It has been stated that nine out of every ten vessels leading at New York and other American ports bound for the Brazils, China, Japan, &c., are British. If any means could be adopted to turn this stream in our direction it would assist to relieve the position. It is well asked :—Why should vessels enjoying the protection of the British flag be engaged exclusively in carrying for other nations when we are short and suffering? The Government have a number of liners in their employ capable of carrying grain, some of which might be temporarily used in order to break freights down. If 10 or 12 of them were sent out to the Argentine or elsewhere under Government auspices to carry grain it would certainly affect freightage rates. It is reported that the Spanish and Italian Governments are already taking this course.

It would seem that if any actual control is to be exercised the mere fixing of prices will not be sufficient and, just as the Government practically commandeered a considerable proportion of the merchant service for purely military purposes, so, if any effective action is to be sustained, the remaining merchant shipping must become similarly subject to Government control. The promptitude with which the State assumed power over the national railways in order to facilitate the military transport must be seconded by a similar decisive control over the merchant service in order to protect the civil population, and, incidentally, the military and naval population also, from extortion.

THE COOPERATIVE SYSTEM.

The report concludes :—In Great Britain there are over 1,400 cooperative societies engaged in supplying all kinds of foodstuffs and provisions, groceries, boots, clothing, furniture, drapery, coal, and other commodities. Their total retail trade is £130,000,000 per year, and the saving effected by the system and returned to the purchasers amount to no less than £14,000,000, which would otherwise find its way into the pockets of private people. This saving is only the tangible monetary saving effected. In addition there is an incalculable benefit rendered to the public at large by the influence exerted by the societies steadying the market and elevating the standard of quality. The first cooperative societies came into existence as much an protest against the adulteration that was then rampant as against the high prices that prevailed.

The Workers' National Committee strongly recommend to the working and middle classes the advisability of turning to the cooperative societies for supplies. Only in these stores is it possible to buy food and other necessaries at the bare cost of production and distribution. In all other stores the purchaser has in addition to pay for a margin of profit to the proprietor of the stores and the wholesaler behind him. What the committee urges upon the Government to adopt to save the nation from undue expense and exploitation will, in its own way, be found of the first importance to the consumer.

THE COMMITTEE'S PROPOSALS.

The report was adopted and the Workers' National Committee adopted the following resolutions :—

"The Workers' National Committee are of opinion that the most effective action that the Government can now take to reduce wheat prices is to intervene to remedy the deficiency in carrying-ships; and we recommend therefore that the Government should at once take steps to obtain the control of more ships, and itself bring the wheat from Argentine and Canada at the bare cost of transport.

"In view of the fact that the short supply of coal in London and other large centres, and the special rise in retail prices is ascribed largely to the scarcity of shipping, the interruption of railway traffic, and the congestion allowed to take place in the sidings, the Workers' National Committee request the Government to take this matter into immediate consideration with a view of such arrangements being made as may permit the supply of the Metropolis and elsewhere with this necessity of life."

The Manchester Guardian, January 22nd. 1915.

662.

662/4

THE RISE IN WHEAT PRICES.

LABOUR PARTY RECOMMENDS GOVERNMENT CONTROL OF SHIPS.

IS DOCK CONGESTION THE CHIEF TROUBLE?

The rise in the price of wheat and coal was discussed in London yesterday at a meeting of the War Emergency Workers' National Committee—a body which is composed of members of the Labour party and allied organisations. It was declared that the most effective action the Government could take to reduce wheat prices would be to intervene to remedy the deficiency in carrying ships. The Government were recommended therefore to obtain control of more ships and to bring wheat from Argentina and Canada at the bare cost of transport.

It is pointed out in our London Correspondence that so far the results of the Board of Trade inquiry into the rapid rise in freights seem to show that it is not so much the shortage of ships as the unprecedented congestion at the docks that is the cause of the trouble. It is estimated that all round the coast something like a million tons of shipping are idle from this cause. The Government therefore are not in the least likely to commandeer steamers right and left—a step which some Board of Trade officials believe would aggravate the difficulty. What is probable is that an attempt will be made to attract additional labour to the docks by increased rates of pay for overtime. This will certainly be tried on the Thames and perhaps elsewhere.

The Workers' National Committee yesterday passed the following resoluion:—

The Workers' National Committee are of opinion that the most effective action that the Government can now take to reduce wheat prices is to intervene to remedy the deficiency in carrying-ships, and we recommend, therefore, that the Government shall at once take steps to obtain control of more ships and thus bring the wheat from Argentina and Canada at the bare cost of transport.

In a memorandum on the increased cost of wheat the Committee point out that the causes of the general increase in freightage charges are various—

There is little doubt that the arrangements made by the Government with certain shipping companies at the outbreak of the war for the use of vessels for the transport of troops, material, &c., is one factor that has led to keener competition among shippers. Again, the success with which the British navy has cleared the Seven Seas of German merchantmen has accentuated the problem. It is the strangest irony that dear food should be the fruits of naval victory.

Among the numerous statements inspired in the interest of the shipping companies (the Committee say) are those to the effect that the Government have requisitioned a large number of the ships of British ownership. The Committee contend that the number of ships actually in the employ of the Government will be nearer 10 per cent than 25 per cent, the figure which has been put forward. The memorandum continues:—

It is reported that the Board of Trade are considering the advisability of releasing a number of captured German vessels for British mercantile purposes, although these will probably be confined chiefly to the coasting trade and the carriage of coal, and will not therefore affect the chief food prices to any appreciable extent. Shipowners plead, with some plausibility, that the delay in unloading in British ports is a factor of some importance in the increased rates being charged. It is certainly civil population, and incidentally the military and naval population also, from extortion.

The Committee have also published their correspondence with the Board of Agriculture in October last, when they put forward the policy that the Government should commandeer the then available wheat at a fixed price and resell at market prices from time to time as required.

The Prices Sub-Committee have also had under consideration the question of coal prices, and yesterday the following resolution was unanimously adopted:—

In view of the fact that the short supply of coal in London and other large centres and the steady rise in retail prices is ascribed largely to the scarcity of shipping, the interruption of railway traffic, and the congestion allowed to take place in the sidings, the Workers' National Committee ask the Government to take this matter into immediate consideration with a view of such arrangements being made as may permit the supplying of the Metropolis and elsewhere with this necessity of life.

WORKPEOPLE & HIGHER PRICES.

THE QUESTION OF OVERTIME.

LONDON, THURSDAY.

Feeling is getting rather bitter at the big and, in some instances, unnecessary increases in the cost of food and coal, and it is quite certain that when Parliament meets the whole subject will be brought forward with the intention of obtaining a statement of the Government's attitude. There are reports from time to time of undreamt-of wealth earned by certain classes of workpeople, and it has been said that some London dockers are making as much as £4 a week, so valuable has their labour become. Much, too, has been made in overtime, but men do not relish the fact that part of this at any rate has to go in extra prices for the staple foods. It is not that they are unwilling to bear any burdens that the war may bring, but that they want first of all to be assured that the burdens are unavoidable.

The Labour party and the General Federation of Trade Unions have had committees sitting on the subject, and they are convinced that a strong case can be made out against the high rate of increase, which has been put at 20 to 25 per cent. A member of Parliament wrote only a few days ago mentioning a case which had been brought to his notice where a man was earning only 15s. a week, and was having to pay more for his bread, his tea, his meat, and his coal.

Overtime and Ill-Health.

Mrs. W. C. Anderson (Miss Mary McArthur), secretary of the National Union of Women Workers, in an interview this afternoon with a London representative of the "Manchester Guardian," said that the greatest effect would be felt by working classes—even greater than would appear from the different figures. The poorer the people the more likely were they to be living on bread and tea, so that the lower the scale of poverty the greater was the proportionate increase. The sweated home-worker lives on bread and tea and margarine, and everything that she is eating or using is costing her more. It is quite true that in some districts number of captured German vessels for British mercantile purposes, although these will probably be confined chiefly to the coasting trade and the carriage of coal, and will not therefore affect the chief food prices to any appreciable extent. Shipowners plead, with some plausibility, that the delay in unloading in British ports is a factor of some importance in the increased rates being charged. It is certainly true that the closing of some east coast ports and the consequent transfer of additional trade to other ports has led to some confusion, which has also been accentuated by the transport of stores, &c., on behalf of the Government.

Again, the commandeering of horses and the shortage of carters owing to enlistment interfered with dockside transport. It cannot be claimed that these factors, though appreciable, formed any justification for the increase in freights indicated. A shipowner has stated that the increase of working expenses since the war is relatively insignificant, totalling only 3s. 9d. per ton. This is still further corroborated by the fact that cargo-carrying liners have not altered their freight tariffs, but have put on a surcharge of 33 per cent to meet the extra expenses of the war—which amounts roughly to 4s. per ton.

The Danger of Still Higher Prices.

It is pointed out with regard to the statements as to increased cost of labour that the only increase recorded up to the present time is that of the seamen sailing to and from the port of Liverpool—an all-round increase to the extent of 10s. per month in consequence of the extra risks from mines, torpedoes, and capture by enemy commerce raiders:—

In the case of the £1 a month advance paid to men employed on ships employed by the Admiralty there is an additional charge paid by the Government in consequence of arrangements between themselves and the shipowners. We cannot learn that the wages of dock labourers have anywhere been increased.

There is every prospect that unless effective steps are taken immediately cargoes at present being shipped and not due to arrive in this country until February will reach prices much in excess of those ruling at present. We calculate that 25s. per ton excess of freight is equal approximately to 6s. per quarter of wheat, or something like ½d. per quartern loaf.

One shipping expert has argued that the imposition by the Government of minimum prices for British foodstuffs would simply mean that British boats would carry other cargoes, such as coal and timber, for which good rates are being paid, and leave neutral boats to take the wheat at their own price. Another important point is that large quantities of British-owned vessels are as usual trading between foreign ports and are lost to Britain as a nation. If any means could be adopted to turn this stream in our direction it would assist to relieve the position. It is reported that the Italian and Spanish Governments are already taking this course.

It would seem that if any actual control is to be exercised the mere fixing of prices will not be sufficient, and just as the Government practically commandeered a considerable proportion of the merchant service for purely military purposes, so, if any effective action is to be sustained, the remaining merchant shipping must become similarly subject to Government control. The promptitude with which the State assumed power over the national railways in order to facilitate the military transport must be seconded by a similar decisive control over the merchant service in order to protect the classes—even greater than would appear from the different figures. The poorer the people the more likely were they to be living on bread and tea, so that the lower the scale of poverty the greater was the proportionate increase. The sweated home-worker lives on bread and tea and margarine, and everything that she is eating or using is costing her more. It is quite true that in some districts a good deal of money is being made by overtime, but even in the case of overtime trades the average overtime would amount to nothing like 20 or 25 per cent of the total earnings. Neither is overtime clear gain, because there is corresponding physical wastage, and in Mrs. Anderson's union there are a number of girls whose health is breaking down under the strain. The men also cannot continue at high pressure unaffected in health Employers have asked the Union to use its influence to persuade the girls to work overtime, but it has been pointed out to the employers that it will be a case of killing the goose if it goes on. Illness returns have gone up greatly in the overtime trades since the war. Even so, amongst the women workers there is a great deal of unemployment, and subcontract work is being put out at prices that would not be allowed in ordinary times, so wages are often less than the usual rates.

Mrs. Anderson agreed that the extra prices fall heavily on the small professional people with fixed incomes, but she does not consider their burden is for a moment comparable with the hardship of the working class. Lower middle-class people can vary their dietary, and are not wholly confined to the articles of food which are costing so much more—unnecessarily, as Mrs. Anderson considers. There was no doubt in her mind, she said, and in the minds of the Labour movement generally, that some people were making much profit out of the country's necessities. It was time the Government tackled the question and fixed definite maximum prices. That was what should be done before there was any talk of varying dietary.

She said she would also like to know what the Government were doing with the 100,000 tons of coal which Sir Arthur Markham promised should be sold at 24s. a ton through the winter. It would not go very far, but it ought to be employed. Serious unrest was being created in the homes of the poor, and the matter would certainly be raised in Parliament by the Labour party, which held very strong views upon it.

FURTHER ADVANCES IN WHEAT.

Yesterday at Ormskirk the price of wheat was advanced to 7s. 6d. per bushel, or 54s. per quarter, representing an advance of 1s. 6d. a quarter compared with last week's quotations. Farmers, however, displayed a greater readiness to sell than they had done for the past month. This price is the highest for Lancashire wheat for the last forty-seven years.

Oats were also in brisk demand, 4s. 2d. a bushel, the highest price for over thirty years, being readily given. Potatoes also advanced 7s. 6d. a ton, the price rising to £4, the best for the present season.

Abnormally high prices again ruled on Plymouth Commercial Exchange yesterday. English wheat was quoted at 55s. a quarter, and firmly held at that figure. Flour showed an advance of from one to two shillings a sack on the week. The market was strong, with prospects of further rises. Foreign wheat was unchanged, and there were no signs of an easier tendency.

The Bristol bakers last night decided to increase the price of the quartern loaf to 7½d.

appeared in the system of Europe the outraged feelings of the South Slavs would be found at the very heart of the trouble. That prediction, however, was at the time but a side-issue; what concerned us for many years was simply a question of humanity—the bullying of the unhappy, but not ungifted, peoples who make up the strangely mixed population of Hungary. The problem has now entered on a new phase; the whole affair is inverted. The Magyars are much too harassed at the moment to carry on their petty persecutions of Serbo-Croatians, Roumanians, Ruthenes, Slovaks, and Slovenes; but South Slav sentiment has become for the Magyar domination a very dangerous fact. Retribution is already crouching at the door of the Magyars. The Magyar ascendancy, it is true, not only in Hungary, but in Austria, is in form more marked than ever, for the two most powerful men in the Dual Kingdom, Count Tisza, the Hungarian Premier, and Baron de Burian (who succeeded Count Berchtold as Austro-Hungarian Minister for Foreign Affairs), are both Magyars. But the policy which has resulted in this superficial success is only too likely to bring Hungary to moral and political bankruptcy. In order to retain the right to bully their South Slavs, the Magyars long ago consented to place themselves in a condition of servile co-operation with Germany. Even so far as the war has gone this alliance, which has deprived the Magyars of all moral freedom—even if they desired on moral grounds to change their policy—has brought them nothing but misery. And as the war progresses it is certain that the misery and the danger will become steadily more acute. Every South Slav is disaffected, and will do nothing to help his oppressors which he is not compelled to do. His grudging service is not of the kind that saves a country in a war of genuine passions, and we may be sure that when he finds the opportunity actively to impede or upset a hated tyranny he will not fail to take advantage of it. The Magyars have looked upon their subject fellow-citizens as chattels with which they had a right to do what they pleased. Cannot a man do what he likes with his own? Were not the Magyars justified in treating as they thought fit their Croats, their Ruthenes, their Roumanians, and their Slovenes? So they thought; but no German alliance can replace the affection and trust of one's own people.

Concessions may now be made to the South Slavs, but we fear they may come too late. We have no illwill whatever towards the Magyars, who are a gallant and energetic people, even though misguided. We would gladly see them saved from every sort of suffering that the exigencies of the war do not make it necessary for them to undergo. But facts are facts, and it cannot be expected that years of sinning against the light should incur no judgment. The South Slavs all over South-Eastern Europe are our friends; and our friends have to be considered first. We do say, however, that if Hungary could be saved from the worst part of the retribution she has been piling up for herself we should be very glad of it. If she took all her moral courage in her hands now and changed her past policy, shaking off the heavy German hand that lies on her shoulder, there might be a useful and honourable future for the Magyars as an independent people. But opportunities of this sort do not recur. If the Allies make good progress in the war, Hungary will probably be overrun. We do not, of course, know what the Russian strategical plans are, but a glance at the map shows that the Hungarian frontier is at present the line of least resistance. The tendency is all in that direction. Russia is pressing through the Bukowina, and the reports are persistent that Roumania means to come into the war. Serbia, Roumania, and Russia in conjunction would form a half-circle round Hungary. Once the Transylvanian Alps and the Carpathians were both crossed, the plain to Budapest would lie open. The weakness of Hungary is geographical as well as political. Here is the exposed flank of the Central Powers. The other flanks are much better protected. Holland protects part of the north-west frontier of Germany; the narrow peninsula of Schleswig is highly defensible; lakes and marshes protect East Prussia; the Silesian frontier is of manageable length; Switzerland protects the southern frontier of Germany. Only the southern and eastern frontiers of Hungary are really attractive to an invader. Germany did not doubt, of course, that Austria and Hungary would be able to keep themselves intact, even if they could not do much towards the invasion of Russia. But what if Austria and Hungary should collapse? The vulnerability of Germany on a frontier which had been written off as safe would be very great.

In an able article published on Wednesday a former correspondent of the Times in Austria-Hungary surveyed the political history of the Magyars which has brought about their present unfortunate position. The great Hungarian patriots Deák and Eötvös, much as they believed in Magyar supremacy, held that it could not be founded upon the unconditional domination of a minority. They desired all the various races in Hungary to have equal political rights. They relied upon the high qualities of the Magyars to give them the leadership in a fair field of political competition. Unhappily this wholesome and honourable doctrine lost the day. M. Koloman Tisza, the father of the present Premier, inaugurated the system of ascendancy by oppression. Since 1875 it has been accepted by all Magyars, whether they dream of an independent Hungary or whether they are attached to the dual kingship. In 1867 the South Slavs had been ready to co-operate with the Magyars, and even to accept a Magyar priority on the principle of primus inter pares. But the Magyars wanted absolute control. As time went on they discovered that they could be secured in their policy of high-handedness only by accepting the sinister benevolence of Germany. Where are the South Slavs of Hungary to look now if not to their kinsmen outside? It was fear of internal South Slav disaffection that drove Austria-Hungary ultimately into the mad course of trying to obliterate South Slav power in Serbia. She wanted to remove from her own uncomfortable subjects the spectacle of the developing and ambitious Serbia, which had been to them an incitement to dream of better things for their whole race. The illegal annexation of Bosnia and Herzegovina had been only another step along the same path. It was designed partly to help the Magyar domination and partly to aid Pan-German ambition. It is even said that it was Count Tisza who, for similar reasons, encouraged Bulgaria to attack her Balkan allies in 1913. And to-day we see two Magyars directing the course of affairs. Superficially it would seem, then, that the old policy is to go on. But we strongly suspect that the South Slavs will be the ruin of the old policy before it has gone much further. We hope we may be right. We hope that the Magyars will have the strength to reshape their course while there is yet time. For the alternative is plain. A policy rooted in injustice notoriously cannot withstand the strain of a great crisis. That crisis is day by day creeping nearer to Budapest.

ECONOMIC QUACKERY.

CERTAIN newspapers are trying to goad the public into a state of alarm about the rise of prices, especially the price of foodstuffs. This is a journalistic phenomenon that was perhaps inevitable. The war news is not at the moment strikingly dramatic, and the newspapers, finding that they can say little about the war, feel urged to say much about food. What they say is to a large extent exaggerated. Food prices are certainly higher than they were before the war, but very much lower than in previous wars. Indeed, in many cases prices still remain lower than they were twenty or thirty years ago in a time of profound peace. This, however, is not the important point. The real point to bear in mind is that, even if it were true that prices are reaching an extravagant height, that is not an argument for the kind of economic quackery which is now being so widely advocated. All this excitement, when examined, resolves itself into a demand that the Government should do something. That is a political as well as an economic danger. Ever since the war began there has been a tendency to rely upon the Government, instead of relying upon ourselves and upon the operation of economic laws. The political mischief resulting is the establishment of what is virtually an uncontrolled Cabinet autocracy. The economic mischief, though it has already made itself evident in one important particular, may only be realized years hence. The instance to which we refer is the case of sugar. The public and the Government worked themselves up into a panic at the beginning of the war over the price of sugar, with the result that Mr. McKenna was permitted to gamble in sugar with many millions of the nation's money. The gamble turned out badly, as most Government speculations do, and after a short time, in order to protect their improvident purchase, the Government prohibited the importation of all sugar into this country. The result is that the country is now paying more for its sugar than it would have had to pay if the Government had let the matter alone. What was forgotten in this case, and what is forgotten now by those papers which are busy agitating about the food prices, is that a rise in price necessarily produces an increase of supply, and in turn the increase of supply necessarily leads to a reduction in price. The present open market price for sugar is fully a halfpenny a pound below the Government price.

P.T.O.

5 1062.

This sequence of events is, and always has been, so persistent, and is so familiar to every man engaged in business, that it is extraordinary to note the way in which apparently well-informed newspapers begin to clamour for Government action directly a slight rise in prices makes itself felt. All that is necessary when prices rise is to let the fact be known as widely as possible, and to this extent our present newspaper agitation may perhaps be doing good, for by advertising and exaggerating the rise in prices in the United Kingdom it will help to stimulate merchants and producers throughout the world to consign their products here. So far, then, as commodities are concerned all we have to do is to wait till the rise in prices produces an increased supply, and until that in turn brings prices down again. It is quite certain that we shall not have to wait long, provided only that the Government do not interfere with any fresh quack remedies on the lines of Mr. McKenna's gamble in sugar.

The Hampshire labourer who declared that what the nation wanted was "fewer o' they black parsons and more o' they black pigs" was certainly right about the pigs. We want more corn. But the surest way to get it, and to make people realize that it will pay them to grow it and sell it, is for the price to rise—for a time. The rush to grow rich out of wheat will soon bring it down again. High prices are Nature's cure for scarcity. The demagogue's or quack statesman's cure is low prices by law—a remedy far more dangerous than the disease. It produces and makes permanent the disease it sets out to cure.

A far more troublesome problem is that created by the shortage of labour. This evil cannot be cured merely by waiting. It is immediately due to the call of the nation for a very large number of men of all classes in the New Armies, and to the active employment of an increased number of other men in the provision of war materials of all kinds, or in the performance of subsidiary war work, such as loading and unloading ships and railway trucks carrying war material. So heavy, indeed, are the Government demands both for soldiers and for what we may call war-workers that it is surprising that the dearth of labour in industry generally has not made itself felt to an even greater extent. The probable reason is that we have normally in this country a considerable number of persons who are doing little or no active work, and a very much larger proportion of persons who are not working full time. The partial or complete absorption of these has met the primary demands of the War Office, and it is only as our Armies have grown bigger, while simultaneously our ordinary trade has been mainly re-established, that the dearth of labour has made itself felt. It is felt in the docks at London and Liverpool and other ports, where ships cannot be unloaded rapidly enough, partly because there is not a sufficient supply of men to do the work, with the result that ships are unduly detained in harbour, thus diminishing the carrying power of our mercantile marine, and forcing up freights, and consequently prices. The shortage of labour is also being felt in many of the North Country mills. It is being felt by farmers in nearly every county.

By the nature of the case the difficulty is one we cannot expect completely to overcome. We must have men for the Army, and we must employ a large number of other men and women to keep the Army supplied. There are, however, certain palliatives which might be adopted. In the first place, there is the very obvious remedy of utilizing the labour of Belgian refugees in this country. Unfortunately this remedy or alleviation of the trouble is blocked by the conservatism of the Labour Party. The idea of introducing any kind of new labour is anathema to Trade Unionists, and they appear to be incapable of understanding that under present conditions the introduction of Belgian labour could not possibly have the results which they fear in normal circumstances. The extent to which this boycotting of foreign labour is carried was illustrated the other day when the Dutch dockers in Rotterdam, who were short of work, offered to come to London for a limited period, provided they were paid London Trade Union rates of wages. The English Dockers' Union replied with the amazing misstatement that there was no shortage of dock labour in the Port of London. If the Government would carry out their proper business of protecting the freedom of labour, they would be doing far more useful work than in experimenting with State control of prices.

But though the employment of Belgians and of Dutchmen might considerably relieve the dearth of labour in many districts, we could not expect that it would completely satisfy the full demand. There is, however, in our own country a further important source of labour supply which has not yet been touched—namely, the supply of able-bodied women who are at present doing little or no work. A considerable number of well-to-do women have been organizing themselves into Volunteer Corps and parading the streets in a quasi-uniform of khaki. They would be far better employed if they were setting their poorer sisters an example of how to assist their country by doing agricultural work. There is very little agricultural labour in which women cannot help. Throughout France the autumn harvest was gathered in, and the ground prepared for next year's crop, largely by women. In England women practically do next to nothing upon the land. There has grown up, it appears, a social prejudice among the wage-earning classes against women doing any agricultural work, and if only that prejudice could be broken down the existing shortage of labour for farm work could largely be relieved. We suggest that well-to-do women of the leisured classes could do no more useful service at the present moment than by themselves undertaking a certain amount of farm work, if only to serve as an example to their less well-to-do sisters. Only this week we saw a lady—a nurse in a hospital—helping to cut down a tree, and greatly enjoying the use of axe and saw. Why should not women do hedging and ditching, and the less hard work in cowshed and stable? Their gentleness and lightness of hand would make them supreme in the raising of young stock—in the lambing sheds and the cow-house. A milkmaid is a much more natural creature than a milkman.

A further point of great practical importance arises in connexion with the economic situation. A huge sum, now reaching nearly £4,500,000, has been contributed to the Prince of Wales's Fund. The money was asked for in the belief that there would be a vast amount of distress caused by the war. That belief has not been justified by events. Broadly speaking, there is no serious distress in the country at the present time except among a limited section of the professional classes. The great mass of the wage-earning population is probably better off than at any previous period. Tens of thousands of women are now drawing for their families from the Government much more money than they ever received from their husbands. In such circumstances it would be worse than folly to dissipate the Prince of Wales's Fund by extra doles. The best thing that could be done would be to close down altogether the expenditure side of the Prince of Wales's Fund, and we sincerely trust that an announcement as to the future action of those who control the Fund made in Thursday's Times is meant to point in this direction. The money is not wanted now, but it will certainly be wanted when the war comes to an end. Then there will be thousands of men returning from the front seeking employment and not finding it. There will also be thousands of men thrown out of their present employment in the manufacture of Army supplies, and unable for weeks and months to obtain civil employment. Of necessity the closing down of a great war must mean a tremendous dislocation of industry. It is then that the Prince of Wales's Fund would be of enormous value to tide over the period between the ending of the war and the re-establishment of normal peace conditions in commerce and industry. Stay-at-home Jacob must not be allowed to forestall manly, combative Esau and take for himself the blessing which was meant for the son who is now absent in the field.

Daily Citizen 23/1/15.

NO HALF MEASURES.

Much has been heard lately of the big wages which working people, or most working people, are taking home with them at the week-end. We meet with the statement in capitalist papers at nearly every turn. When it is pointed out that the net rise in the rate of wages since the outbreak of the war is not worth speaking about; that in fact it pans out, over the mass of workers, to less than the smallest current coin a week, the answer comes pat. The answer is that it is not the rate of wages we have to look at. What we ought to look at, it is said, is the total of earnings. Owing to more constant employment and the larger amount of overtime the total of earnings is much higher.

This is put forward by some as a reason why calamity prices ought to be paid without a murmur. In the circumstances, urge these apologists, the hardship of calamity prices is imaginary. On behalf of the National Federation of Women Workers Miss Mary Macarthur has taken up this contention and promptly knocked the bottom out of it. To begin with, the statements about the amount of overtime worked are grossly inflated. No definite facts are offered in support of them. Definite facts rarely are offered. In any event, however, the overtime wages are just as fully and as honestly earned as ordinary time wages. If there is a higher rate it is paid for a higher rate of exhaustion, and because it is worth while to pay it. To suggest that overtime pay is in any sort of way a benevolence is absurd.

If, then, all these wages are fully and honestly earned, and labour value given for them, what becomes of the assertion that the total earned is a ground for reducing the buying power of those wages by 3s. in the £? That is the amount by which since the outbreak of war the buying power of wages has been lowered. The statement is that of the Government itself, published by the Government itself. Nearly the whole of that 3s. in the £ represents the toll Labour is paying to the profit-mongers of national necessity. It simply means that indirectly the real wages reward of Labour, measured in necessaries of life, has been cut down by private extortion to that extent.

Now if there be any public man, be he a Minister or a politician of any colour, who is ready to stand forward and say that that is a trifling national matter, we challenge him to stand forward and say it. It is not enough apparently for some people that, with splendid public spirit, the working-class families of this country have sent the young and strong among their breadwinners, and sent them by the hundred thousand, to fight the country's battles at the front. Those families ought, they think, on top of that to be fined 3s. out of every £ of their hard-earned money in order to fatten out private monopolists. In face of this we go farther and say that if there is any public man, Minister or not, who thinks that this is a matter which can be trifled with and put off, or that it is the sort of thing to be met by some fluffy excuse about not interfering with commercial freedom, we dare him to stand forward and assert it. The Government have interfered with the freedom of City financiers. Either they are going also to interfere with the freedom—we should call it licence—of the calamity-price mongers, or the working people of this country are going to know the reason why.

We want to be quite frank because the shoddy "argument" about higher total earnings is just the sort of fallacy likely to appeal to some high-placed doctrinaires. They have got to take hold of this thing, for once, by the business end, and without delay. We call a spade a spade, and to us calamity-profits are robbery, and the meanest form of robbery at that. To us calamity-profiteers are not respectable and influential persons with fat balances at the bank. They are public enemies. They ought to be publicly and out of the common resources submarined.

For if there is anything at all in the contention that larger earnings are a justification for sweating of 3s. in the £ in private and uncontrolled taxation, the contention at once and clearly concedes the rightness of a demand for so raising the rate of wages that the reward of labour, measured by purchasing power, shall be levelled up to what it was when the war broke out. Either the calamity-profiteers and their apologists have to concede that or they have, in effect, to say that Labour ought to pay the whole cost of the war, in privation as well as in blood, while they get off scot free. That seems to be their idea of "patriotism"—sacrifice by somebody else. It has been alleged that one of the causes of high prices is scarcity of labour. If scarcity of labour is a cause of higher prices, it ought equally and to the same extent to be a cause of higher wages. If not then the "law of supply and demand" turns a blind eye upon Labour while it casts a greedy optic upon the commodities on which Labour lays out its earnings.

Imagine the outcry if the profiteers were taken at their word, and on their own contention, and hoist with their own petard by a general industrial agitation for that higher pay. Think of the dismal wail that would arise about plunging the country into industrial strife at such a juncture. The fact that the profiteers have conceded the ground of the demand would of course go for nothing.

As will be gathered from the interview with a leading shipowner published in another column, the threat is made that if the proposals of the Workers' War Emergency Committee are acted upon, and the Government control the transit and the sale of wheat, shipowners will "take it out of" the public by higher charges on other things. When a shipowner whose working expenses, including risks, have gone up owing to the war by 3s. 9d. per ton of capacity jumps his freight rates on the strength of that from 16s. to 67s. 6d. per ton, it is manifest that he is exploiting the war basely, because competition in shipping is notoriously the merest make-believe and bunkum. Shipping is a private monopoly. All this shows that these gentry must be taken in hand firmly. No half-measures will do.

662

662/7

Croydon Advertiser, January 30th 1915

THE COST OF LIVING.

INCREASED ALLOWANCES FOR WAR SUFFERERS.

At the meeting of the Croydon Borough Council on Monday night the report of the Mayor's Committee for the Relief of Distress recommended increased allowances to families affected by the war to meet the increased cost of living. The report contained the following:—

Up to the 16th January instant the Relief Committee had dealt with 535 civilian cases. Relief has been granted in 319 cases, and in a large number of the remainder no assistance was recommended by the Ward Committees. The total expenditure has been £780 6s. 2d. The committee continues to consider and decide appeals against the ruling of the adjudicators in military and naval cases.

With regard to the boarding-out of the motherless children of soldiers who come under the care of the Guardians, arrangements have recently been made for the boarding-out of six of such young children in homes quite unconnected with poor law relief, the difference (1s. 5d.) between the Government grant of 5s. 7d. per week and 7s. per week, the cost of maintenance, care and control of each child under the new arrangement, being met out of the National Relief Fund.

The Relief Committee met on Tuesday last, the 19th instant, and discussed various matters of principle in connection with the grant of assistance out of the Fund, including the question of increasing the scale of assistance, having regard to the increase in the cost of food, and the committee resolved to recommend to the Mayor's Committee that the scale be revised to make due allowance for the increased cost of living, say, to the extent of 20 per cent.

The committee also directed communications to be addressed to the central authorities with regard to the question of making grants to supplement separation allowance and allotment and rent allowance in cases where the present income represents a substantial reduction in the standard of living compared with that when the soldier was in civilian employment.

Since the last meeting of the committee two further grants have been received from the National Relief Fund for the relief of civilian distress, one of £200 and the other for £400, making the total grant to date £900.

WOMEN'S EMPLOYMENT SUB-COMMITTEE.

The scheme adopted by the Mayor's Committee at its last meeting, for the provision of a workroom for Croydon women thrown out of employment as a consequence of the war, was duly submitted to the Central Committee on Women's Employment, and by a letter dated the 8th January instant the Central Committee intimated that they had written to the Government Committee recommending the scheme as satisfactory, subject to slight alterations in the estimate of cost.

On the 15th instant the following letter was received from the Government Committee:—

Government Committee on the Prevention and Relief of Distress.
Local Government Board,
Whitehall, S.W.,
14th January, 1915.

Sir,—I am directed by the Government Committee on the Prevention and Relief of Distress to inform you that they have had under consideration the scheme submitted to the Central Committee on Women's Employment by the Local Representative Committee for the Borough of Croydon, and have decided to recommend that a grant of £105 be made from the National Relief Fund to the Local Representative Committee in aid of the cost of the maintenance of a workroom for women at the Polytechnic Institute, Selhurst-road. This recommendation has been forwarded to-day to the committee of the Fund.

I am to explain that this grant is estimated to be sufficient to cover the expenses of the employment of 50 women and girls for four weeks, and that this number should not be exceeded without the approval of the Government Committee.

It will be necessary for the Local Committee to account to the Government Committee for the expenditure of the grant, and they rely on the Local Committee taking adequate measures for the careful administration of the money granted.

The Government Committee desire that further applications for grants in respect of this workroom may be made to them at least seven days before the grant is required, and that the application may be accompanied by details of the expenditure already incurred, of the estimated expenditure for the then ensuing month, and of the number of women employed. This information should be furnished in a form similar to that enclosed.

I am, Sir,
Your obedient Servant,
(Signed) E. R. Forber.

A cheque for the £105 referred to was received from the National Relief Fund on the same date (15th instant).

FINANCE COMMITTEE.

The state of the Mayor's Fund at the 19th January, 1915, was:—Amount promised, £18,620 12s. 8d.; amount received, £17,900 2s. 8d.; amount paid to Buckingham Palace, £16,008 6s. 4d. The amount promised shows an increase of £654 15s. 11d., and the amount received an increase of £1,937 15s. 11d. over the figures reported at the last meeting of the committee (11th December, 1914).

SOLDIERS AND SAILORS' FAMILIES ASSOCIATION.

The number of cases dealt with up to the 16th January instant, inclusive, is 2,087. Assistance has been granted in 1,812 cases, the total expenditure being £3,055 17s. 4d. This is exclusive of advances against separation allowances.

A further sum of £1,000 has been received for assistance in military and naval cases, making £3,500 in all received for this purpose by the new Croydon Borough Division.

The Mayor, moving the reception of the report, said that it would be noticed that they had dealt with 535 civilian cases at an expenditure of £780. Arrangements had been made for boarding out motherless children, children of soldiers who had lost their mothers, at an expenditure of 1s. 5d. a week in addition to the Government grant. This, he thought, was a most laudable thing to do. If they could get these children boarded out at 1s. 5d. a week and keep them away from the Poor Law it was very necessary. They would notice that the committee had revised the scale of payments to those in receipt of relief to the extent of about twenty per cent. Since the last meeting the committee had received an additional £600 from the Central Fund, making £900 in all. They had also received a hundred guineas for the employment of women. There were really fifty women and two supervisors. The fund, he was pleased to say, was still increasing. It had increased by £654 since the last meeting. The total amount promised was £18,620, and of this £17,900 had actually been received and £16,008 6s. 4d., the total amount received at the end of the year, had been sent to Buckingham Palace. They had dealt with 2,087 cases that came under the Soldiers and Sailors' Families Association at a total expenditure of £3,055, and since the last meeting they had received an additional sum of £1,000, making a total for the military and naval cases since the Croydon Borough Division had been working of £3,500, and the old committee when they were working at Poplar-walk dealt with some £600 as well, making a sum of over £4,000 distributed on these cases in Croydon. The Mayoress's Committee was still at work. They had never made a direct appeal in any way. Anything sent to them was made the best possible use of. The amount of work that the ladies had done deserved their highest thanks. At the moment they were somewhat short of shirts and blankets and short of money. They had practically spent what money they had in employing women and girls who were out of work to knit socks. They could take it from him that practically the whole of the money had been spent in providing labour, purchasing wool and materials, and so keeping these people off the relief fund.

Ald. Sir Frederick Edridge seconded, and the report was received.

Daily Mail,
February 6th 1915

WOMEN WHO DO NOT TIP.

To the Editor of The Daily Mail.

Sir,—Food prices are jumping up and wages coming down. At least that is what has happened to the waitresses at a certain West End restaurant.

This restaurant is patronised very largely by women reformers and suffragettes of all kinds. The result is that instead of the proportion of patrons being about 75 per cent. men and 25 per cent. women, it is near 40 per cent. women to 60 per cent. men. The waitress is paid a very low wage, and has to depend for four-fifths of her income upon tips. Will it be believed that all these women who talk so much about reforming the world, who shrilly demand votes in order to put down man's tyranny over woman, who assert day by day that "only women's work can save women"—that nearly all these reformers take the service of the waitress but never requite her one penny piece?

The average tip, I am told, is about one penny from one woman in six, and these very educated and refined people!

The tips, and therefore four-fifths of the livelihood of the girls, come out of the pockets of the men! No wonder the majority of the waitresses scoff with derisive laughter when the question of suffragettes and votes for women is mentioned!

FRIEND OF THE WAITRESS.

The North Mail
8-2-15.

LABOUR WOMEN'S PROTEST.

The following resolution relating to the prices of food and fuel has been passed by the Bishop Auckland Divisional Women's Labour League:—

"That this conference protests strongly against the present amazing and unjustifiable rise in the price of food and fuel, contending that it may be avoided by nationalisation and municipalisation of supplies of those commodities, and by Government control of merchant ships transporting them.

"Also, it appeals to the working women of the division and of the country generally, to put forth their strongest effort in support of those at present engaged in fighting this invidious and unnecessary evil."

Yorkshire Observer
14-2-15

THE WAGES OF WOOLCOMBERS.

AN INCREASE GRANTED.

The Woolcombing Employers' Federation have been recently approached by the National Society of Machine Woolcombers, as representatives of the workpeople engaged in the woolcombing industry, with a request that the wages of the employees should be increased owing to the extra cost of living caused by the war. After careful consideration and conferences on the matter, the executive of the Woolcombing Employers' Federation at a meeting yesterday with the representatives of the operatives' society agreed to give an increase of wages on the following conditions—the increase being granted to those workers included in the wages schedule dated July, 1913:—

That all workers having at present wages of 21s. and upwards shall receive an advance of 2s. per week, and that all workers receiving below 21s. shall receive an advance of 1s. per week.

That no further request for an increase of wages shall be made during the continuance of the war.

That although under the agreement made at the time the schedule of July, 1913, was fixed, no increase is due to those workers receiving at the present time a higher rate than the schedule until such time as the schedule rate should be equal to the rate now paid to such workers, the present increase is granted to all workers irrespective of this agreement, in consequence of the said increase being given owing to the enhanced cost of living.

That in consideration of this the representatives of the workpeople undertake that future changes in the wages of the employees shall be made in accordance with the agreement entered to above with a view to standardising the wages in the industry.

That the increase shall become payable on the first pay-day in March, 1915.

Daily Citizen.
14-2-15.

662

6218

CHEAPER FOOD BY STATE ACTION.

PROGRAMME FOR GREAT CONFERENCE.

Arrangements are now complete for the great national conference on food and fuel prices organised by the Workers' War Emergency Committee in the Kingsway Hall, London, on March 12.

It will be a notable gathering. Municipal authorities, Trade Unions, trades councils, co-operative societies, women's industrial organisations, Labour and Socialist parties have been invited, and although the invitations have been out only a few days the response has been of a remarkable character.

The secretary to the Committee, Mr. J. S. Middleton, 28, Victoria-street, S.W., wishes The Daily Citizen to request Labour members of local authorities which have passed resolutions upon the question to urge that representatives be sent to the conference. In Scotland, especially, a large number of bodies have expressed themselves in sympathy.

The main resolution will be that already submitted to and endorsed by conferences all over the country and calling for Government control of shipping, maximum prices of coal to be fixed, railway trucks to be pooled, and coal to be distributed by the Government through municipal or co-operative agencies.

The Rt. Hon. Arthur Henderson, M.P., will preside, and the speakers will include Mr. J. A. Seddon, chairman of the Trade Union Congress; Miss Margaret Bondfield, Women's Co-operative Guild; Mr. Robert Smillie, president of the Miners' Federation of Great Britain; and Mr. William Brace, M.P.

The conference, which will commence at 10.30 a.m., and is expected to continue, with one interval, until 4.30 p.m., will be followed by a huge public demonstration in the same building at 7.30 p.m. At this gathering the speakers will probably be Mr. Henderson, Mr. C. W. Bowerman, M.P., Mr. W. C. Anderson, M.P., Mr. Smillie, Dr. Marion Phillips, Mr. H. M. Hyndman, Mr. B. Williams (Co-operative Union), Mr. J. R. Clynes, M.P., Mr. John Stokes (secretary London Trades Council), Mr. Joseph Cross (vice-chairman General Federation of Trade Unions), Mr. Albert Bellamy (president National Union of Railwaymen), and Mr. Ben Tillett (secretary Dockers' Union).

Daily Citizen.
4-2-15

667

WAR "WAGES" IN CO-OPERATION.

HOW THE C.W.S. IS LEADING THE WAY IN THE RECOGNITION OF LABOUR.

["Co-operative News" Special.]

THERE can be no doubt, of course, that the war cost of living has lessened the value of wages to a degree which must be keenly felt in all wage-earning families. This is invariably the result when any nation is at war, though it is seldom that earnings are increased at such a time to make up for the lowered exchange value of money. Special war rates of pay, however, have not been uncommon during the past few months, and it will be seen from an announcement elsewhere that the C.W.S. directors have granted advances, practically all round, to their employés. This has occurred with all the more grace, because it had not been demanded by the workers, although we can quite understand how welcome the greater wages will be to them. Already the employés in the huge buildings about Balloon-street have met in a body to express their gratification for the generous action of the directors. If the same course had been taken by other employers who can well afford to adopt it, we should have heard much less about the attitude of working men and women towards the demands of the Government for strenuous industrial output. It should be made clear that the advance granted by the C.W.S. applies to every class of worker earning less than £200 a year—that is, to clerks, warehousemen, factory operatives, labourers, casuals, and even to men now on military service.

We are not overlooking the fact that some employers could not very well bear the strain of increased wages at a time like the present. Most of these, however, who up khaki clothing. Whilst wages vary from something approaching a sweating level to decent earnings, the rates paid to employers by the Government are uniform. And the firms that have acted honourably towards their workpeople have a very good margin of profit to work upon. What, then, must be the profit of firms that are paying as much as 50 per cent. (on some classes of work) less than others? It is this unmitigated form of greed and selfishness that is creating the most discontent among the workers. If their conditions and tempers become unbearable, and they strike, or "slack," we presume they will be charged with lack of patriotism. Why does not the Government step in? By use of the Defence of the Realm Act, these justice shirking or "slacking" employers should be made to toe the same patriotic line, the same sense of duty and national responsibility as the workers are expected to do, and are threatened that they will have to do unless they prefer to act voluntarily.

But in the case of the clothier workers, the C.W.S. have again been among the leaders of good wage payers. They have been in the front in respect to rates paid to women workers at Leeds, and at Higher Broughton. And we observe that they have led in the case of men cutters. Male cutters in Manchester firms are dissatisfied with their rates of pay in respect to khaki and the general cloth trade, these rates being lower than those paid in London, Birmingham, Leeds, Glasgow, and other places. Some firms have improved the conditions

AN INCREASE GRANTED.

The Woolcombing Employers' Federation have been recently approached by the National Society of Machine Woolcombers, as representatives of the workpeople engaged in the woolcombing industry, with a request that the wages of the employees should be increased owing to the extra cost of living caused by the war. After careful consideration and conferences on the matter, the executive of the Woolcombing Employers' Federation at a meeting yesterday with the representatives of the operatives' society agreed to give an increase of wages on the following conditions—the increase being granted to those workers included in the wages schedule dated July, 1913:—

That all workers having at present wages of 21s. and upwards shall receive an advance of 2s. per week, and that all workers receiving below 21s. shall receive an advance of 1s. per week.

That no further request for an increase of wages shall be made during the continuance of the war.

That although under the agreement made at the time the schedule of July, 1913, was fixed, no increase is due to those workers receiving at the present time a higher rate than the schedule until such time as the schedule rate should be equal to the rate now paid to such workers, the present increase is granted to all workers irrespective of this agreement, in consequence of the said increase being given owing to the enhanced cost of living.

That in consideration of this the representatives of the workpeople undertake that future changes in the wages of the employees shall be made in accordance with the agreement referred to above with a view to standardising the wages in the industry.

That the increase shall become payable on the first pay-day in March, 1915.

[illegible], 33, Victoria-street, S.W., wishes The Daily Citizen to request Labour members of local authorities which have passed resolutions upon the question to urge that representatives be sent to the conference. In Scotland, especially, a large number of bodies have expressed themselves in sympathy.

The main resolution will be that already submitted to and endorsed by conferences all over the country and calling for Government control of shipping, maximum prices of coal to be fixed, railway trucks to be pooled, and coal to be distributed by the Government through municipal or co-operative agencies.

The Rt. Hon. Arthur Henderson, M.P., will preside, and the speakers will include Mr. J. A. Seddon, chairman of the Trade Union Congress; Miss Margaret Bondfield, Women's Co-operative Guild; Mr. Robert Smillie, president of the Miners' Federation of Great Britain; and Mr. William Brace, M.P.

The conference, which will commence at 10.30 a.m., and is expected to continue, with one interval, until 4.30 p.m., will be followed by a huge public demonstration in the same building at 7.30 p.m. At this gathering the speakers will probably be Mr. Henderson, Mr. C. W. Bowerman, M.P., Mr. W. C. Anderson, M.P., Mr. Smillie, Dr. Marion Phillips, Mr. H. M. Hyndman, Mr. B. Williams (Co-operative Union), Mr. J. R. Clynes, M.P., Mr. John Stokes (secretary London Trades Council), Mr. Joseph Cross (vice-chairman General Federation of Trade Unions), Mr. Albert Bellamy (president National Union of Railwaymen), and Mr. Ben Tillett (secretary Dockers' Union).

Daily Citizen.
4-2-15

WAR "WAGES" IN CO-OPERATION.

HOW THE C.W.S. IS LEADING THE WAY IN THE RECOGNITION OF LABOUR.

["Co-operative News" Special.]

THERE can be no doubt, of course, that the war cost of living has lessened the value of wages to a degree which must be keenly felt in all wage-earning families. This is invariably the result when any nation is at war, though it is seldom that earnings are increased at such a time to make up for the lowered exchange value of money. Special war rates of pay, however, have not been uncommon during the past few months, and it will be seen from an announcement elsewhere that the C.W.S. directors have granted advances, practically all round, to their employés. This has occurred with all the more grace, because it had not been demanded by the workers, although we can quite understand how welcome the greater wages will be to them. Already the employés in the huge buildings about Balloon-street have met in a body to express their gratification for the generous action of the directors. If the same course had been taken by other employers who can well afford to adopt it, we should have heard much less about the attitude of working men and women towards the demands of the Government for strenuous industrial output. It should be made clear that the advance granted by the C.W.S. applies to every class of worker earning less than £200 a year—that is, to clerks, warehousemen, factory operatives, labourers, casuals, and even to men now on military service.

We are not overlooking the fact that some employers could not very well bear the strain of increased wages at a time like the present. Most of those, however, who have secured large Government contracts, or had them thrust upon them, have been in a favourable position; many of them could have done more than they have attempted. Take the clothing trades. The flat rates paid by the War Office for khaki contracts have been on a liberal scale; but almost everywhere operatives in clothing factories are complaining—not so much about the pay, as about the variation of the rates of pay. As Mr. E. Watson (secretary of the Manchester branch of the Amalgamated Union of Clothiers' Operatives) points out this week, some firms are paying much less than others for the work of making up khaki clothing. Whilst wages vary from something approaching a sweating level to decent earnings, the rates paid to employers by the Government are uniform. And the firms that have acted honourably towards their workpeople have a very good margin of profit to work upon. What, then, must be the profit of firms that are paying as much as 50 per cent. (on some classes of work) less than others? It is this unmitigated form of greed and selfishness that is creating the most discontent among the workers. If their conditions and tempers become unbearable, and they strike, or "slack," we presume they will be charged with lack of patriotism. Why does not the Government step in? By use of the Defence of the Realm Act, these justice shirking or "slacking" employers should be made to toe the same patriotic line, the same sense of duty and national responsibility as the workers are expected to do, and are threatened that they will have to do unless they prefer to act voluntarily.

But in the case of the clothier workers, the C.W.S. have again been among the leaders of good wage payers. They have been in the front in respect to rates paid to women workers at Leeds, and at Higher Broughton. And we observe that they have led in the case of men cutters. Male cutters in Manchester firms are dissatisfied with their rates of pay in respect to khaki and the general cloth trade, these rates being lower than those paid in London, Birmingham, Leeds, Glasgow, and other places. Some firms have improved the conditions of the khaki cutters, whilst the C.W.S. have (according to a public statement) increased their male cutters 15 and 10 per cent., according to the customary amount of their weekly earnings. Unfortunately, however, the lead of the C.W.S. is not sufficiently known even in the movement itself. However, it is to be hoped that the advance they have taken will be imitated by retail societies who are in a position to do it. Several societies have already taken this step, and have thus borne their share of adding credit to one of the principles for which the movement stands—that is, fair recognition of labour.

The Telegraph.
16-2-15.

COST OF LIVING.

LONDON CONFERENCE.

TRADE UNION PROTEST.

Delegates from trade union and socialist organisations attended a conference at the Memorial Hall, Farringdon-street, on Saturday, to consider the present high prices of food and fuel. The meeting was convened by the Workers' War Emergency Committee and the London Trades Council, and simultaneously conferences were held at Leicester, Liverpool, Portsmouth, Cardiff, Birmingham, and Bradford, as a national expression of opinion on the increased cost of living.

Mr. JOHN STOKES (secretary to the London Trades Council), who presided, said the conference represented a vast movement, including the Socialist, Labour, and Co-operative movements, covering an area of forty miles, and containing 4,000,000 people in a representative capacity.

Mr. W. C. ANDERSON, M.P., referring to the speech by Mr. Asquith in the House of Commons, declared that it would not be accepted as the last word. The Premier told them they were no worse off than during the Franco-Prussian War of 1870-1. If he (the speaker) knew anything about the temper of the people, they were not concerned with the circumstances of that war, but they were concerned with what was going on now. They believed that certain interests were taking advantage of the situation; and they were determined that this must be stopped. (Hear, hear.) Coal, which was being brought into London at pre-war prices, was being sold at the inflated figure of 40s a ton; and the price of nearly every household commodity had gone up, with the result that since the beginning of the war the purchasing power of a sovereign had declined by five shillings.

He moved a resolution urging the Government to take steps to reduce wheat prices by remedying the deficiency in carrying ships; to fix a maximum price for coal; to pool the railway-trucks of the railway companies and private traders, and to commandeer coal supplies for distribution to household consumers through municipal or co-operative agencies.

Dr. MARION PHILLIPS (Women's Labour League), in seconding, said the rise in food prices was falling upon the poor with a cruelty that could only be viewed with horror.

The resolution was carried, with the addition, after the word "coal" in Clause 4, of the words: "wheat and other necessities of life, and fix at maximum prices."

APPEAL TO GOVERNMENT.

Mr. J. RAMSAY MACDONALD, M.P., speaking at the conference at Leicester, said the cost of living since July had gone up 20 to 24 per cent., and every market report indicated that it was still going up. The nominal wages remained the same, while the actual wages had been reduced by 4s in the pound. They were, of course, bound to have increased prices, and no doubt the enemy had suffered more, but that was no excuse. It was not a fact that there was very little wheat or flour in the market. During the last six months we had imported upwards of 100,000 tons more grain than in the corresponding period of the previous year. Next Wednesday the Labour party were going to make one more appeal to the Government to do its duty by the nation.

Manchester Guardian.
13-3-15.

"ENEMY WITHIN THE GATES."

WORKERS AND DEAR FOOD AND FUEL.

BITTER DENUNCIATION OF THE GOVERNMENT.

Under the auspices of the War Emergency Workers' National Committee, a demonstration to protest against food and fuel prices was held last night in the Kingsway Hall, London. Mr. C. W. Bowerman, M.P. (secretary of the Trades-Union Congress), presided, and others present were Mr. H. M. Hyndman, Dr. Marion Phillips, Miss Mary McArthur, Mr. R. Williams, Mr. John Stokes, and Mr. Alfred Bellamy. There was not a large attendance.

The Chairman said that to judge from the appearance of that gathering one would hardly have thought that the people of the country had been called upon to make the sacrifices they were making at the present time. Manufacturers and employers were not slow in taking action when their pockets were affected. When Mr. Runciman was approached on this subject of cost, he replied that there was no short cut to the millennium. The Government turned a deaf ear when the matter was brought forward by the Labour party in the House of Commons, and the only answer they got was that the matter might be adjusted to their satisfaction some time in the middle of the summer. For his own part, he regarded that not only as an extremely disappointing reply, but one unworthy of a Government which at the outset of this terrible war had come to the rescue of many classes in this country, and had prevented the credit of the country going down. When one remembered the sacrifices which the working classes had made in order to respond to the nation's call, one would have thought that the others would have been sufficiently patriotic to have avoided the heavy burden they had imposed upon the community at large. (Hear, hear.) The Government said they could not help them, but, surely, if the Government could take powers to commandeer a factory within 12 hours, why could they not relieve the necessities of the poor by saying: "We will take over the wheat supply and sufficient ships to bring coal to London at a reasonable price?" (Hear, hear.) They had not done that, and it remained for people to raise their voices and force the Government to do something which they now appeared unwilling to do. He moved a resolution urging that the present rise in prices in the necessaries of life was not justified by any economic consequences of the war, was largely caused by the holding up of stocks, by the inadequate provision of transport facilities, and asking the Government to fix a maximum price by acquiring the control of commodities which might be subject to artificial cost.

"LOOKING TO FAVOURS TO COME."

Mr. John Stokes (secretary of the London Trades Council), in seconding, said the Government appeared to be afraid to take action against the speculators. What had the Government done? Had they done anything to prevent this unfortunate consequence of the war? (Cries of: "Only looked after their own interests.") He had come to the conclusion that they were looking forward to favours to come. They were looking to the financial assistance of shipowners and colliery owners when election time came along, and they would not interfere with profits in war time which later on might jeopardise their political funds. (Hear, hear.) The Government should take by the throat, if necessary, those who were exploiting by robbery and jobbery the wellbeing of the people. (Cheers.)

Dr. Marion Phillips said if we had learnt anything in this war it had been the separation between the workers of the nation and those who held economic and political power. "I will not subscribe," she continued, "to the doctrine that the trades-unions are to lay down their weapons now, for they have never wanted them so much—(hear, hear)—for never has the exploitation of the worker been so barefaced and brutal. (Cheers.) The enemy is within the gate."

Mr. Hyndman said that, at the present time, men were food for powder, no doubt in a righteous cause. If what was happening was not stopped the Labour party must not hesitate to stop recruiting.

Mr. Williams said that if Mr. Asquith and Mr. Runciman had to live on 30s. a week they would soon be saying, "To the devil with the law of supply and demand." (Cheers.)

Mr. Robert Smillie (president of the Miners' Federation of Great Britain) said that if action was not taken the Labour party could and would arouse all the labour and working-class forces into a protest against the conduct of the Government, and neither the sneers of the Press nor the Cabinet about such conduct being unpatriotic would stop them. (Cheers.)

Mr. Ben Tillett said that 35 or 36 per cent. of the working classes were carrying through this war, but if they had been as sordid as the capitalists the war could not proceed another day.

Mr. W. C. Anderson, M.P., supported the resolution, which was carried.

New Statesman
6.5.16.

662/10 662

Daily Citizen 1.3.15

The Co-operative Wholesale Society—the largest purveyor of household supplies in the world, selling nearly a million pounds' worth a week—gives us some authentic particulars of the rise in prices of food of English working-class consumption. The purchasing power of a pound two years ago is now equal only to 11s. 2d.; the 5s. per week that the State grants to its Old Age Pensioners is now worth to them in food only as much as 2s. 11d. was then. An average weekly family order for grocery (including flour), which cost 6s. 5d. in 1914, now costs 8s. 9d. Lard, curiously enough, is cheaper. These figures emphasize the importance of the action that is being taken by the Minister of Munitions—unfortunately his machinery works much more slowly for raising wages than for making shells—to compel the manufacturers to pay their tens of thousands of women workers at least the pound a week minimum. The Central Tribunal is overwhelmed with complaints of cases in which the wages stipulated for by the Ministry of Munitions are not being paid. There are still adult women in controlled establishments, besides many others to whom Section 7 has been applied (forbidding them to leave their employment), not getting threepence per hour.

Daily Call
17.3.15

COSTLY CLEAN COLLARS.

15 PER CENT. DEARER TO CHANGE YOUR CLOTHES.

BREAD UP AGAIN.

Your clean collars are to cost you more.

The launderers of the London district are giving the increased cost of working serious consideration, and a majority are said to be in favour of an increase of quite 15 per cent.

"It is little understood," said Mr. J. J. Stark, secretary of the Launderers' Association, yesterday, "how the war has affected our class of work.

"First, there is the increase in the cost of living; but another serious question which has to be faced is the shortage of labour.

"Male labour is extremely scarce, and there is a proportionate shortage in female labour.

"The latter is explained by the fact that many of the female workers are now in receipt of separation allowance, with the result that there is little need for them to augment their incomes.

"Then, again in certain districts where billeting is in force the women have to stay at home to attend to the wants of their Government boarders.

"All these matters will shortly be thoroughly thrashed out; but there is little hope of the householder's laundry bill remaining at its present price.

"You may safely say it will be very surprising if we do not raise the cost, and I should think the increased cost imposed by working laundries will be about 15 per cent."

COST OF FOOD.

And after collars—food.

A further slight rise—about 2 per cent.—in the retail prices of food during February is recorded by the "Board of Trade Labour Gazette."

The two articles which showed the greatest advance during the month were flour, with a rise of about 8 per cent. on the average, and bread, with a rise of about 7 per cent. Taking the country as a whole, the price of bread was 7½d. per 4lb.

Meat and fish also showed a further advance, with the important exception of fish in London.

Decreases were shown by bacon, butter, and eggs. In the case of bacon and of butter the reductions were only about 1 or 2 per cent.; but in the case of eggs—where the reduction is, of course, largely seasonal—it amounted to nearly 10 per cent.

PEOPLE AND THE PROFITEERS.

TO-MORROW'S NATIONAL CONFERENCE.

From the farthest ends of Britain delegates are coming to London to-morrow to declare to the Government that unlimited profiteering in the food and fuel of the people must no longer continue. It can be stopped, and ought to be stopped.

The Kingsway Hall gatherings have been arranged by the Workers' War Emergency Committee, but they are not Labour, or Trade Union, or Socialist, or co-operative gatherings in the ordinary limited sense of those words. The matter of dear food affects everyone, and great corporations like those of Glasgow, Hull, Southampton, and Cardiff are sending representatives to sit side by side with the delegates of the miners, the railwaymen, the dockers, the cotton workers, and all those other organisations through which the workers are accustomed to make their needs and their influence felt. Women, who are so vitally concerned in the spending of the household incomes, are to be present in strength.

It is not an English conference. Scotland is sending a full representation, and Sligo is one of the Irish corporations to appoint its delegates. Nor is it a gathering from the big towns only or the big Unions. Urban and rural and parish councils, boards of guardians, will be there also, often in the persons of their chairmen and clerks.

The question will be discussed in all its bearings during the conference proper, which opens at 10.30, and will be continued with a luncheon interval till 4.30.

The Right Hon. Arthur Henderson, M.P., will preside.

REMEDIES TO BE URGED

Mr. J. A. Seddon (president of the Trade Union Congress) will move, and Miss Margaret Bondfield second, a resolution declaring that the most effective action that the Government can now take to reduce wheat prices is to intervene to remedy the deficiency in carrying-ships, and asking that the Government should at once take steps to obtain the control of more ships and itself bring wheat from Argentina, Canada, and elsewhere at the bare cost of transport.

Mr. Robert Smillie (president of the Miners' Federation) will submit a resolution on coal prices, supported by Mr W. Brace, M.P. The resolution is worded as follows:—

(a) "That maximum prices for coal should be fixed by Government."

(b) "That railway trucks, belonging both to the separate railway companies and to private traders, should be pooled and run to their fullest economic use."

(c) "That in fixing shipping freights for coasting vessels under their control the Government should have regard to normal rates rather than to the excessive rates inflicted by private shipowners."

(d) "That the Government commandeer coal supplies and distribute to household consumers through municipal or co-operative agencies."

MASSED FORCES

At night in the same hall will be held a great public demonstration at which, besides those already mentioned, the following are expected to speak: Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, M.P., Mr. C. W. Bowerman, M.P. (secretary Trade Union Congress), Mr. W. C. Anderson, M.P., Mr. H. M. Hyndman, Mr. Albert Bellamy (president National Union of Railwaymen), Mr. Joseph Cross (United Textile Workers), Mr. Ben Tillett (Dockers' Union), Dr. Marion Phillips (Women's Labour League), Mr. R. Williams (Co-operative Union), and Mr. John Stokes (London Trades Council).

The Central Tribunal is overwhelmed with complaints of cases in which the wages stipulated for by the Ministry of Munitions are not being paid. There are still adult women in controlled establishments, besides many others to whom Section 7 has been applied (forbidding them to leave their employment), not getting threepence per hour.

Daily Call 17.3.15

COSTLY CLEAN COLLARS.

15 PER CENT. DEARER TO CHANGE YOUR CLOTHES.

BREAD UP AGAIN.

Your clean collars are to cost you more.

The launderers of the London district are giving the increased cost of working serious consideration, and a majority are said to be in favour of an increase of quite 15 per cent.

"It is little understood," said Mr. J. J. Stark, secretary of the Launderers' Association, yesterday, "how the war has affected our class of work.

"First, there is the increase in the cost of living; but another serious question which has to be faced is the shortage of labour.

"Male labour is extremely scarce, and there is a proportionate shortage in female labour.

"The latter is explained by the fact that many of the female workers are now in receipt of separation allowance, with the result that there is little need for them to augment their incomes.

"Then, again in certain districts where billeting is in force the women have to stay at home to attend to the wants of their Government boarders.

"All these matters will shortly be thoroughly thrashed out; but there is little hope of the householder's laundry bill remaining at its present price.

"You may safely say it will be very surprising if we do not raise the cost, and I should think the increased cost imposed by working laundries will be about 15 per cent."

COST OF FOOD.

And after collars—food.

A further slight rise—about 2 per cent.—in the retail prices of food during February is recorded by the "Board of Trade Labour Gazette."

The two articles which showed the greatest advance during the month were flour, with a rise of about 8 per cent. on the average, and bread, with a rise of about 7 per cent. Taking the country as a whole, the price of bread was 7¾d. per 4lb.

Meat and fish also showed a further advance, with the important exception of fish in London.

Decreases were shown by bacon, butter, and eggs. In the case of bacon and of butter the reductions were only about 1 or 2 per cent.; but in the case of eggs—where the reduction is, of course, largely seasonal—it amounted to nearly 10 per cent.

On the whole the reductions in articles other than bread and flour approximately balanced the advances, so that the whole advance in February may be put down to those two articles.

Gas companies are raising the price of gas in consequence of the coal difficulty. Some of the increases in London are as follows: Gas Light and Coke Company, 4d. per 1000 cubic feet; Dartford, Gravesend, and Milton combined, 4d.; North Fleet and Gravesend, Chatham, and Gillingham, 3d. The South Metropolitan Gas Company will probably announce an advance to-day.

---

food affects everyone, and great corporations like those of Glasgow, Hull, Southampton, and Cardiff are sending representatives to sit side by side with the delegates of the miners, the railwaymen, the dockers, the cotton workers, and all those other organisations through which the workers are accustomed to make their needs and their influence felt. Women, who are so vitally concerned in the spending of the household incomes, are to be present in strength.

It is not an English conference. Scotland is sending a full representation, and Sligo is one of the Irish corporations to appoint its delegates. Nor is it a gathering from the big towns only or the big Unions. Urban and rural and parish councils, boards of guardians, will be there also, often in the persons of their chairmen and clerks.

The question will be discussed in all its bearings during the conference proper, which opens at 10.30, and will be continued with a luncheon interval till 4.30.

The Right Hon. Arthur Henderson, M.P., will preside.

REMEDIES TO BE URGED

Mr. J. A. Seddon (president of the Trade Union Congress) will move, and Miss Margaret Bondfield second, a resolution declaring that the most effective action that the Government can now take to reduce wheat prices is to intervene to remedy the deficiency in carrying-ships, and asking that the Government should at once take steps to obtain the control of more ships and itself bring wheat from Argentina, Canada, and elsewhere at the bare cost of transport.

Mr. Robert Smillie (president of the Miners' Federation) will submit a resolution on coal prices, supported by Mr W. Brace, M.P. The resolution is worded as follows:—

(a) "That maximum prices for coal should be fixed by Government."

(b) "That railway trucks, belonging both to the separate railway companies and to private traders, should be pooled and run to their fullest economic use."

(c) "That in fixing shipping freights for coasting vessels under their control the Government should have regard to normal rates rather than to the excessive rates inflicted by private shipowners."

(d) "That the Government commandeer coal supplies and distribute to household consumers through municipal or co-operative agencies."

MASSED FORCES

At night in the same hall will be held a great public demonstration at which, besides those already mentioned, the following are expected to speak: Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, M.P., Mr. C. W. Bowerman, M.P. (secretary Trade Union Congress), Mr. W. C. Anderson, M.P., Mr. H. M. Hyndman, Mr. Albert Bellamy (president National Union of Railwaymen), Mr. Joseph Cross (United Textile Workers), Mr. Ben Tillett (Dockers' Union), Dr. Marion Phillips (Women's Labour League), Mr. R. Williams (Co-operative Union), and Mr. John Stokes (London Trades Council).

662a
T.U.J. March 12
Know, to Utter, and to Argue freely, acco

TEN PER CENT WAR BONUS.

6624

MOVE BY YORKSHIRE COTTON OPERATIVES.

FINE WRAPPING FIGHT.

NOTES BY TYKE.

Ever since the introduction of the new spinners' list one or two firms who were called upon to pay an increased price on the counts as then spun have resorted to the practice of naming the yarn two [illegible] than was actually being spun. The Operative Spinners' officials and the spinners themselves have repeatedly pointed out the dishonesty of the practice, but without effect. Even the factory inspectors were powerless to act, or at least they pretended that they were powerless to prosecute so long as the employers told the spinners what the actual counts were, although they were only paying for what the counts were sold as when doubled or trebled.

* * * *

However, the time has come when the Operative Spinners will stand it no longer, and if the Operative Spinners' Amalgamation had not been prepared to put a system down that they would not tolerate in their Lancashire districts, then the Yorkshire operatives had decided to fight the case out themselves with their own funds. But on Saturday the E.C. of the Operative Spinners' Amalgamation gave full power to the Yorkshire province to deal with these fine wrapping cases. Eighteen months ago the E.C. gave the Yorkshire province power to put the operative spinners at a certain firm on notice to test the case, and before the notices expired the officials of the two Yorkshire associations agreed to a settlement that in future the operative spinners at the firm should be paid what the yarn actually wrapped as it came from the mule spindles. That firm have honourably stuck to the settlement, but certain others have continued the practice complained of.

* * * *

Unfortunately at that time a threatened lock-out was pending over all the trade, or else it was the original intention of the operatives' union to take in hand the firms that were practising these unfair methods. Now that the matter is again being taken up in earnest it behoves the union to fight it to the bitter end. There is a scarcity of labourers in all trades, and the wages offered are as good as some operative spinners are now getting. If it comes to a strike blacklegs will be few. Some who acted as accommodators for the employers in the last Yorkshire cotton trade dispute have joined the Army, thinking they had another soft job on, but I saw one of these back at home last week, rejected as unfit to be shot at.

* * * *

The whole of the operative spinners, piecers, and cardroom women at a cotton factory run by one of the members of the Yorkshire Cotton Masters' Association feel that they have been victimised. On the last pay day the datal hands, who are the only operatives not in a union, received intimation, along with their wage that in consequence of the rise in the price of food stuffs, etc., they were to receive a war bonus. The other operatives went home, and began to make inquiries if the various tradesmen made any deductions in food stuffs to them because they were members of a trade union. It seems strange that employers who believe in the value of trade combination amongst themselves, and have hard words to say about the non-union employer, should always try to give the non-union workman an advantage, and allow him liberties which he will not allow the trade union workman.

* * * *

I saw a very marked case of this kind on a public body a few days ago, when some organised workers made an application for an advance of wages. It was granted, but to spite the union men all non-unionists in the same department had to have it also, although they had not even the courage to ask for it. These men have always acted on the policy that if the union workmen agitated and got it they also would receive it.

* * * *

There was a breakdown of the engine at Calder Mills, Hebden Bridge, on Monday morning, and although it was temporarily repaired during the day it [illegible] standstill again, and on Tuesday morning the whole of the operatives were sent home for the week.

* * * *

Messrs. Robertshaw, cotton spinners and manufacturers, of Westfield Mills, Mytholmroyd, and Calder Mills, Hebden Bridge, have given a substantial advance of wages to all the spinners, piecers, and cardroom operatives. There is a strong demand amongst the Yorkshire cotton operatives generally to participate in the advances that are being given, and the executive of the Yorkshire Cotton Operatives' Union have decided [illegible]

Morning Post-13-3-15.
662

FOOD AND COAL PRICES.

WORKERS' NATIONAL CONFERENCE.

662/11

DEMAND FOR GOVERNMENT ACTION.

Mr. Arthur Henderson, M.P., presided yesterday at the Kingsway Hall over a conference called by the "Workers' National Committee" to discuss the prices of food and fuel. On the platform were Mr. H. M. Hyndman, Mr. F. W. Jowett, M.P., Mr. Harry Gosling, Miss Susan Lawrence, Mr. Robert Smillie, Mr. J. A. Seddon, Miss Margaret Bondfield, Mr. R. Williams, Mr. John Stokes, Mr. W. C. Anderson, M.P., Mr. W. Brace, M.P., and others.

The CHAIRMAN said that the conference had been called because of a very deep conviction among the workers that we were passing through a crisis in which the civil population had not had from the Government the consideration to which it was entitled. The treatment they had received was the more uncalled for in view of the fact that the civil population had displayed patience and patriotism of a most exemplary character. Food prices and the prices of other commodities, and in some centres house rent, had risen considerably. The rises, whatever their cause, were not justifiable. (Hear, hear.) They were there not merely as the Labour Party or as the Labour and Socialist Party, for the conference also represented a great section of the co-operative movement and a large number of our leading municipalities and other public authorities. The Government admitted that prices had risen, but said that the position was not so bad as it might have been—not much consolation to the great mass of the working people. They were not pleading for the highly-skilled workers, who were looking after themselves and claiming and obtaining substantial increases in wages. They were pleading for the lowest paid, the poor, the old age pensioner, and the unorganised skilled workers. The prices were highest in the things most needed by the poor. The people who had given their husbands, brothers, and sons, were those who at home were being called upon again to make the greatest sacrifices. They had been told that their proposals were Utopian. Not even the Government had the right to call proposals Utopian unless they were in a position to put into immediate operation proposals more practical and effective. When the Government desired to feed guns it commandeered all the workshops necessary. When it desired to populate the battlefield it commandeered all the ships and railways necessary. The overwhelming opinion of that conference would support the Government in that. (Cheers.) But if it were necessary in the one case the Government had an obligation and a responsibility in the other case. They were not going to allow the poor to suffer longer by being exploited by coalowners and landlords. (Cheers.)

A COMPREHENSIVE RESOLUTION.

Mr. J. A. SEDDON moved: "That the most effective action that the Government can now take to reduce wheat prices is to intervene to remedy the deficiency in carrying-ships; and that the Government should at once take steps to obtain the control of more ships and itself bring wheat from Argentina, Canada, and elsewhere at the bare cost of transport; that the Government should endeavour to secure control over such proportion of the Russian and other supplies as may be necessary for the need of the country, and so prevent further speculation and exploitation; that the Government should buy the present stock of British wheat at fair prices; that the Government should set up a representative committee, upon which Labour interests should be adequately included, to determine the price to be paid for the home supply, freightage charges on imported wheat not being taken into account in determining the purchase price. The Committee shall also fix prices for the re-sale of both the home and imported supplies at rates not exceeding 40s. per quarter, any loss thus incurred to be borne by the National Exchequer; that the Government should guarantee a fixed price, determined by the Committee indicated above, for the 1915 crop; that in determining prices the payment of adequate wages to agricultural workers should be taken into consideration." He maintained that three factors were responsible for the inflated prices—the inaction of the Government, the operations of the speculator and the gambler, and criminal exploitation and robbery by the shipping ring in this country. If the country could demonstrate that the exigencies of the war meant the tightening of the waist-belt then the workers would tighten the waist-belt—(cheers)—but if it meant that they were being exploited for a few people to get rich then they were grimly determined that their protest should go on until the Government fulfilled their duty to the suffering civil community. (Cheers.)

Miss BONFIELD seconded the motion. She said the Government did not understand the degradation of life involved in the increased cost of living.

Mr. BRAMLEY (Furnishing Trades) moved an addition to the motion, calling on the Government to take steps to commandeer and develop home-grown supplies of coal, and to take over the mines, and to appoint a committee of miners' representatives to assist in the management of the mines. He said that the Government had been afraid to touch their friends in the House of Commons who controlled the coal and shipping industries. The motion was only a step in the direction which they meant to travel ultimately—the national ownership of mines. If the Government were prepared to carry out this resolution the miners would be willing to waive, to some extent, any claim they might have for increased wages during the present crisis, but they were not prepared to go on paying 20 and 25 per cent. more for everything and at the same time see the cost of coal going up 6s., 7s., and 8s. without asking for additional wages. It was said it would be unpatriotic to take any action which might endanger the country. If that was true there had been a most unpatriotic step taken in raising the price of coal. It would be more unpatriotic to stand quietly by and see millions made out of coal while the mining community were not in a position to take any action to live as they were living before. If there was any shame it would not rest on the miners. The mining community had added to the units in France and Flanders as fully as any other community. The soldiers from that community had left behind their fathers, brothers, friends, and women, and were entitled to ask for their protection.

Alderman HOUSE seconded.

Mr. BRAMLEY held that the private trader ought to be knocked out of the coal business altogether. Small consumers in East London were paying £3 17s. 4d. a ton.

Mr. SHAW (Textile Workers) said that in many industries the men had had a chance through increased wages and overtime to meet the increased cost of living, but in the cotton industry the workers were suffering from unemployment.

Mr. JONES (West Ham) moved that the word "household" should be deleted, so that the resolution should apply to all coal.

The amendment was accepted. It was also agreed that the municipal representatives should attempt to call meetings on the subject in their own areas.

Mr. LANSBURY proposed that the resolution should be sent to all Trades Councils, Co-operative Societies, Municipal Councils, and Socialist Bodies, with the request that deputations should be sent to members of Parliament asking them to support the proposals. He also suggested that a national deputation should be organised to wait on the Prime Minister. They must, he said, kick up the devil's own row till they had kicked Asquith and his Government into action.

This amendment also was agreed to.

A CLOSE DIVISION.

Mr. W. ENSOM (City I.L.P.) moved a further addition to the resolution, declaring that if the Government declined to carry out what was demanded the Labour Party should divide the House and take every step to force the Government.

Mr. JONES (West Ham) said they ought to do something drastic. At best the Labour Party could not do much because they were living under conditions which almost prevented them from being honest. "They say," continued Mr. Jones, "that our King and country needs us, and then our patriots bleed us." The Clyde strikers had been denounced, but they had done what they could not have done without a strike. They had made the Government commandeer workshops and recognise the fair wages clause, which had been fought for during twenty years.

The amendment was carried by 107 votes to 106.

The CHAIRMAN—I suppose that with such a vote you will leave the Labour Party some judgment. (Laughter.)

Mr. JONES—The Act of Union was carried by one vote.

Another delegate desired to move an amendment in favour of a national strike, but the CHAIRMAN ruled it out of order on the ground that a national strike could only be ordered by the Unions who would have to pay for it.

Bailie STEWART (Glasgow), arguing for municipalities being allowed to supply coal, said that if the Glasgow Corporation had the power to supply coal the people would only be paying 33 per cent. of the present price.

Mr. DALY (Dublin Trades Council) said there was once a fellow called Johnson, who said that patriotism was the last refuge of a scoundrel. There was a little town in the West of Ireland with 11,000 inhabitants of whom 2,000 had gone to the war. (Hear, hear.) He would not say "Hear, hear." If they had believed as he did they would have stayed at home. The women they left behind were paying £4 3s. 4d. a ton for coal, and the patriotic shipowners who were anxious that no foreign foe should land on these shores unless over the dead bodies of their employees, had raised their freights from 4s. 6d. to 19s. There were only two parties in this country, the workers and their exploiters. There had never been a truce and could not be a truce between them. Agricultural labourers were being paid in Ireland by some patriotic members of Parliament 6s. a week and their food, or 10s. without food.

The resolution, as amended, was carried.

PUBLIC MEETING.

Mr. BOWERMAN, M.P., presided over a public meeting at Kingsway Hall in the evening, and, commenting on the smallness of the attendance, he remarked that one would hardly imagine that the working class community, especially the women folk, were being called on to make such unjustifiable financial sacrifices. It had been thought fitting that a public meeting should be convened in order to back up the Workers' Emergency Committee, passing a resolution to the effect that the rise in the price of food, coal, and other necessaries of life was not justified by any economic consequence of the war, and suggesting certain steps which the Government should take to improve the situation. He moved accordingly.

The proposal was seconded by Mr. JOHN BROWN (London Trades Council), and supported by Dr. MARION PHILLIPS (Women's Labour League).

Mr. H. M. HYNDMAN declared that the working classes were always either food for powder or food for plunder. At the present moment they were food for powder abroad in what he believed to be a righteous cause, but they were food for plunder at home. [illegible] piecers and cardroom operatives. There is a strong demand amongst the Yorkshire cotton operatives generally to participate in the advances that are being given, and the executive of the Yorkshire Cotton Operatives' Union have decided to send in a request for a war bonus of ten per cent owing to the struggle to make ends meet in their trying times.

* * * *

At one factory the twiners are on notice to leave because they absolutely refused to do any kind of work during meal time. Last week one of the twiners was allowing his son, a twiner piecer, to do some cleaning in the meal time, when the overlooker ordered him to desist or put his clothes on and go home. But it so happened that this overooker is also a twiner minder with a pair of jinnies, and he forgot for the moment that what he was trying to prevent in other jinnygates he was allowing to be practised by the piecers in his own.

---

on until the Government fulfilled their duty to the suffering civil community. (Cheers.)

Miss BONDFIELD seconded the motion. She said the Government did not understand the degradation of life involved in this increased cost of living.

Mr. BRAMLEY (Furnishing Trades) moved an addition to the motion, calling on the Government to take steps to commandeer and develop home-grown supplies. He said that with the proper cultivation of our own soil we could produce all we wanted. If the Government could subsidise the dyeing industry some steps ought to be taken to develop the agricultural system.

The amendment was accepted.

Mr. TURNER (Glasgow Trades Council) moved a further amendment demanding that the Government should control the prices of all food stuffs and house rents. He said that nobody had profited so much by the present tragic circumstances as property owners. In Glasgow rents had been increased time after time. Glasgow landlords had issued a circular to all property owners suggesting that the present was a very opportune time to raise rents by 10 per cent., but as there were many empty houses 4 per cent. of the extra 10 per cent. would be pooled for the benefit of the owners of the empty houses. Property owners were also treating soldiers' wives in a most brutal manner.

This amendment also was accepted.

EMPIRE PRICES.

Mr. ALBURY (Social and Political Vigilance Committee) moved as an addition to the motion that as the price of wheat was not determined by the home grown supply, the Imperial Government should confer with the Canadian and other Colonial Governments with a view of fixing maximum prices within the Empire.

Mr. W. C. ANDERSON, M.P., protested against "tinkering little alterations" in the resolution. He said there ought to be a big fight to get the Government to control prices. He hoped they were not going to be satisfied with advances of wages, though they would take all of them that they could get. But advances would not go to the people who really needed them most, while a reduction of food prices would affect everybody.

The amendment was lost.

Mr. GEORGE LANSBURY said that many of those present and their constituents would get rises in wages and were working overtime, but there was a mass of women, men past middle age, and young children who were enduring untold suffering. The Prince of Wales's Fund ruled them out because they were always poor, and their poverty was not attributable to the war. We were fighting for a "scrap of paper," and yet we were taking advantage of this moment to dishonour the scrap of paper regarding the school age of children. He would never rest till the food supplies were mobilised and we produced food without sending babies to work. (Cheers.) If any children were to be robbed of their childhood's days let the grandchildren of Mr. Asquith and Mr. Lloyd George (if he had any) and the possessing classes go into the fields and work before those of the poor. (Cheers.)

Mr. J. DAVIS (Mayor of Merthyr) and others having spoken the resolution as amended was put and carried.

COST OF COAL.

Mr. R. SMILLIE (Miners' Federation) moved: "That maximum prices for coal should be fixed by the Government; that railway trucks, belonging both to the separate railway companies and to private traders, should be pooled and run to their fullest economic use; that in fixing shipping freights for coasting vessels under their control the Government should have regard to normal rates rather than to the excessive rates inflicted by private shipowners; that the Government commandeer coal supplies and distribute to household consumers through municipal or co-operative agencies." He said that if they were to keep down the cost of living and to be in a position to go on manufacturing the necessaries of life and the munitions of war the supply of coal must be kept at a reasonable price. There was some doubt as to whether the increase had been caused by a shortage or by the opportunities which existed for the coalowners and middlemen increasing the price independently of the supply. If the value of coal had gone up during the past seven months as the outcome of claims made by the miners for higher wages there would have been a considerable outcry against the miners. But miners' wages had been going down rather than up during the last nine or ten months, and there had not been any effort on their part to increase their wages. It could not be said that any rise in the price of coal was due to the miners. Two and a half years ago the miners drafted a Bill proposing that collieries should be nationalised and that the Government should so arrange matters as to supply coal at all times at a certain fixed reasonable price. Coal, railways, and land ought to be the first things to be dealt with if the Government were going to look after the workers. If they had, from the time when coal began to increase in price, taken over the mines at a fair valuation, they would already have secured in return from the increased prices more than half the purchase price. But, of course, the Government would not have raised the price. The price had been affected by freights in places remote from coal fields, but that could not be the reason of the increase in the pit mouth price. From Newcastle to Aberdeen, the same distance as from Newcastle to London, the total increase in shipping costs, including increased wages and increased insurance, was about 8½d. a ton. The Prime Minister said that the cost of transit from Newcastle to London had gone up from 3s. to 13s. and 14s., and that the Government had managed to reduce that to 10s. by releasing some of the interned ships. But that was still 7s. over the honest rate of carriage. If the Government were running the released ships they were getting that 7s., and if they were not they were giving it to the shippers.

MINISTERS AND THEIR SUPPORTERS.

There would be no relief until the Government grappled fully with the question of taking over the mines and the coal supplies. This could be done if they were not too particular about running up against

The proposal was seconded by Mr. JOHN STOKES (London Trades Council), and supported by Dr. MARION PHILLIPS (Women's Labour League).

Mr. H. M. HYNDMAN declared that the working classes were always either food for powder or food for plunder. At the present moment they were food for powder abroad in what he believed to be a righteous cause, but they were food for plunder at home. Unless this state of things was remedied without delay it would be the duty of the Labour Party to stop recruiting and to use their forces at home. What the meeting now demanded was that the Government should take control of the food of the people in order to give them that food at a reasonable price.

Mr. R. SMILLIE declared that many of those who were encouraging the workers to fight for the defence of their country were staying at home and making fortunes out of the war. He believed that the mines of the country, even worked as they were now by a limited number of hands, were capable of producing all the coal that the country needed at a fair and reasonable price. If the protest addressed to the Government that day was ineffective, the forces of labour would be aroused, and would refuse to give their work, quite unmindful of the charge that such action on their part was unpatriotic. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. BEN TILLETT and Mr. W. C. ANDERSON, M.P., having spoken, the motion was carried by acclamation.

SOCIALIST VIEWS.

Under the auspices of the local branches of the Independent Labour Party, the British Socialist Party, and the Clarion Fellowship, a poorly-attended meeting was held last night at the Limehouse Town Hall to protest against the rise in the prices of food and fuel. Miss Susan Lawrence, L.C.C., took the chair. Mr. W. C. ANDERSON, M.P., moved a resolution expressing indignation and disappointment at the refusal of the Government to take effective measures to deal with the alarming rise in the cost of food and fuel, and appealing to the House of Commons to force the Government to take immediate steps to relieve the burden which the cost of the necessaries of life had imposed upon the working classes. The resolution also made suggestions to the effect that the Government should take control of supplies. Working people were willing to make sacrifices for the national cause, but it was wrong to ask them to make sacrifices merely in order that certain interests might make bigger and bigger profits and dividends. There was no doubt that shipowners were having the time of their lives. Labour people said that if there were to be sacrifices they should be borne all-round. If there was to be a truce it should be a truce to exploitation and to the rise of food prices and social oppression. While farmers were getting from twenty to twenty-five shillings extra profit on every quarter of wheat they sold, they claimed that they could not get labourers; therefore they were trying to break down the Education Acts, to put boys and girls of school age on the land to work for 4s. or 5s. a week, and to break down the spirit of the Agricultural Labourers' Union. The resolution was agreed to.

The New Witness
3/6/15

THE continued increase in the price of food, the extortionate profits made by millers, meat importers and provision firms generally, have called forth little protest in the columns of the Press. For the most part, the people are instructed not to eat so much and women are earnestly implored to consider the lentil as an article of diet and to remember that nutriment can be extracted from potato skins. Vegetarianism is a fad which can only be practised by people with time or money, and it is as ridiculous as it is impertinent to suggest that the mother of a family of children, who has to get in two days' charing a week to help up the family exchequer, should spend hours on the concoction of sorel soup or a nuttose omelette. We are continually told that the workers of this country have never been so prosperous, and that the increase of their wages is out of all proportion to the increase in the cost of food. This is, of course, an entire misstatement but even allowing that a proportion of workers are in receipt of higher wages than they have received for some time past, there still remains a residuum of ill-paid labour unaffected by the war. The widows of Hoxton still work at box-making and kindred trades for a miserable pittance. Munition work does not affect them; they have still to toil long hours for a few pence to keep themselves and their children, and the enormous price charged for food means that their diet falls nearly to starvation level. To suggest that a woman should go home from the blouse factory and make a hearty meal off an artichoke, which she has no means of cooking or serving in the manner suggested by certain papers, is an insult which even muddle-headedness does not excuse. If the Press were to attack the men who have made and are making vast fortunes out of the war and from the necessities of the poor they would assist the diet of the people more effectually than by long and futile vegetarian menus.

Herald
24/7/15

662.

662/13

SWEATING OR TRUE SERVICE

Two great demonstrations of women have taken place in London during the past week—one organised by Mrs. Pankhurst and the W.S.P.U. and the other by Miss Sylvia Pankhurst and the East London Federation of the Suffragettes. Neither procession could claim to be representative of organised labour, except in so far as the two organisations concerned have working women as members. Neither the Women's Co-operative Guild, nor the Women's Trade Union League, nor the Women's Labour League was officially represented. All the same the rallies were exceedingly important and attracted some at least of the attention they deserved.

The main object of the W.S.P.U. was to emphasise the willingness of women of all classes to serve the State, the concern of the East Londoners was to demonstrate the fact that millions of women are serving their country at home, in factory, workshop, office, and field; that the country is "recognising" their services by mean, miserable, sweating wages, using their patriotism to bring down men's wages; while, to crown all, Parliament and Government allow these women—wives, mothers, sisters of the men in the Army and Navy or of the men who are serving the nation in industrial life—to be robbed and swindled by greedy monopolists who are so selfish, so unpatriotic, so "pro-German" as to use a fearful war in order to make money for themselves.

We hope Mrs. Pankhurst and her friends will find all the work they wish for, that they will insist on being paid proper wages for their toil, and use their great organisation to keep up wages. They should beware of the profiteers and exploiters and remember their less favoured sisters all the time.

But of course the sympathy of the HERALD is wholeheartedly with the working women for whom Miss Sylvia Pankhurst so earnestly pleads. Mr. Lloyd George and others must not be allowed to put them off with mere words. The monopolist enemies of our household must be put in their place. The exploitation of the people must end. The Government must ensure that women on railway and tramway, in field and workshop are not sweated and robbed for the sake of the idle rich. We hope Trade Unionists everywhere will aid the East London women to secure their just demand; so that the outcome may be real patriotism, true and fitly rewarded service, not callous exploitation covered by hypocrisy and humbug.

Daily News & Leader.

November 10th 1915.

INCREASE IN PRICE OF MEAT SINCE 1913.

Official Table Showing the Higher Cost.

The following interesting table, showing the average increase in wholesale meat prices between October, 1913, and October, 1915, is issued by the Board of Trade:

	1913. Per cwt. s.	d.		1915. Per cwt. s	d.	Increase. Per lb. Pence.
BEEF.
Scotch short sides	67	8	..	88	8	.. 2.25
English	58	7½	..	76	5	.. 1.69
Irish (port killed)	56	5¼	..	74	1	.. 1.91
Argentine chilled:
Hind quarter	82	6	..	77	7	.. 2.69
Fore quarter	33	10	..	89	6	.. 2.75
MUTTON.
Scotch	74	1	..	92	2	.. 1.94
English	67	1	..	85	11	.. 2.13
New Zealand frozen ..	43	2	..	71	2	.. 1.00
Argentine frozen	40	10	..	63	7	.. 2.44
Australian frozen	37	0½	..	58	4	.. 2.28
LAMB.
British	67	8	..	93	4	.. 2.75
New Zealand frozen ...	53	11½	..	77	7	.. 2.53
Australian frozen	47	3	..	72	4	.. 2.69
PORK.
British	72	4	..	101	6	.. 3.13

It should be remembered, adds the announcement, that the expenses of retailing have increased as well as the wholesale prices of meat. The average increases in retail prices may, consequently, be somewhat greater than the increases shown above, without increasing the profits of the retailer.

Manchester Guardian.
24 2 16 101

662
662/15

THE INCREASE OF WAGES AND SALARIES.

To the Editor of the Manchester Guardian.

Sir,—It is very gratifying to read in the columns of the "Manchester Guardian" that a number of firms, following the lead of the Union Bank of Manchester and the Dunlop Rubber Company, have decided to grant increases in the wages and salaries of such of their staffs whose incomes are not sufficiently large to enable them to bear the great advance in the prices of foodstuffs without badly feeling the pinch. This generous action is worthy of every commendation, both by the Government and the public, for if the good example were followed as widely as it should be workpeople generally would be more contented and the Government would be saved the additional worry of having to deal with vexed industrial troubles ahead. But I would just like to commend this generous attitude towards workpeople to the number of employers in the Manchester shipping and home trade warehouses who, far from granting increases in salaries, still keep their staffs on, in many cases, greatly reduced pay. Everybody knows that in the early days of the war the shipping-houses were badly hit, and the men whose salaries had been reduced were content to be patient until the situation improved. It would be idle to deny the improvement that has happily taken place, and, in view of the greatly reduced purchasing power of the sovereign, it is distinctly hard that the old salaries are not re-established. Whatever may be said of the industrial population, at least nobody can say that shipping clerks, buyers, and salesmen have caused employers any great worries in the past. Good years are not seized upon to force increases in salaries, and overtime at such times is readily worked without, in many cases, any recompense. Employers ought to remember that the good times will come again, and if they are not making exactly the profits they do in normal years they will be recouped when the boom comes, as come it will when the war is over. Meantime their staffs are suffering, and, in many cases, intensely.—Yours, &c.,

H. B. T. WALHEY.

Manchester, February 24.

Leeds Mercury
29. June 1916.

THE FEEDING PROBLEM.

CO-OPERATIVE ORGANISATIONS CRITICISED.

Unanimous support was accorded by the Leeds Trades Council, last night, to a resolution from the London Trades Council, urging that the Labour Party should take steps to impress upon the Government the urgency of regulating the supply and distribution of coal, flour, milk, and meat.

Mr. Connellan remarked that some of their own working-class co-operative organisations might have done much more than they had done to keep down prices. They had forgotten all about the principles that governed the movement in its earlier stages. If, at the beginning of the war, they had set to work, not to realise dividends and excess profits, but to provide food for the people at the lowest possible prices, they might have prevented much of the present profit-mongering.

T. P.'s Weekly. 29.4.16 662 662/16

FIVE O'CLOCK TEA TALK

The Women's Question. . .

WOMEN are the largest purchasers in this country. In 999 out of every 1,000 households they make the disbursements for housekeeping; and in 800 out of every thousand have control of the purse. Father's new suit, the children's school fees, rates, rent, holidays, were all provided for out of this purse of Fortunatus, and somehow mother made both ends meet. But the task daily grows more difficult. A sovereign now only buys as much as 13s. 6d. in pre-war times, according to some authorities, and the most sanguine say it is not worth more than 16s. as a medium of purchase. Thus the man of £500 a year, even if he be one of the few professional men who has not suffered a pecuniary diminution of income is now really losing 25 per cent. of his salary, and his money is only equal to £375. So that wise buying is the woman's question to-day. Where two or three are gathered together there may be some desultory talk on servants and the difficulty of getting them: but the conversation soon veers round to the question of high prices and the problem that faces women who have to render the same services on diminished allowances or falling purchase power. They grumble, but see no relief. "It is the result of the war and we must make the best of it."

One Way Out.

In my opinion, we are not making the best of it. Before the war the question of Suffrage was for many women the paramount question. Like most educated women, I desire a vote, but that there are others who do not agree with me, I am fully aware. For even though it is war time, a friend kindly sends me the "Anti-Suffrage Review" regularly. Why do not the Suffrage Societies and the Antis tackle this question of high prices? The use of substitutes is one way out: instead of bacon at 1s. 6d. a pound have rolled oats at 3d. per pound for breakfast; instead of buying bread at the doors and getting 3½ pounds for 4 pounds, let the maid fetch it from the baker's and get full weight; do your own shopping at the grocer's and get sugar at the price fixed by the Government and not with the halfpenny per pound extra charged when orders are taken at the back-door or the foot of the area steps. Use margarine instead of butter: if you pay a good price, 10d. or 1s. a pound, and say nothing about it, few men will know the difference; in cooking, use margarine at 7d. a pound or dripping from your own joints. Buy your meat personally instead of having it sent. On a recent Saturday afternoon I saw sirloin in a working-class district on sale at 8d. a pound, though my own joint cost twice as much. It is true the shop was dirty, and the meat, exposed to all the dust and filth blown up from the street, did not look very appetising. Yet cheapness need not mean uncleanliness. Anyone who has seen the horse-meat shops kept by Belgians in London know that they are daintily clean; and horseflesh only costs about 5d. a pound. I do not suggest you should eat horseflesh; it is repugnant to horse-loving people like ourselves. Though I remember while accompanying an expedition in North Africa we met with a severe sand-storm that not only delayed us, but caused the party to lose its way. Food got very scarce. A mule was killed, and those broiled mule steaks were delicious. Hunger is a very good sauce, still necessity has never since compelled me to include mule or horse-flesh in the menu.

The Power of Boycott.

Looking round for substitutes is not always satisfactory: some folks, who are not Scotch, think bacon and eggs better for breakfast than porridge, yet we can alter some of these high prices if we like. Let us have a "Women's Price Committee," composed of the presidents of the suffrage and anti-suffrage societies, Miss Mary MacArthur and a representative of the virile women Trade Unionists in the mills of Lancashire and Yorkshire. Let them organise the collective power of boycott. For instance, best bacon is 1s. 6d. a pound: it should not be more than 1s. 2d. If the women of Britain boycotted bacon for a fortnight, it would be down to 1s. 2d. at the end of the time. Butter is 1s. 8d.: it could well be 1s. 4d. in May; then for one month we will use margarine and boycott butter. The price would come tumbling down with a run. Milk is raised to 6d. a quart. Boycott milk, use instead Nestle's condensed milk: it is purer and more wholesome: not contaminated by dust or unclean vessels. A fortnight's boycott would soon bring the ring who have put prices up to their senses, and prices would come down. Coal is anything from 5s. to 10s. a ton more than it should be. Boycott coal, use gas, but use it carefully, turn out when not using, bake several things at one time. You will be surprised to find that gas is really cheap, either for heating or cooking if used properly and without waste. Take, as a last example, matches. They are to be 8d. a dozen boxes, when it should be sixpence. We are told this gift of 2d. a dozen boxes to manufacturers or importers is compensation or interest for capital laid out before there is any return. Assuming that the family only uses one dozen boxes a week, quite a low estimate, then 2d. on the sixpence means something over 1,700 per cent. in the year, and if it be reckoned on the duty alone, as it should be, the interest is nearly three times as much. It is time we stopped such usury, and organised women can do it.

Advertisements.

Let the "Women's Price Committee" meet and fix a fair price. Then from the funds of their societies, or with the assistance of wealthy individuals who are willing to help less fortunate persons, even though they do not feel the pinch, let them advertise. Simply and boldly as:—

NOTICE TO WOMEN.

Bread should be 7d. a 4 lb. loaf.
Reduce your consumption by half for the next four weeks.
If you boycott high prices, they will come down.

With bread one can only diminish consumption, substituting porridge, home-made bread or puddings, but fresh milk, bacon, potatoes, butter, eggs and meat could be done without for a time. The resolute organised use of the boycott would establish fair prices and relieve our purses.

C. H.

Manchester Guardian 1.7.16

662.

662/17

The Problem of Prices.

Food prices have risen on the whole about 59 per cent since the war began. Needless to say, this is a form of war tax which presses much more heavily on the poor than on the well-to-do. A poor family will spend perhaps two-thirds of its weekly income on food, a well-to-do family perhaps one-fifth, one-tenth, or less, as the scale of income goes up. Of the remaining third of the poor man's income the bulk goes in rent, and rents, we believe, have not increased. If we take a concrete case we can measure, roughly, the amount of the burden which the war has thrown on a working-class family. Let us suppose a family of six people with a family income of 30s. a week spending 20s. on food of all sorts, which allows just under sixpence a day per head. This 20s. will now buy, in round numbers, what 12s. 6d. bought before the war. In other words, the rise of prices would amount to a tax of 7s. 6d. on the family income of 30s., or 25 per cent. As against this, working people generally have secured some small rise of money wages, employment is very good, and in most families boys and girls, and perhaps old people, are profitably employed. No statistics are available to show directly how far or in what classes these gains offset the increased cost. That they must do so to a very large extent, however, is shown indirectly by the decrease of pauperism, which has fallen to the lowest point on record. Apart from the increase in employment, the war allowances have put many women, with their families, in a position of material comfort hitherto unknown to them. This explains why, notwithstanding the rise of prices, the economic condition of the poorer classes as a whole is relatively good. This, however, is not to say that the increase is anything but a very serious matter. By no means all sections of the working class have shared in the boom of employment, and even where they have done so it must be borne in mind that whatever extra pay they gain they are earning by extra work. The "leisured" class is too fond of thinking of employment as in itself a good thing for the unleisured, instead of being the price which they pay for their necessaries.

We must therefore all agree that, though the economic condition of the country is wonderfully better than anyone would have dared to predict in 1914 if he could have foreseen that we should still be at war to-day, the rise in the cost of living remains the chief drawback to its industrial prosperity, and must constantly engage the attention of statesmen. A special meeting of the Trade Unions Congress, just held in London to deal with the subject, has recommended the German system of the fixation of maximum prices. That system would become necessary if we were faced with the same conditions as the Germans. But our conditions are quite different. They are faced with an actual scarcity of many articles of food and other necessaries. There is only just enough to go round, if so much. They must therefore regulate the amount that each man, woman, and child is to have, and since the scarcity has given a monopoly to the producers or tradespeople who hold the stocks they must also fix the price. Observe carefully that these two things go together. With maximum prices amounts purchasable must be fixed, otherwise well-to-do and extravagant people could take too great a share. Now our conditions are quite different. There is no scarcity, since the world's market is open to us, but there is a rise of prices, first because there is an increased demand, and secondly because many factors of the supply have become more costly. There is an increased demand for food and clothing, for the armies, and also in all probability because a more fully employed people wants more to eat and can get it. There is increased cost, first and foremost, in transport, because a very large proportion of our merchant shipping is being used by the fleet or in the service of our Allies, while a small proportion has been sunk by submarines. Foreign countries which supply us, not being smitten with any sudden unselfishness, also take advantage of our needs and make profit while the war goes on. If we seek to deal with this situation by fixing maximum prices the first consequence must be the introduction of the ticket system. The State cannot go to the baker and say, "The "price of bread for which you are "charging 8½d. to-day will from Mon-"day onwards be 6d., and you must supply "as much as anyone chooses to buy at "that price." The baker would reply simply but sufficiently by not baking. The State would have to assume control at every stage in the production and distribution of bread in order to replace that automatic check upon consumption which is at present exercised by the fact that a man who wants to buy a thing has to pay what it costs to produce it and bring it to his door. Thus maximum prices would mean State regulation of the amounts which each one of us could buy. On the other hand, it is not easy to see how the State could effectively lower prices except by running industry at a loss at the expense of the general taxpayer. If the price of wheat were lowered by enactment the stimulus which has caused our farmers to lay down about 25 per cent more land in wheat would be removed, and we should have so much less of our own to compete with the products of Argentina, whose prices our Government has no power to regulate. It is thought by some that the Government might commandeer ships. So it might for certain necessaries, such as food, but only by increasing the dearth of ships for other purposes. The Board of Trade has, we think, done more wisely by beginning at the other end and curtailing the import of bulky and unnecessary articles. Freights are high because ships are scarce, and we cannot make good the scarcity of ships by limiting the amount they can earn. On the contrary, the rise of freights has brought out old ships into use, stimulated building to the utmost extent permitted by the needs of the navy, and caused ships to be loaded with so much more care and efficiency that the diminution in the volume of imports bears no relation to the diminution of available shipping.

It is very repugnant to natural feeling that certain classes should be making fortunes out of the colossal misery of the war. But when we think of the thousands that have become tens of thousands let us remember that 60 per cent of it all comes back into our own pockets as taxpayers. Here, again, we think the Government has hit upon the sounder method. It says to the producer, the shipping company, or the merchant in effect: "Charge what you can get, but we "will all go shares in the loot. In fact we "will have the larger share, half as much "again as we leave to you. Your gain is "the price we pay for leaving the direction of "business in your hands. It is a stiff price, "but, between ourselves, we do not feel so "very confident that we could manage better "if we were to take the whole thing over. "People keep saying unkind things about our "management of the little matters of buying "and selling which we have to do already for "the army and navy, and we feel sure that if "we grew, carried, stored, and distributed "wheat they would say that we took the "worst land off the farmers' hands, paid the "top prices in all the foreign markets, took "over the slowest and least suitable ships, and "miscalculated the amounts required for "storage and distribution. This is what they "would say, and what is worse, and still more "strictly between ourselves, it is possible that "they would be partly right. So on the whole they must do so to a very large extent, however, is shown indirectly by the decrease of pauperism, which has fallen to the lowest point on record. Apart from the increase in employment, the war allowances have put many women, with their families, in a position of material comfort hitherto unknown to them. This explains why, notwithstanding the rise of prices, the economic condition of the poorer classes as a whole is relatively good. This, however, is not to say that the increase is anything but a very serious matter. By no means all sections of the working class have shared in the boom of employment, and even where they have done so it must be borne in mind that whatever extra pay they gain they are earning by extra work. The "leisured" class is too fond of thinking of employment as in itself a good thing for the unleisured, instead of being the price which they pay for their necessaries.

We must therefore all agree that, though the economic condition of the country is wonderfully better than anyone would have dared to predict in 1914 if he could have foreseen that we should still be at war to-day, the rise in the cost of living remains the chief drawback to its industrial prosperity, and must constantly engage the attention of statesmen. A special meeting of the Trade Unions Congress, just held in London to deal with the subject, has recommended the German system of the fixation of maximum prices. That system would become necessary if we were faced with the same conditions as the Germans. But our conditions are quite different. They are faced with an actual scarcity of many articles of food and other necessaries. There is only just enough to go round, if so much. They must therefore regulate the amount that each man, woman, and child is to have, and since the scarcity has given a monopoly to the producers or tradespeople who hold the stocks they must also fix the price. Observe carefully that these two things go together. With maximum prices amounts purchasable must be fixed, otherwise well-to-do and extravagant people could take too great a share. Now our conditions are quite different. There is no scarcity, since the world's market is open to us, but there is a rise of prices, first because there is an increased demand, and produce it and bring it to his door. Thus maximum prices would mean State regulation of the amounts which each one of us could buy. On the other hand, it is not easy to see how the State could effectively lower prices except by running industry at a loss at the expense of the general taxpayer. If the price of wheat were lowered by enactment the stimulus which has caused our farmers to lay down about 25 per cent more land in wheat would be removed, and we should have so much less of our own to compete with the products of Argentina, whose prices our Government has no power to regulate. It is thought by some that the Government might commandeer ships. So it might for certain necessaries, such as food, but only by increasing the dearth of ships for other purposes. The Board of Trade has, we think, done more wisely by beginning at the other end and curtailing the import of bulky and unnecessary articles. Freights are high because ships are scarce, and we cannot make good the scarcity of ships by limiting the amount they can earn. On the contrary, the rise of freights has brought out old ships into use, stimulated building to the utmost extent permitted by the needs of the navy, and caused ships to be loaded with so much more care and efficiency that the diminution in the volume of imports bears no relation to the diminution of available shipping.

It is very repugnant to natural feeling that certain classes should be making fortunes out of the colossal misery of the war. But when we think of the thousands that have become tens of thousands let us remember that 60 per cent of it all comes back into our own pockets as taxpayers. Here, again, we think the Government has hit upon the sounder method. It says to the producer, the shipping company, or the merchant in effect: "Charge what you can get, but we "will all go shares in the loot. In fact we "will have the larger share, half as much "again as we leave to you. Your gain is "the price we pay for leaving the direction of "business in your hands. It is a stiff price, "but, between ourselves, we do not feel so "very confident that we could manage better "if we were to take the whole thing over. "People keep saying unkind things about our "management of the little matters of buying "and selling which we have to do already for "the army and navy, and we feel sure that if "we grew, carried, stored, and distributed "wheat they would say that we took the "worst land off the farmers' hands, paid the "top prices in all the foreign markets, took "over the slowest and least suitable ships, and "miscalculated the amounts required for "storage and distribution. This is what they "would say, and what is worse, and still more "strictly between ourselves, it is possible that "they would be partly right. So on the whole "we think it will save us trouble and the nation "loss if we leave it to you to manage, and let "you have 40 per cent of your increased "profit." All this is cold comfort, it may be said, to the wage-earner. But, to begin with, it is a good deal simpler for him to press for direct relief from taxation on sugar and tea than to seek to get reductions indirectly by persuading the State to run production at a loss. Beyond this, he will do well to insist on a minimum wage for the lowest-paid grades, and especially for the woman worker.

Manchester Guardian.

5.8.16.

662.

662/18

WORKING-CLASS BUDGET.

SPENDING VALUE OF THE SOVEREIGN.

LABOUR PARTY ACTION.

The replies made by Mr. Acland and Mr. Pretyman in the House of Commons on Wednesday to criticisms on food prices and the general attitude of the Government towards them are not considered satisfactory by leaders of the Labour party in Manchester. Over the signatures of Councillor W. Mellor, representing the Manchester and Salford Trades Council, and of Councillor W. T. Jackson, representing the local Labour party, a circular has just been issued drawing attention to the formation of a Workers' Joint Committee, comprising delegates from the Trades Council, the Gorton Trades Council, the Engineering and Shipbuilding Trades Federation, the Building Trades Federation, the Women's Trades Council, the Women's Trades Union Council, the Labour party, the I.L.P. Federation, the co-operative guilds, and other organisations, and stating that the first conference to be promoted by this committee will be upon "The rise of food and coal prices." It will be held in the Co-operative Hall, Downing Street, on Saturday afternoon, September 16. Mr. J. E. Sutton, M.P., will preside, and, among other speakers, Mr. J. R. Clynes, M.P., will deal with food prices and Mr. Stephen Walsh, M.P., with coal prices.

The circular contains some interesting figures of the standard working-class budget compiled by the Board of Trade in 1904, and the advances in the prices of food since the outbreak of war. The standard budget was based on 1,944 family budgets collected by means of a Board of Trade inquiry in 1904. The average weekly income of those families was 36s. 10d., and the total expenditure on food was 22s. 6d., or 61 per cent of the income. By July, 1914, the cost of the food had risen to 25s. a week, by the end of that year to 29s. 9d., six months later to 33s. 9d., by the end of last year to 37s., and by the beginning of last month to 41s. 3d. Another statistical illustration shows that the purchasing power of a sovereign spent on food had fallen to 16s. 10d. by the end of 1914, to 14s. 10d. by the end of the following June, to 13s. 6d. by the end of last year, and to 12s. 1d. by July 1.

Government Control.

In conversation with a representative of the "Manchester Guardian" yesterday, Councillor W. Mellor said the view of the Trades Council from the beginning of the war was that the prices of all necessaries should be controlled by the Government and that no other method was likely to be successful. They were hoping to follow up the coming conference on food and coal prices by approaching all the local members of Parliament to bring pressure to bear in the House of Commons. The workers were not asking for anything that was impossible or impracticable. It was quite possible that there had been a natural rise in prices which could not have been prevented, but they were convinced that much of the advance could have been prevented. The immense profits of shipowners were a case in point. The workers did not wish to deprive anybody of a reasonable profit, but they thought that at a time when so much life was being sacrificed for the welfare of the community no section of the community should be allowed to pile up fortunes out of that sacrifice. To take 60 per cent of excess profits was not the proper way of dealing with the matter, when there were firms making profits of 100 to 150 per cent, and much more. There should be a maximum percentage fixed in all cases, as in the case of controlled munition works.

The advice given to the workers to meet the situation by demanding more wages, Mr. Mellor said, was about as impracticable as anything that could be suggested. Many employers were not in a position to increase wages. If the workers acted upon it the problem of living at such a time as this would be made more acute. The price of food had increased by 70 to 80 per cent. What industry would allow of wages being increased to that extent?

Councillor Jack, who represents one of

The Council.

25.8.16.

DUNDEE COUNCILLOR CLAIMS

THAT NEGLIGENT FATHERS SHOULD BE MADE TO WORK

TO SUPPORT THEIR CHILDREN.

Dundee is shortly to embark upon a scheme for infant and child welfare.

The Public Health Committee met yesterday, when the outlines of the scheme were approved. An interesting discussion took place, the question being raised as to the responsibility of the parents in regard to the support of the children. Mr S. G. Fraser, the convener, presided.

Mr Fraser pointed out that the scheme as outlined in the report was practically what was approved of by the Town Council, and he formally moved that they adopt the scheme.

Mr A. W. Paton, in seconding, said the scheme was a thorough and practical one. The suggestions put forward were efficient as far as they went. With the new proposals it would be possible to have supervision that would be conducive to the saving of child life at the most important time. It was an important step towards dealing with a very serious and difficult problem in our midst. He suggested that at the end of the first year of the scheme Dr Templeman should submit a special report on the work with the view of extending the scheme on the lines experience taught them were the best.

Labour Colony for Fathers.

Mr Alexander Spence said all the memoranda from the Local Government Board were pretty much on the same lines. They did not take into account the responsibilities of the parents, and especially the fathers of the children. He asked if there was not some means whereby the fathers could be made to support the children. All this ameliorative work only tended, in his opinion, to encourage that sort of thing. Of course, that was no reason why the children should suffer, but at the same time they knew that in Dundee there was a very considerable number of men who never worked and who never intended to work, and whose wives had to go out and work for them. These men ought to be compelled to work and support their children. Mr Spence suggested that if they did not work in civil employment there should be some labour colony to which they could be sent, and the proceeds of their labour forwarded to support their children. He considered that this was a subject which the might approach the Government upon, an endeavour to get legislation whereby thes men would be bound to bring up their famil in some way.

Mothers at Work.

Mr P. J. Fletcher contended that mother were being allowed to work in the factories a a dangerous period, and said that the Factor Act was being evaded. That was aggravating the situation.

The Convener pointed out that Dr Templeman was not aware of any infringement o the Factory Act. Mr Fletcher said he wa prepared to prove that that was so.

He likewise held that the number of day nurseries in Dundee was not sufficient. I they could not go the length of having day nurseries these institutions could at least b subsidised by the Corporation.

An Appeal.

Referring to the premises for the staff, he said that the place in Victoria Road was the best so far, but he felt that they would require something even larger. His opinion was that unless they received some strong voluntary assistance the scheme would not be a thorough success. It had been suggested that they might secure a villa where there would be rather more accommodation, and he hinted that some public-spirited individual might assist in that way.

Mr A. B. Crichton was quite in sympathy with the scheme, and he had no doubt that as time went on they would have to go still further. The municipality was doing all the work, but they were asking nothing from the fathers. Was there no way that they could clinch the matter by seeing that the fathers contributed towards the cost where they were able? The liability of the public health department was increasing by leaps and bounds. They could not help that, but where they had a claim surely they could enforce it.

Mr Fraser said the doctor would keep that in mind.

Dr Templeman said they got half the cost from the Government, and one of the conditions was that the local authority should do the work at their own expense.

"Kettle-Boilers."

Mr Paton said that it was not to be put forward that this was only a provision for the wives of what he might term "kettle-boilers." There was unfortunately a certain —though a limited—class in Dundee of that kind, but there was also a large number of fathers and mothers who, though doing their very best, still required help.

Furthermore, they would see the State take a firmer hand in this matter, and probable they would be able to "tone up" the employers to do their duty so far as the economic side was concerned.

Mr E. Symmonds pointed out that the discussion was upon the lines of a suggestion by him and approved by the sub-committee by this committee will be upon "The rise of food and coal prices." It will be held in the Co-operative Hall, Downing Street, on Saturday afternoon, September 16. Mr. J. E. Sutton, M.P., will preside, and, among other speakers, Mr. J. R. Clynes, M.P., will deal with food prices and Mr. Stephen Walsh, M.P., with coal prices.

The circular contains some interesting figures of the standard working-class budget compiled by the Board of Trade in 1904, and the advances in the prices of food since the outbreak of war. The standard budget was based on 1,944 family budgets collected by means of a Board of Trade inquiry in 1904. The average weekly income of those families was 36s. 10d., and the total expenditure on food was 22s. 6d., or 61 per cent of the income. By July, 1914, the cost of the food had risen to 25s. a week, by the end of that year to 29s. 9d., six months later to 33s. 9d., by the end of last year to 37s., and by the beginning of last month to 41s. 3d. Another statistical illustration shows that the purchasing power of a sovereign spent on food had fallen to 16s. 10d. by the end of 1914, to 14s. 10d. by the end of the following June, to 13s. 6d. by the end of last year, and to 12s. 1d. by July 1.

Government Control.

In conversation with a representative of the "Manchester Guardian" yesterday, Councillor W. Mellor said the view of the Trades Council from the beginning of the war was that the prices of all necessaries should be controlled by the Government and that no other method was likely to be successful. They were hoping to follow up the coming conference on food and coal prices by approaching all the local members of Parliament to bring pressure to bear in the House of Commons. The workers were not asking for anything that was impossible or impracticable. It was quite possible that there had been a natural rise in prices which could not have been prevented, but they were convinced that much of the advance could have been prevented. The immense profits of shipowners were a case in point. The workers did not wish to deprive anybody of a reasonable profit, but they thought that at a time when so much life was being sacrificed for the welfare of the community no section of the community should be allowed to pile up fortunes out of that sacrifice. To take 60 per cent of excess profits was not the proper way of dealing with the matter, when there were firms making profits of 400 to 150 per cent, and much more. There should be a maximum percentage fixed in all cases, as in the case of controlled munition works.

The advice given to the workers to meet the situation by demanding more wages, Mr. Mellor said, was about as impracticable as anything that could be suggested. Many employers were not in a position to increase wages. If the workers acted upon it the problem of living at such a time as this would be made more acute. The price of food had increased by 70 to 80 per cent. What industry would allow of wages being increased to that extent?

Councillor Tom Fox, who represents one of the largest organisations of unskilled labour, said that the prices of food and other necessaries had risen so enormously as to call for a Government inquiry, at which the people responsible for the advances should be made to justify them or submit to compulsory reductions.

Is there a Corner?

There was a widespread belief among the people he represented, Mr. Fox said, that a good deal of food was being cornered by speculators, and this seemed to be borne out by the statements of Mr. John Pearce at Salisbury House, London, on Wednesday. The price of milk had been raised far beyond anything justifiable, and miners' leaders assured the country that the Government was not justified in allowing another 2s. 6d. a ton being put on the price of coal. Whereas the prices of food had increased by fully 70 per cent, no class of unskilled workers in the Manchester district had obtained advances in wages amounting to 30 per cent; and as most of them were living to the fullest extent of their income before the war, with no margin for anything beyond the barest necessaries of life, it followed that to-day they were in a worse position. Many of the families of the unskilled could only live by obtaining supplies on credit for which they had to pay an extra 10 to 20 per cent; and in all cases they had to pay more through buying in small quantities.

Mr Alexander Spence said all the memoranda from the Local Government Board were pretty much on the same lines. They did not take into account the responsibilities of the parents, and especially the fathers of the children. He asked if there was not some means whereby the fathers could be made to support the children. All this ameliorative work only tended, in his opinion, to encourage that sort of thing. Of course, that was no reason why the children should suffer, but at the same time they knew that in Dundee there was a very considerable number of men who never worked and who never intended to work, and whose wives had to go out and work for them. These men ought to be compelled to work and support their children. Mr Spence suggested that if they did not work in civil employment there should be some labour colony to which they could be sent, and the proceeds of their labour forwarded to support their children. He considered that this was a subject which the might approach the Government upon, an endeavour to get legislation whereby thes men would be bound to bring up their famil in some way.

Mothers at Work.

Mr P. J. Fletcher contended that mother were being allowed to work in the factories a a dangerous period, and said that the Factor Act was being evaded. That was aggravatin the situation.

The Convener pointed out that Dr Templeman was not aware of any infringement o the Factory Act. Mr Fletcher said he wa prepared to prove that that was so.

He likewise held that the number of day nurseries in Dundee was not sufficient. I they could not go the length of having day nurseries these institutions could at least be subsidised by the Corporation.

An Appeal.

Referring to the premises for the staff, he said that the place in Victoria Road was the best so far, but he felt that they would require something even larger. His opinion was that unless they received some strong voluntary assistance the scheme would not be a thorough success. It had been suggested that they might secure a villa where there would be rather more accommodation, and he hinted that some public-spirited individual might assist in that way.

Mr A. B. Crichton was quite in sympathy with the scheme, and he had no doubt that as time went on they would have to go still further. The municipality was doing all the work, but they were asking nothing from the fathers. Was there no way that they could clinch the matter by seeing that the fathers contributed towards the cost where they were able? The liability of the public health department was increasing by leaps and bounds. They could not help that, but where they had a claim surely they could enforce it.

Mr Fraser said the doctor would keep that in mind.

Dr Templeman said they got half the cost from the Government, and one of the conditions was that the local authority should do the work at their own expense.

"Kettle-Boilers."

Mr Paton said that it was not to be put forward that this was only a provision for the wives of what he might term "kettle-boilers." There was unfortunately a certain —though a limited—class in Dundee of that kind, but there was also a large number of fathers and mothers who, though doing their very best, still required help.

Furthermore, they would see the State take a firmer hand in this matter, and probably they would be able to "tune up" the employers to do their duty so far as the economic side was concerned.

Mr E. Scrymgeour pointed out that the discussion was upon the lines of a suggestion by him and approved by the sub-committee, but which had been deleted by the Town Council.

Bailie Barnes threw out the suggestion that an effort should be made to have the meal hours in factories and schools synchronise, so that the mothers could be at home to attend to the children at their meals.

The committee unanimously approved of the scheme.

The Convener stated that the Council had agreed to advertise for a lady doctor at £300, but they had been informed that the Trade Union of the medical profession had decided that no one who was in their Association would be allowed to take a position of this kind under £350.

Mr Paton—I think we should get one outside the Union.

Mr J. B. Archer fancied there were just as good doctors outside the Association as in it.

Mr Paton moved that they advertise for a doctor at £300 and see what results they would get. They were not to be coerced in that way.

This proposal was also agreed to.

The Co-Operative News. Aug 19, 1916. 682.

682/19

COST OF LIVING.

WHAT RECENT INCREASES IN FOOD PRICES MEAN TO THE WORKING CLASSES.

RESULTS OF THE WOMEN'S GUILD INQUIRY.

The Women's Co-operative Guild recently made an inquiry into the effect on consumption of the present high prices, and embodied the results obtained in an interesting and important report. We were privileged to give a portion of the report in our last issue, and now have pleasure in publishing the remainder.

A further effect of the high prices is the interference with the children's education owing both to their being taken away from school as early as possible, and to their being employed before and after school. One woman writes: "My girl, who is a very clever girl and one we were looking forward to making something of, has had to leave school, and, therefore, she has to be the sufferer." There are several instances of boys of 12 and 13 being employed in the delivery of milk and papers before and after school. A Guild member writes: "Families generally are managing by the women or children earning a little by fruit picking, hoeing or haymaking. Children are up as early as 4 or 5 a.m., and they are receiving ½d. for every pound of strawberries picked. Some of the children have earned from 2d. to 6d. before going to school. Hoeing and haymaking are paid at the rate of 3d. an hour, in rare cases 4d."

"A mother with a child of six weeks old has to provide for a family of eight on a wage of £1 9s. She does not know how she really manages, but they live and manage from day to day. She dare not think of next week. There is only a bit of meat for the Sunday's dinner except for the husband. Sugar they go without. She goes without clothes herself, and very often without food. She only hopes she holds on to be able to start work herself as soon as she is strong enough. She is a delicate woman, and no wonder."

"A woman with seven children has a baby a month old, and a woman who attended her at her confinement says: 'They have practically lived on barley and bread and margarine during the last month.'"

Co-operation and Prices.

The advantage of the co-operative movement over ordinary industrial methods is seen in the following examples of the way in which co-operative prices have been kept down.

In the first week of the war, most co-operative societies refused, as far as possible, to raise their prices, limiting supplies to individuals instead.

The Co-operative Wholesale Society has kept the price of the biscuits it manufactures practically unchanged since the beginning of the war. The price of the soap it manufactures has been advanced twice owing to the scarcity of the materials, but is still £2 to £4 a ton cheaper than the similar make of soap of other manufacturers.

Woolwich and Stratford (London) are both selling milk at 5d. a quart.

Gillingham (Kent) Society delayed for some time the rise in the price of bread; was selling coal on July 10th "shillings less than any other trader"; and joined with Rochester and Chatham Societies in refusing to raise the price of milk though asked to do so by the local vendors, so that the Dairymen's Association was unable to raise the price to 6d., as it had intended on June 1st, and the traders' price has remained at 5d. for the area covered by the societies.

Failsworth Society sells sugar at ¼d. per lb. less than the controlled price.

Wellingborough Society has sold bread at 7½d. the 4lb. loaf, though approached by the local traders to put it up.

It should further be remembered that, even if co-operative prices are the same as those of other traders, the surplus on trade transactions does not go to the capitalist as profit, but is returned to the consumer.

The reason that co-operative societies cannot do more to regulate prices is that at present their control of sources of supply is so small.

Recommendations.

While recognising that, as long as the war lasts, conditions adversely affecting prices must result, and that comparatively little can be done to check the rise in prices, we consider that a portion of this rise is due to (a) food taxation, and (b) monopolies and profit-making. In connection with these two causes it is possible for the Government to act in ways which would at once take effect. It is, therefore, most important that such action should be taken.

(a) In view of the widespread and serious reduction in consumption amongst the workers, we would urge that all taxation on food, i.e., sugar, tea, cocoa, coffee, dried fruits, should be at once removed. Food taxation has no relation to capacity to pay, and falls most heavily on large working-class families. The effect of rising prices is to increase the profits of capitalists while decreasing the real wages of the workers. We hold that a sound system of taxation should avoid all forms of taxation which would fall on those whose incomes are barely adequate for maintaining health and efficiency. The following resolution, passed at its annual Congress, June, 1916, represents the opinion of the Guild on taxation:

This Congress urges co-operators to institute a national campaign in order to secure the adoption of a just and reasonable system of taxation which shall remove all taxes from food and necessaries, and confine taxation to land, monopolies, and unproductive wealth.

(b) The profit-making system of industry makes it to the interest of small bodies of capitalists to keep up prices, and war gives them unusual opportunities of which they have not been slow to take advantage. Under our co-operative system in which the consumers supply themselves, no profits are made, and there is, therefore, no possibility of exploiting the consumer for the benefit of the profit-maker.

We, therefore, desire to see a national application of the co-operative principle as the only method by which rings and excessive profit-making can be prevented. We urge that the State, as representing the consumers, should step in on their behalf and take over the importation and home supplies of meat, wheat, milk, and coal, and regulate their distribution, making use of co-operative societies and municipalities as their agents.

The case for taking over the milk and coal supplies is particularly strong. Apart from bread, milk and coal are the most necessary articles of consumption, and being entirely within our own borders, are not subject to the same difficulties as occur in controlling an imported food like sugar.

The regulation of distribution is essential, in order to secure a sufficiency of necessaries to the workers. Abundance of bread and sugar is of much less importance to the rich, because a greater range of foods is within their reach, yet the regulation of consumption by means of high prices gives the rich the first chance of securing supplies. What is needed, for example, is the allocation of a proportionately larger supply to co-operative societies which deal with industrial workers, than to traders in well-to-do districts.

The amount of sugar for household use and for preserving should be increased, and none allowed for the manufacture of beer till these needs are supplied.

We would urge that the necessity for keeping up the efficiency of the civilian population should be borne in mind in allocating the distribution of all goods—meat, leather, wool, &c.—commandeered by the Government, and that stringent measures should be taken to prevent waste in the use of the Army supplies.

We realise that, as long as war conditions last, these suggested remedies for high prices can only go a small way in preventing the present serious lowering of the standard of life. We, therefore, consider that all embargoes on increases of wages should be removed. We would point out that the increases in the rates of wages have followed and not preceded the rise in prices. Naval and military pensions and allowances and old-age pensions, which were fixed when prices were much lower, should be increased.

Provision for Maternity.

In face of the difficulty of controlling prices, it is imperative to endeavour at once to protect maternity and child life from the evil results of privation due to high prices. To do so, it should be made obligatory on local authorities to provide dinners and milk for all expectant and nursing mothers and young children. Such food should be supplied on the recommendation of a municipal health officer or of a doctor. The Government Grant should be made in respect of the provision of dinners and milk as well as of the hitherto authorised maternity work, and Maternity Committees (under the Public Health Committee), with an adequate representation of working women's organisations, should be made compulsory.

C.W.S. PELAW SANDWICH CAKE FLOUR. In 2d. packets.

Aberdeen Daily Journal

24.8.16.

662.

662/20

REDUCED STANDARD OF LIVING.

COMMON FOODS AS LUXURIES

The experiences of workers among the poor and of trade union officials can be added to the evidence collected by the Women's Co-operative Guild to show that where the family income has not risen proportionately to the rise in the cost of food the standard of living has been seriously reduced. "It is a common fallacy," a social worker in Lodon said, "that although food prices are high the working classes are earning so much money that they can easily pay what they are asked by grocers and butchers and other shopkeepers. This is really quite wrong. Large numbers of war workers are earning high wages, but while there is less than usual of the absolute want which comes through unemployment, many types of workers, particularly women, have little or no more money than they received before the war, and they are having a hard time. Meat once a week is a luxury, and the income of the home is often insufficient to buy bread and vegetables enough to satisfy healthy appetites."

Miss Sloan, of the National Federation of Women Workers, said that among women who were engaged in the ordinary trades of the country the standard of life had been lowered very considerably. Going about the country she found that where the family income remained small the abnormal food prices had made it necessary that meat should not be bought during the week, and people were living very largely on tea, sugar, bread, margarine, and vegetables. Ham ends and bacon rind are bought to flavour soups made with beans and peas. Most families buy a piece of meat for the Sunday dinner, but as even frozen mutton and imported beef are now so dear the quantity purchased is not sufficient to form the basis of a second meal. The Federation had compared grocery books of the month before the outbreak of war with those of recent months and had found that all the things that might rank as luxuries, such as cheese, sardines, and articles of that kind, had been cut off. Tea was drunk without milk, but women clung to sugar, which was a stimulant to them. The inability to buy milk was greatly to be regretted, as it told heavily on the children.

Typical Meals.

A typical day's meals of a woman factory worker, Miss Sloan said, consisted of tea, bread and margarine for breakfast; vegetable soup and potatoes, with perhaps a small piece of bacon, and a cup of tea for dinner; and tea, bread and margarine again for tea and supper. Even among women munition workers wages were not high. A pound a week was a common wage, and £1 now was worth only 12s 6d, which was far from sufficient to maintain a satisfactory standard of life. Good and sufficient food was essential to efficiency, and for the national welfare it ought to be made possible for all workers to get the nourishment they required.

Inquiries in other quarters suggested that many women whose duties require that they shall wear neat and becoming clothes have to stint themselves of food because of the prevailing high prices.

As Government influence has been exerted to induce workers not to press for increases of wages, the Executive Committee of the National Amalgamated Union of Shop Assistants, Warehousemen, and Clerks has written to the President of the Board of Trade, urging the necessity of taking adequate steps to control prices with the object of securing reduction in the cost of living.

In a letter to each member of the Cabinet conveying a resolution passed at a Liverpool demonstration protesting against the Government's inaction "in refusing to control the exploiters of the people's food and household commodities," Mr F. Fitzpatrick, joint secretary of the Liverpool Trades Council, says "I would that words of mine could convey to the members of his Majesty's Government the intense feeling that exists amongst the working classes upon the present price of foodstuffs." The demonstration was held under the auspices of the Trades Council, Transport Workers' Federation, National Union of Railwaymen, Federation of Engineering, and Shipbuilding Trades, and the Liverpool Labour Representation Committee.

Manchester Guardian.
26.8.16.

662

THE PRICE OF FOOD.

VIEWS OF THE ORGANISED WOMEN.

As mentioned in these columns yesterday, the Labour Conference on food and coal prices, to be held in Manchester on September 16, is to be as representative of women's organisations as of men's. The two Women's Trade Councils and the Women's Co-operative Guilds are represented on the organising Workers' Joint Committee; each trade union of women is invited to send delegates, and as the subject of discussion is one that affects every household so closely at the present time the leaders of the women are making a special effort to secure a good representation at the conference. Apart from participating in the work of the Joint Committee, the women's organisations—as far as a representative of the "Manchester Guardian" was able to learn by inquiries yesterday—have taken no action in the direction of urging the Government to control the prices of household necessaries.

Mrs. Annot Robinson, of the Women's War Interests Committee, who for many months past has been working in the Ancoats, Ardwick, and Openshaw districts of the city, said that the high prices of food were being so much felt there that a continually increasing number of young married women, especially the wives of soldiers, were going out to work instead of staying at home. In numerous cases the children had to be placed under the charge of old or defective women, who were unable to look after them properly, and while the mothers were away their food consisted largely of bread and margarine. During the last few weeks, with the schools closed, there had been much "running wild" about the streets.

"You do not need to draw up a budget to-day," Mrs. Robinson continued, "to prove that a young married woman, with two children cannot live on 21s. a week. It is too well known that the purchasing power of 21s. is now no more than 13s. or 14s. Next to the soldiers' wives who are receiving no allowances from their husbands' former employers—and there are many of them—the families suffering most seem to be those of the small-paid clerks. The price of clothes and boots are going up as well as those of food.

Women's Wages.

"The idea that anybody can get work at good wages to-day is only held," Mrs. Robinson said, "by people without experience. The Labour Exchanges have large numbers of women on their lists, and there are many works where married women cannot obtain any employment. All these things call for serious action on the part of the Government."

A similar opinion was expressed by Miss Mary Quaile, organising secretary of the Manchester Salford, and District Women's Trades Union Council, who also advocated a more generous allowance by the Government to the dependents of soldiers, especially to those families where several sons had joined the forces and army allowances were only made in respect of one. The food problem, Miss Quaile said, had not been treated by the Government as a national one. There was a widespread belief in some classes that the increase in the wages of women workers balanced the incerased prices of food, clothing, and coal. This had its foundation in the earnings of a comparatively few exceptionally clever women working at piece rates in some munition works. People had said that some of these women were earning from £5 to £8 a week, but her own investigations in Manchester had not revealed any cases of women in engineering works earning £2 a week. Generally women were not getting more than 4s. a week, including the war bonus, more than they earned before the war, and in some cases this had only been secured after much effort.

Morning Advertiser. 662
7.10.16

662/21

At a meeting of the bookbinding section of the London Chamber of Commerce, the minimum wages of women, both time and piecework, were increased by 10 per cent., and the higher rates will be paid as from next week. The bookbinding section is the representative body, so far as labour questions are concerned, of letterpress bookbinders in the London district, throughout the whole of which the recent decision will apply.

Hull Daily News
14.10.16

LABOUR PROTEST

Trades Council and Food Question.

MR ANDERSON, M.P'S VIEWS

Meeting at the Alexandra Theatre.

A protest against the high prices of food was made at a meeting convened by the Hull Trades and Labour Council and held at the Alexandra Theatre yesterday afternoon. Mr W. C. Anderson, M.P., a member of the Food Prices Committee, was the chief speaker. His wife, still better known as Miss Mary M'Arthur, had also been announced as a speaker, but she was unable to attend. Mr W. Duggaby, the president of the Trades Council, was in the chair, and he was supported by a number of the principal members of that body.

The Chairman remarked that it was well known that there had been some opposition to the holding of that meeting, but he explained that the difference of opinion was simply on a question of policy and not one of principle.

Referring to the sale of the Wilson Line, the Chairman observed that it may or may not affect them locally—(there certainly was local sentiment in it)—but taking it from the national standpoint there was not much to be surprised at. It was a step in the natural course of industry that had been going on, not only during the war, but many years previous to the war.

Mr Fred Potter moved:

That this mass meeting of citizens of Hull and trade unionists generally emphatically protests against the inaction of the Government on the food question. We fully recognise that the present inflated prices are largely due to the profiteers, who are taking advantage of the national crisis to exploit the people of this country. We protest on behalf of the wives and children of our comrades fighting with His Majesty's forces, whose allowances were fixed when prices were normal; also on behalf of the old-age pensioners, whose pittances have been more than halved by the greed of a section of the community. We desire it to be known we are willing to risk all our industrial grievances in the time of national stress. We, therefore, call upon the Government not to allow this callous robbery to continue.

DUTY OF THE GOVERNMENT.

He chided the labour movement and the community generally upon the lack of intelligence which they had displayed in that important matter, and asserted that the labour movement ought to have declared that every article and commodity essential for the welfare of the civil community and the continuance of the war to a successful issue, should have been taken over by the Government; otherwise they ought to have declared a general strike.

Mr F. Sanderson, the president of the Transport Workers' Federation, in seconding expressed regret that the meeting was not more largely attended. Declaring himself to be a "direct actionist," the speaker said that protest meetings did no good unless backed up by a threat. As a real patriot, he said that in the event of them not getting decency of conditions they should declare not only a sectional, but a national strike.

FIRM ACTION NEEDED.

Mr W. C. Anderson said that he did not think it was at all a bad thing to hold a protest meeting. The reason so little had been done on the matter was because so few protest meetings had been held, and the working people had borne the thing so cheerfully for the past two years. In his opinion, Parliament would be driven to act before the coming winter, as the matter was getting more serious and they had not reached the end of high prices yet. Prices would rise steadily unless very firm action was taken by the Government.

If the Government did not take strong action to control food prices there would be, in all directions, movements for increases in wages to meet the increased cost of living. They heard a great deal about the equality of sacrifice, but it did not exist. What equality of sacrifice was there between the soldier lads at the front enduring the sweat and the agony and the horror of trenches for a shilling or two a day, and the traders who were using the war in order to enrich themselves at the public expense? Having pointed out that the purchasing power of a sovereign had shrunk to 12s the hon. member said that he heard members of Parliament speak as if every working man when he went home on a Friday night was hardly able to carry the wages he had earned. The fact was that there was not one industry in this country to-day where the wages, as wages, had gone up in anything like proportion to the rise in the cost of living. The really big earnings were obtained in the munition works by men working long hours of overtime and giving large drafts on their physical strength; giving away slices of their constitution, but since a workman's only capital was his strength, what happened to any of them when that strength failed and the man was broken down?

PROFITEERS AND THE PEOPLE.

There were any number of workers whose standard of living had been lowered by the increased cost of living. The cost of living in this country to-day was as high as it was in America, but the average wage here was nothing like as high as it was in America; and if they went down and down until at last they reached the old-age pensioner, they began to see how much hardship was being imposed. He did not want to see the working people emulating some of the profiteers and trying to wring the last shilling out of the country's crisis, but he did want to see the same rule that was applied to the people applied to the shipowners and food monopolists.

Commercialism had, he said, feathered its nest at the expense of the masses of the people, and he knew of no remedy apart from public control carried to the fullest possible extent. Unless the nation had the power to break the power of the food monopolists and supply the things needed at a legitimate price, he saw no remedy at all for the present state of affairs. The Government would do it in a week if military reasons were involved in the matter. The Government had commandeered ships to carry soldiers and the things the soldiers required, and he claimed that the soldiers of industry should be looked after as well. One objection raised was that very large part of our food supplies came from other countries, but there was all the difference in the world between good buying and bad buying in neutral markets, and there had been a great deal of bad buying going on since the beginning of the war. What he said was that on the neutral markets there ought to be one buyer, and that buyer ought to be the nation. Further, he ought to be empowered to buy for all the Allied Governments, and thus eliminate competition amongst them. Further, the British farmer ought not to be allowed to charge just as he chose for the thing he produces. Concluding, Mr Anderson reminded those who remained to carry on the necessary work at home that they also had got frontiers to guard.

A vote of thanks to Mr Anderson, the chairman, and the proprietors of the theatre was accorded, on the motion of Councillor F. W. Booth, seconded by Mr Lancaster.

The Local Government Journal
9.- 9- 16

662/22 662

FRAUD AND DISHONESTY INSURANCE.

THE POLICY FOR LOCAL AUTHORITIES.

NO forms from officials.
vexatious enquiries.
notice of changes in the staff.
trouble.

Retrospective cover during the whole period the Policy is in force.

Rebate on renewal for every year without a claim.

Further information will be given on application to

THE GRESHAM FIRE AND ACCIDENT INSURANCE SOCIETY, Ltd.,

St. Mildred's House, Poultry, London, E.C.

. . THE . .

Local Government Journal.

Telegraphic Address:—"Localmente, London."
Telephone: Holborn 1999.
Address: 7, CHICHESTER HOUSE, CHANCERY LANE, LONDON, W.C.

SEPTEMER 9, 1916.

Incidents of the Week.

NEED OF A FULL OUTLOOK ON SALARIES.

The determined attitude of the Manchester City Council in regard to the allowances, as they are termed, which may be made under the Emergency Provisions Act ought in the end to produce good results. It becomes increasingly evident that the rate of salary or wages which was the rule when the Act was passed is insufficient to meet the needs of a household to-day and it is a good thing to be able to record this week several instances of addition to the war bonuses which were already voted to officials and employees who have remained in the service of the councils. This being the case the other claims are strengthened by comparison. The Medical Officer of Health of the Woolwich Council, in a pertinent passage of his annual report, which has just been published, making reference to the need of maintaining our national ability in the highest degree, says: "With better financial conditions, many of the homes I almost despaired of have become improved almost beyond belief, which goes to prove very emphatically that if we want to eliminate the slum type of human being and the slum type of home, the surest and quickest way is to give the workman a good living wage. It is only natural that wives and mothers get tired of struggling against a tide of difficulties which every day threatens to engulf them. One endless struggle of boot-buying and repairing, clothes wanted, rent and coal to be paid for, the pawnbroker in possession of the bedding and spare clothing. With more wages coming in, all these difficulties disappear as if by magic, and the housewife begins to buy comforts for her family and home which never could have been afforded before. She gradually improves in health and spirits and is anxious to make her surroundings correspond with her own improvement." No place in the Kingdom has lately afforded better scope for the observation of this than Woolwich. And the standpoint from which to observe it is not only that of "the slums" important as they may be in the whole scheme of social affairs. It is relative in its degree to all the ordinary classes of society for the claims of civilised life connect themselves increasingly with the adequacy of financial arrangements. We all know by frequent telling that the sovereign of two years ago is now worth to the householder only twelve-and-sixpence. What we do not remind ourselves of so frequently is that the reasonable requirements of to-day represent twenty-five shillings to the sovereign of ten or twenty years back even if prices were the same now as then. It is not a case of added luxury but of the differences in living caused by the increase of popu-

and the development of useful living conditions from every point of view. But this seems not to have affected the conference greatly. Its various sections were almost remote from the affairs which link themselves to progressive action as regards physical and mental affairs attached to the present and the near future generation, and however interesting as an intellectual exercise they were we can find little that is really helpful in them. Perhaps exception to this must be noted in the case of continuing employment for women "after the war," a matter which will not lose in importance in local administration. The Economic Science and Statistics Section had before it a report prepared by a committee which was formed to investigate the replacement of male by female labour in consequence of the war. The committee, noting the marked development of the demand for female labour, reported that last July over half-a-million women had replaced men who had left their occupations for more urgent national service. The women who had taken the men's places had for the most part previous industrial experience. Many were transferred from other occupations. Besides the employment of women on tramways and railways, in banks, and as postal servants, replacement had occurred through the whole of industry. Few women were to be found taking the place of highly skilled men; but large numbers had released the unskilled and those termed, in engineering, "semi-skilled." But when the work of the men involved a degree of skill and experience which women seldom possess new machinery of a more automatic kind had been introduced, sometimes to such an extent as almost to transform an industry, and sub-division of processes had changed highly skilled work into a series of repetition operations which could be accomplished by relatively untrained workers. "The success of the women on these repetition processes is marked," the report stated. "They learn quickly; they are good timekeepers; they have, so far at least, stood the strain of long hours extremely well, and their manual dexterity enables them to achieve good results in the way of output on repetitive processes. On work demanding greater judgment and adaptability the evidence of their success is not so great; but their industrial training has been short.

A Point with Women Employment.

The fact that not a great proportion of the women war workers were previously occupied suggests that after the war the problem of a large surplus of women may not be so serious as has been feared. The married women are for the most part in industry only for the period of the war; and inquiry among women workers generally shows that many of them have no desire to remain in competition with men." This, of course, will be proved in the future, but it seems probable that in a number of local administrative departments women will continue to be engaged, the more so as much employment will be found for men in connection with the works that are forming the subject of the Register asked for by the Local Government Board. Reports from a number of council meetings show that this is in course of preparation. It is evident that there will be wide scope for the energies of the councils as in all these employments, and notably that of women, the question of public health will come in and this is a matter that is bound to be in the hands mainly of the local health authorities. It is, too, one of the public affairs that the Local Government Board is most active in. The Trades Union Congress was most interested in the future of labour conditions (after the war), a subject which is largely out of our scope here, but yet one that will present itself in various ways to the councils. With the development of municipal trading or industries, the public through their local representatives will increasingly blame employers, and the settlement of conditions of employment almost from the top to the bottom should have great influence on conditions generally. The attitude adopted by local public bodies towards such measures as the Emergency Provisions Act is, therefore, one of considerable importance as regards any outlook on the future.

Public Authorities and the Price of Coal.

The deputation to the President of the Board of Trade on the price of coal comprised representatives of some of our largest municipal undertakings and although it was received privately enough transpired to show that the subject will most probably receive the attention it requires. The fact was pointed to at [illegible] of the British Association that the [illegible] the residuals from the gas works are in large demand, such as tar for road spraying or road making, and as the reports of Surveyors are almost invariably favourable to its use, we may look forward to the need of increased supplies not only for the requirements on the present highways, but on those great trunk roads which are now in contemplation. Evidently the question of the cost and supply of coal to the public is one of the matters that will be of prime concern to local public authorities. Fortunately, as regards official advice and experience, they are in good hands, as is shown by the success of the works already undertaken. Many manufacturers who use great quantities of electricity in power prefer to take their supplies from the public undertakings, and this seems to us to be a matter which will raise most interesting questions as regards industry when the public mind is able to turn more largely in the direction of home internal affairs. There is, too, the subject of supplies during winter to our smaller homes which has already been under consideration in London and others of the great cities. It is not wise to be looking ahead too far, but still there can be no harm in surmising that this will be discussed again. The deputation, therefore, presents us with a useful outlook in relation to future municipal activity.

The Campaign against Vermin.

The campaign against infective and infestant vermin and flies appears to have been very successful during this later part of the summer. Perhaps it has been aided by the weather, but the returns generally show that summer diseases have as yet been less prevalent than usual. It is usful also to know that the extermination of rats is proceeding with good effect, especially at the ports, and in this connection it may be noted that the fears have been dissipated of an outbreak of bubonic plague even on a small scale. The Medical Officer of Health for Bristol, in his report to the Public Health Committee, this week, stated that the whole contents of the rag factory in which bubonic plague broke out had been destroyed by fire. All the rats on the premises, of which eight were infected, were captured in nets and destroyed. No infected rats were found outside. No fresh human case of plague had occurred since August 10th, and the few patients previously reported had recovered, or nearly so. Hundreds of rats in the docks at Bristol had been examined, and no trace of the disease had been discovered. The authorities acted in co-operation with the Local Government Board's bacteriologist. None of the infected rags were imported. They came largely from other towns to which warnings had been sent. The stock of rags destroyed amounted to 201 tons 4 cwt. 3 qrs. Eight tons of disinfectants were sprayed on the bundles of rags, and a similar quantity about the premises, and two tons of lime were used for disinfecting the warehouses, offices, and stables. The number of rats caught was 74. The staff had special baths daily, and these numbered altogether 365. This is satisfactory as an illustration of the thoroughness with which the work was done and of the excellent character of our local health administration generally.

. . THE . .

Local Government Journal.

Telegraphic Address:—"Localmente, London."
Telephone: Holborn 1999.
Address: 7, CHICHESTER HOUSE, CHANCERY LANE, LONDON, W.C.

SEPTEMER 9, 1916.

Incidents of the Week.

NEED OF A FULL OUTLOOK ON SALARIES.

The determined attitude of the Manchester City Council in regard to the allowances, as they are termed, which may be made under the Emergency Provisions Act ought in the end to produce good results. It becomes increasingly evident that the rate of salary or wages which was the rule when the Act was passed is insufficient to meet the needs of a household to-day and it is a good thing to be able to record this week several instances of addition to the war bonuses which were already voted to officials and employees who have remained in the service of the councils. This being the case the other claims are strengthened by comparison. The Medical Officer of Health of the Woolwich Council, in a pertinent passage of his annual report, which has just been published, making reference to the need of maintaining our national ability in the highest degree, says: "With better financial conditions, many of the homes I almost despaired of have become improved almost beyond belief, which goes to prove very emphatically that if we want to eliminate the slum type of human being and the slum type of home, the surest and quickest way is to give the workman a good living wage. It is only natural that wives and mothers get tired of struggling against a tide of difficulties which every day threatens to engulf them. One endless struggle of boot-buying and repairing, clothes wanted, rent and coal to be paid for, the pawnbroker in possession of the bedding and spare clothing. With more wages coming in, all these difficulties disappear as if by magic, and the housewife begins to buy comforts for her family and home which never could have been afforded before. She gradually improves in health and spirits and is anxious to make her surroundings correspond with her own improvement." No place in the Kingdom has lately afforded better scope for the observation of this than Woolwich. And the standpoint from which to observe it is not only that of "the slums" important as they may be in the whole scheme of social affairs. It is relative in its degree to all the ordinary classes of society for the claims of civilised life connect themselves increasingly with the adequacy of financial arrangements. We all know by frequent telling that the sovereign of two years ago is now worth to the householder only twelve-and-sixpence. What we do not remind ourselves of so frequently is that the reasonable requirements of to-day represent twenty-five shillings to the sovereign of ten or twenty years back even if prices were the some now as then. It is not a case of added luxury but of the differences in living caused by the increase of population and other factors.

The Employment of Women.

It could have been thought that local government being what it is, and touching as it does almost every particle of life from infant care onwards, the two conferences which have been held this week, one of the British Association and the other of the Trade Unions would have dealt more fully with the broader aspects of practical and local affairs, particularly as the war and everything associated with it is so intensely practical. The discussions, however, have not been altogether helpful. "For the advancement of science," is part of the title of the British Association, and there can be nothing more important scientifically now than the connection between local administration banks, and as postal servants, replacement had occurred through the whole of industry. Few women were to be found taking the place of highly skilled men; but large numbers had released the unskilled and those termed, in engineering, "semi-skilled." But when the work of the men involved a degree of skill and experience which women seldom possess new machinery of a more automatic kind had been introduced, sometimes to such an extent as almost to transform an industry, and sub-division of processes had changed highly skilled work into a series of repetition operations which could be accomplished by relatively untrained workers. "The success of the women on these repetition processes is marked," the report stated. "They learn quickly; they are good timekeepers; they have, so far at least, stood the strain of long hours extremely well, and their manual dexterity enables them to achieve good results in the way of output on repetitive processes. On work demanding greater judgment and adaptability the evidence of their success is not so great; but their industrial training has been short.

A Point with Women Employment.

The fact that not a great proportion of the women war workers were previously occupied suggests that after the war the problem of a large surplus of women may not be so serious as has been feared. The married women are for the most part in industry only for the period of the war; and inquiry among women workers generally shows that many of them have no desire to remain in competition with men." This, of course, will be proved in the future, but it seems probable that in a number of local administrative departments women will continue to be engaged, the more so as much employment will be found for men in connection with the works that are forming the subject of the Register asked for by the Local Government Board. Reports from a number of council meetings show that this is in course of preparation. It is evident that there will be wide scope for the energies of the councils as in all these employments, and notably that of women, the question of public health will come in and this is a matter that is bound to be in the hands mainly of the local health authorities. It is, too, one of the public affairs that the Local Government Board is most active in. The Trades Union Congress was most interested in the future of labour conditions (after the war), a subject which is largely out of our scope here, but yet one that will present itself in various ways to the councils. With the development of municipal trading or industries, the public through their local representatives will increasingly blame employers, and the settlement of conditions of employment almost from the top to the bottom should have great influence on conditions generally. The attitude adopted by local public bodies towards such measures as the Emergency Provisions Act is, therefore, one of considerable importance as regards any outlook on the future.

Public Authorities and the Price of Coal.

The deputation to the President of the Board of Trade on the price of coal comprised representatives of some of our largest municipal undertakings and although it was received privately enough transpired to show that the subject will most probably receive the attention it requires. The fact was pointed to at the meeting of the British Association that the practical aim of the scientist should be to discover the most economic use to which a given coal seam can be put, coal being regarded not only as a fuel, but as the source of innumerable and some perhaps unsuspected materials of increasing importance in modern life; and this is a point to which inquiry has already been directed by some of our gas engineers. More largely than ever in the great towns are gas and electricity being brought into use for the purposes of the home as well as for manufacturers, and it will not have failed to be noted that even while the war is in progress extensions on a large scale are being made in several of the larger public electricity works while the demand for power has increased very greatly. This, again, should continue to be the case after the war. Then sents us with a useful outlook in relation to future municipal activity.

The Campaign against Vermin.

The campaign against infective and infestant vermin and flies appears to have been very successful during this later part of the summer. Perhaps it has been aided by the weather, but the returns generally show that summer diseases have as yet been less prevalent than usual. It is usful also to know that the extermination of rats is proceeding with good effect, especially at the ports, and in this connection it may be noted that the fears have been dissipated of an outbreak of bubonic plague even on a small scale. The Medical Officer of Health for Bristol, in his report to the Public Health Committee, this week, stated that the whole contents of the rag factory in which bubonic plague broke out had been destroyed by fire. All the rats on the premises, of which eight were infected, were captured in nets and destroyed. No infected rats were found outside. No fresh human case of plague had occurred since August 10th, and the few patients previously reported had recovered, or nearly so. Hundreds of rats in the docks at Bristol had been examined, and no trace of the disease had been discovered. The authorities acted in co-operation with the Local Government Board's bacteriologist. None of the infected rags were imported. They came largely from other towns to which warnings had been sent. The stock of rags destroyed amounted to 201 tons 4 cwt. 3 qrs. Eight tons of disinfectants were sprayed on the bundles of rags, and a similar quantity about the premises, and two tons of lime were used for disinfecting the warehouses, offices, and stables. The number of rats caught was 74. The staff had special baths daily, and these numbered altogether 365. This is satisfactory as an illustration of the thoroughness with which the work was done and of the excellent character of our local health administration generally.

The Times
9.9.16.

662.
662/23

THE COST OF LIVING.

STRONG PROTESTS AT TRADE CONGRESS.

A CHINESE EVIL.

(FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.)

BIRMINGHAM, SEPT. 8.

The Trades Union Congress has spent a quiet day in the discussion of a variety of matters, mostly non-contentious and of sectional interest. On two questions only was any strong feeling displayed—the increasing employment of Chinamen on British ships owing to the withdrawal of British seamen for naval service, and the high cost of living.

The employment of Chinamen was denounced by the sailors' representatives, and their repatriation was demanded, the demand being supported by some startling allegations of evildoing in the Chinese dens of Liverpool and London. The cost of living was the subject of some vigorous speaking. Delegate after delegate despaired of redress from the Government for what they regarded as a plundering of the poor, and asserted that the workers must take matters in their own hands at whatever cost.

One of them suggested that the Congress should go en masse to London and, in effect, seize the Prime Minister by the throat; but the Congress in the end contented itself with the unanimous adoption of a resolution which censured the Government for their indifference, and instructed the Parliamentary Committee to press for relief, either by the fixing of maximum prices or by the State control of supplies.

CHINESE BOARDING HOUSES.

The Congress adopted a resolution put forward jointly by the miners, cotton spinners, and dockers in favour of the amendment of the Workmen's Compensation Act in 14 specified particulars. Among the suggested amendments was one providing that in the case of transport workers and others who were more liable to injury from bombardment and aircraft than ordinary people, injuries so received should be deemed to have been accidental within the meaning of the Act. Another provided that all diseases which might be contracted by munition workers through handling T.N.T. or other chemicals should be scheduled as industrial diseases.

Mr. HAVELOCK WILSON (Sailors and Firemen) moved a resolution expressing alarm at the increased employment of Chinese and cheap Asiatic labour on British ships during the war, and calling upon the Government to introduce a Bill for the repatriation of all Chinese who cannot produce satisfactory evidence proving that they are of British nationality.

Mr. J. COTTER (Ships' Stewards) said that in Liverpool there were 4,000 Chinese living in houses which no English lodging-house keeper would be allowed to run. He had been into many Chinese boarding houses. In the first house he entered he found 40 Chinamen gathered around fan-tan tables on which lay between £300 and £400, while in the bedrooms were others in a comatose state as the result of opium smoking. He had seen as many as 38 men in one room lying in bed and smoking the drug. It was manufactured wholesale in these places. In Pennyfields, London, young girls from the age of 14 upwards could be seen going into the Chinese lodging-house up to 2 and 3 o'clock in the morning.

The resolution was agreed to.

THE RISE OF PRICES.

Mr. J. HILL (Boilermakers) moved the following resolution on the increased cost of living :—

That this Congress, representing the organized workers of Great Britain, declares that the Government has failed to give proper attention to the serious grievances the masses of the people are suffering under by reason of the enormous and unjustifiable increase in the cost of living. It views with alarm the indifference of responsible statesmen to this subject, and, in view of the continued rise in the price of almost every necessary of life, remits to the Parliamentary Committee to place before the Government and the Labour Party the urgent necessity of immediate steps being taken to secure a revision of the prices of all such commodities, either by fixing maximum prices or taking full control of supplies into their own hands in the interests of the people, and thus prevent them [illegible] as they are at present.

43/3d., the best-named descriptions from Victoria selling from 30d. to 42d. per lb. The greasy cross-breds from New Zealand were readily taken up by the various home sections and the late advance was firmly maintained for all grades. A good supply of similar qualities from Falkland Islands and Punta Arenas-terminating all of which met a brisk sale both on home and French account, prices showing a rise of 5 to 10 per cent. compared with those ruling at the July sales. The offerings comprised 2,120 bales from New South Wales, 417 Queensland, 1,002 Victorian, 851 West Australian, 1,307 New Zealand, 838 Cape, 677 Falkland Islands, and 1,304 bales from Punta Arenas.

Mr. J. HOUGHTON (Dock Labourers) said there was more indignation among the people owing to the inactivity and callousness of the Government on this question than there was on any other question discussed this week. There was only one remedy, no matter how reluctant they might be to put it into operation. Some of our industries must teach the Government that something had got to be done to keep down the cost of living. While the housewives could only get a pound or two of sugar, the jam manufacturers could get all they required. Was it not strange that this restriction had only come during July, August, and September, when fruit was plentiful and the housewives wanted to make jam? It meant that in the winter they would have to buy from the manufacturers, who would have a monopoly. The only remedy was to boycott the manufacturers and refuse to buy their jam during the next few months. He did not want a stoppage of industry, but he warned the Government that, whether they liked it or not, trade unionists would take the matter in their own hands and force it to an issue in the only possible way unless the Government listened to their appeal.

THE WOMEN'S PLIGHT.

Miss M. BONDFIELD (Shop Assistants) deprecated the suggestion that women should boycott certain classes of food. While women were mainly responsible for the Rent Bill because of the drastic action they took, it was not reasonable to expect the mother of the household to face the agony of boycotting the food of her children. That was not the way to bring pressure on the Government. They should use their trade union organization. The women would come out in their thousands to join in their processions and demonstrations. Women were being driven to desperation by the shrinkage of the sovereign.

Mr. J. BROMLEY (Locomotive Engineers) said they were all just as heated on this question at their special conference in London, and it resulted in nothing. To organize public meetings and demonstrations would take time. Desperate remedies were needed. He suggested that the Congress should show their earnestness by adjourning, taking a special train to London, and sending a deputation to tell Mr. Asquith that this was not a matter which he could bargain about and squash off, and that there were angry men outside who wished him to know that this was the final phase.

Several delegates wished to continue the discussion, but as it was now the hour for the midday adjournment the closure was moved and carried. The resolution was then carried unanimously.

EMPLOYMENT OF CHILDREN.

Mr. J. R. CLYNES, M.P., moved a resolution protesting against the employment of children of school age in agricultural work, factories, and workshops, affirming the belief that reductions in educational expenditure were false economy, and pledging the Congress to support all measures to secure a higher standard of education for children.

The resolution was seconded by Mr. J. WINSTONE (Miners' Federation), and adopted.

Another resolution was passed in favour of empowering the local authorities to raise the school age to 16, and establishing a system of compulsory attendance during the daytime at continuation classes for all children between 16 and 18 who are not otherwise receiving a suitable education; and a third resolution, proposed by Mr. J. HODGE, M.P., calling on the Government to reorganize our educational system from the elementary school to the university, and to pay special attention to technical education and scientific investigation.

Mr. STUART BUNNING (Postmen's Federation) proposed on behalf of the Parliamentary Committee a resolution to the effect that no Electoral Reform Bill will be satisfactory which does not provide, among other things, for a reduction of the qualifying period to at most three months, the enfranchisement of all adults, male and female, a more equitable distribution of seats, and the abolition of plural voting. This was agreed to.

The following resolution on the conscription of wealth was moved by Mr. B. COOPER (Cigar Makers), seconded by Mr. E. BEVIN (Dockers) and adopted unanimously :—

That, as the manhood of the nation has been conscripted to resist foreign aggression, the maintenance of freedom, and the protection of capital, this Congress demands that such a proportion of the accumulated wealth of the country shall be immediately conscripted as is necessary to defray the financial liability incurred by the prosecution of the war, and thus avoid borrowing huge loans upon which enormous sums will have to be paid in interest by future generations, which will handicap the industries of the country in national and international competition, diminish trade, and impoverish the people.

And further, this Congress instructs the Parliamentary Committee to initiate a huge campaign for the purpose of accomplishing the foregoing object, and to demand immediately from the Government a census of wealth :—(a) Banking accounts and balances; (b) currency; (c) the capital estimate of the whole material (1) productive, (2) transport and distributive wealth, and the whole of the profits appertaining thereto; (d) an estimate of the value of property and real estate and other forms representing rents, interest, and profit.

Daily Chronicle
9-9-16

HIGHER COST OF FOOD.

TRADE UNION CONGRESS AND NEED FOR ACTION.

CONTROL OF TRANSPORT AND PRICES.

From Our Special Correspondent.

BIRMINGHAM, Friday.

Many miscellaneous matters occupied the attention of the Trade Union Congress today, and its old age was occupied in atoning for the wasted hours of its youth. Under Mr. Harry Gosling's able chairmanship good progress was made, and the work is well in hand for a finish to-morrow.

A number of resolutions asking for various amendments of the Workmen's Compensation Act were boiled down and presented to congress by Mr. Robert Brown, of the Miners' Federation. During the discussion Mr. Alfred Smith, the secretary of the London Vehicle Workers' Union, told the delegates that, according to the House of Lords, a cabdriver is not a workman. To ascertain this fact his union, said Mr. Smith, had spent £700. It appears that, under the Insurance Act, cabrivers belong to the same species as share-fishermen. Mr. Smith asked the congress to help him in establishing the seemingly obvious fact that a cabdriver is a workman.

THE PRICE OF FOOD.

Dearer food raised an interesting discussion, which was initiated by Mr. John Hill, the secretary of the Boilermakers' Union. The debate centred round the following resolution, which had been tabled by the Parliamentary Committee:

> This Congress views with alarm the enormous increase in the price of food since August 1914, and expresses its profound astonishment and indignation that, in view of the undoubted fact that the increased price is to a large extent due to the action of shipowners and others in charging exorbitant rates for transport, the Government have not completely taken over the direct control of shipping, railways, and all means of transport in order to ensure for the people wholesome food and general necessities of life at the lowest possible charges, and now calls upon the Government to immediately adopt measures to attain that end by taking over all means of transport, together with full control of home food production, and also fixing a maximum price for food and all other commodities essential to the life and best interests of the nation as a whole.

"GAVE UP ALL WE COULD."

Mr. Hill contended that recent statements in the House of Commons had revealed the incompetence of the Government.

"When the war broke out," continued Mr. Hill, "the Government came to us and asked that the 'iron law' of supply and demand should be set aside so far as wages were concerned. In the interest of the country, the great majority of the trade unionists agreed with this demand. We gave up all we could. I know that some of the men in my trade have shortened their lives in their exertions to supply the Army and Navy. Yet when we ask the Government to suspend the same iron law and supply of demand so far as they affect the necessaries of life, we are met with a confession of failure."

"All we can say is," concluded Mr. Hill, "that if something is not done, we shall be compelled to take stronger measures."

Mr. J. Houghton, Scottish Dock Labourers, seconded the resolution, as he informed the Congress, "with no pleasure whatever." He contended that the Government could have done many things—as it had done for the wool-buyers, the palm-oil users, and the jam manufacturers. Incidentally Mr. Houghton mentioned the sad case of a Scottish farmer who was prepared to take £4 a ton for his potatoes, whereas he was compelled to accept £10 a ton for them.

SUFFERING OF THE CHILDREN.

Mr. C. Bramley and Miss Margaret Bondfield continued the discussion. Miss Bondfield dwelt upon the sufferings which were being inflicted on children for want of milk and sugar.

Mr. J. Bromley, the secretary of the Locomotive Engineers, was in favour of heroic measures. "I propose," he said, "that the Parliamentary Committee should charter a special train and take us all to Downing Street now, where we can tell the Prime Minister what we mean."

But the congress, having accepted the resolution, adjourned for lunch, and the consideration of Mr. Bromley's suggestion was postponed "until this day six months," to use the Parliamentary phrase.

Scotland met with another Flodden in the afternoon. Mr. Morris moved a resolution condemning the existence of four separate Insurance Commissioners for the United Kingdom. Mr. William Adamson

Daily Mail
16-10-16

662

662/24

WAR WORK MEALS.

ILLNESSES FROM BREAD & TEA BREAKFASTS.

MODEL MENUS.

The necessity for the civilian population to have nourishing meals in spite of the high food prices prompted the Health of Munition Workers' Committee to conduct investigations into what the workers were eating. Dr. Leonard Hill, the investigator, has now presented his report.

Three dinner-baskets were bought from workers going on the night shift at a factory, the workers being given a sum ample to buy a meal at the canteen. The contents of the baskets were analysed, their food values being expressed in calories:—

	Calories.
1.—Rabbit and vegetables in basin	663
2.—Sausage roll, bread and butter, ham and cheese	1,468
3.—Dish of potatoes, tomatoes and bacon, jam puff, a cake; bread and butter and jam	1,719

Calories express the energy value of foodstuffs. To walk 2½ miles along a level road in an hour calls for an expenditure of 160 calories in a man of 11 stone. Men engaged in hard physical work, especially in the open air, require a good deal more energy-producing food, and may consume as much as 4,500 calories daily with advantage. For a man engaged in a sedentary occupation as little as 2,200 calories may suffice.

The only comment on the dinner baskets that Dr. Hill has to make is that No. 3, the meal of a boy of 15, even allowing for growth, was probably excessive. A good average dinner, he says elsewhere, should have an energy value of about 1,000 calories.

BEST AND CHEAPEST DINNER.

Numerous comparisons are given of the cost and food value of dinners purchased at munitions canteens, and at working class and other restaurants. The best and cheapest dinner, it is shown, was provided at a canteen, where the catering was in amateur hands:—

	Calories.	Cost.
Canteen (Amateur).—Steak pudding, peas and potatoes, jam roll, rice pudding	1,488	8d.
Canteen (Professional).—Meat pudding, cabbage, potatoes, jam roll	1,248	7d.
Popular Restaurant.—Steak pudding, potatoes, cabbage, syrup pudding	1,345	1s. 3d.
Working Class Restaurant.—Meat pudding, potatoes, cabbage, suet pudding	1,084	8d.

The meals of women workers give interesting contrasts:

	Calories.	Cost.
Women's Restaurant.—Roast mutton, boiled potatoes, cabbage, syrup roll	697	6d.
Women's Tea Shop.—Roll, butter, milk, sugar, stewed prunes, syrup	397	7d.

Of the tea-shop luncheon Dr. Hill says: "It is an example of the unsatisfying meals which pale-faced young women may often be seen consuming in popular cafés."

Each of the three normal meals for a working man should contain 1,000 calories, the report lays down, and for a woman from 800 to 900 calories. In the case of a large class of workers home meals are hurried. A worker starting the day with a bread-and-tea breakfast, and walking or travelling for an hour or more to work, cannot remain for long an efficient worker, and probably much broken time and illness result from this cause.

DAILY DIETARIES.

Appended are some of the daily dietaries for munition workers suggested by Dr. Hill, based on prices ruling in April last:

Cost, 2s. 11d. Calories, 3,352.

Breakfast.—Two boiled eggs, 4d.; 2 slices bread, butter and jam, sugar and milk. Dinner.—Meat pudding, 3d.; potatoes, cabbage, jam roll. Tea.—Two slices bread, butter and jam, piece cake, sugar and milk. Supper.—Cold meat, 2½d.; cheese, 2 slices bread and butter.

Cost, 2s. 1d. Calories, 3,139.

Breakfast.—Three rashers bacon, 4d.; 2 slices bread, butter and jam; tomato, sugar and milk. Dinner.—Roast beef, 4d.; Yorkshire pudding, potatoes, cabbage, apple pie and custard. Tea.—Two slices bread, butter and jam, cake, sugar and milk. Supper.—Two slices bread, cheese, meat, 2d.; pickles.

Cost, 2s. 2½d. Calories, 3,111.

Breakfast.—Two eggs, 3d.; 2 rashers bacon, 3d.; 2 slices of bread, butter and jam, sugar and milk. Dinner.—Roast beef, 3d.; potatoes, cabbage, and syrup roll. Tea.—Three slices of bread, butter and jam, lettuce or radishes, sugar and milk. Supper.—Two slices bread and butter, ham, 3½d.; cheese.

The cheaper foods—bread, margarine, porridge, milk, herrings, cheese, beans, onions, cabbages, oranges, and the cheapest cuts of meat—provide all the requisite nourishment and probably better health than is derived from the more highly flavoured and expensive foods.

This Congress views with alarm the enormous increase in the price of food since August 1914, and expresses its profound astonishment and indignation that, in view of the undoubted fact that the increased price is to a large extent due to the action of shipowners and others in charging exorbitant rates for transport, the Government have not completely taken over the direct control of shipping, railways, and all means of transport in order to ensure for the people wholesome food and general necessities of life at the lowest possible charges, and now calls upon the Government to immediately adopt measures to attain that end by taking over all means of transport, together with full control of home food production, and also fixing a maximum price for food and all other commodities essential to the life and best interests of the nation as a whole.

"GAVE UP ALL WE COULD."

Mr. Hill contended that recent statements in the House of Commons had revealed the incompetence of the Government.

"When the war broke out," continued Mr. Hill, "the Government came to us and asked that the 'iron law' of supply and demand should be set aside so far as wages were concerned. In the interest of the country, the great majority of the trade unionists agreed with this demand We gave up all we could. I kno that some of the men in my trade hav shortened their lives in their exertion to supply the Army and Navy. Ye when we ask the Government to suspend the same iron law and supply of demanc so far as they affect the necessaries of life, we are met with a confession of failure."

"All we can say is," concluded Mr. Hill, "that if something is not done, we shall be compelled to take stronger measures."

Mr. J. Houghton, Scottish Dock Labourers, seconded the resolution, as he informed the Congress, "with no pleasure whatever." He contended that the Government could have done many things—as it had done for the wool-buyers, the palm-oil users, and the jam manufacturers. Incidentally Mr. Houghton mentioned the sad case of a Scottish farmer who was prepared to take £4 a ton for his potatoes, whereas he was compelled to accept £10 a ton for them.

SUFFERING OF THE CHILDREN.

Mr. C. Bramley and Miss Margaret Bondfield continued the discussion. Miss Bondfield dwelt upon the sufferings which were being inflicted on children for want of milk and sugar.

Mr. J. Bromley, the secretary of the Locomotive Engineers, was in favour of heroic measures. "I propose," he said, "that the Parliamentary Committee should charter a special train and take us all to Downing Street now, where we can tell the Prime Minister what we mean."

But the congress, having accepted the resolution, adjourned for lunch, and the consideration of Mr. Bromley's suggestion was postponed "until this day six months," to use the Parliamentary phrase.

Scotland met with another Flodden in the afternoon. Mr. Morris moved a resolution condemning the existence of four separate Insurance Commissioners for the United Kingdom. Mr. William Adamson, M.P., a Fifeshire miner, made an energetic protest on behalf of Scotland, but the resolution was carried by over a million votes.

CORRECTION.

Owing to an error in telephoning it was stated yesterday that Miss Mary Macarthur and Captain Dennis Bayley were present at the meeting of the British Workers' National League at mingham on Tuesday night.

Miss Macarthur was not present at meeting as she is not connected wit organisation mentioned. At the ti question Miss Macarthur was taking in the annual meeting of the Wo Trade Union League, and was expla the excellent work the league has do protecting the interests of the thousands of women who have been employed in munition work.

Captain Dennis Bayley's announcement as to the provision of mobile field hospitals by the Miners' Federation was made at the meeting of the Congress.

have an energy value of about 1,000 calories.

BEST AND CHEAPEST DINNER.

Numerous comparisons are given of the cost and food value of dinners purchased at munitions canteens, and at working class and other restaurants. The best and cheapest dinner, it is shown, was provided at a canteen, where the catering was in amateur hands:—

	Calories.	Cost.
Canteen (Amateur).—Steak pudding, peas and potatoes, jam roll, rice pudding	1,422	5d.
Canteen (Professional).—Meat pudding, cabbage, potatoes, jam roll..	1,248	7d.
Popular Restaurant.—Steak pudding, potatoes, cabbage, syrup pudding..	1,945	1s. 3d.
Working Class Restaurant.—Meat pudding, potatoes, cabbage, suet pudding	1,004	8d.

The meals of women workers give interesting contrasts:

	Calories.	Cost.
Women's Restaurant.—Roast mutton, boiled potatoes, cabbage, syrup roll	687	6d.
Women's Tea Shop.—Roll, butter, milk, sugar, stewed prunes, syrup..	397	7d.

Of the tea-shop luncheon Dr. Hill says: "It is an example of the unsatisfying meals which pale-faced young women may often be seen consuming in popular cafés."

Each of the three normal meals for a working man should contain 1,000 calories, the report lays down, and for a woman from 800 to 900 calories. In the case of a large class of workers home meals are hurried. A worker starting the day with a bread-and-tea breakfast, and walking or travelling for an hour or more to work, cannot remain for long an efficient worker, and probably much broken time and illness result from this cause.

DAILY DIETARIES.

Appended are some of the daily dietaries for munition workers suggested by Dr. Hill, based on prices ruling in April last:

Cost, 2s. 1½d. Calories, 3,252.

Breakfast.—Two boiled eggs, 4d.; 2 slices bread, butter and jam, sugar and milk. Dinner.—Meat pudding, 5d.; potatoes, cabbage, jam roll. Tea.—Two slices bread, butter and jam, piece cake, sugar and milk. Supper.—Cold meat, 3½d.; cheese, 2 slices bread and butter.

Cost, 2s. 1d. Calories, 3,130.

Breakfast.—Three rashers bacon, 4d.; 3 slices bread, butter and jam; tomato, sugar and milk. Dinner.—Roast beef, 4d.; Yorkshire pudding, potatoes, cabbage, apple pie and custard. Tea.—Two slices bread, butter and jam, cake, sugar and milk. Supper.—Two slices bread, cheese, meat, 3d.; pickles.

Cost, 2s. 2½d. Calories, 3,151.

Breakfast.—Two eggs, 3d.; 3 rashers bacon, 3d.; 3 slices of bread, butter and jam, sugar and milk. Dinner.—Roast beef, 5d.; potatoes, cabbage, and syrup roll. Tea.—Three slices of bread, butter and jam, lettuce or radishes, sugar and milk. Supper.—Two slices bread and butter, ham, 3½d.; cheese.

The cheaper foods—bread, margarine, porridge, milk, herrings, cheese, beans, onions, cabbages, oranges, and the cheapest cuts of meat—provide all the requisite nourishment, and probably better health than is derived from the more highly flavoured and expensive foods.

Leicester Post.
12.9.16.

DEAR FO[illegible] SCANDAL.

LEICESTER TRADES COUNCIL AND THE PROFITEERS.

A meeting of the Leicester Trades Council was held at the Trades Hall last night, Mr. E. Burns presiding.

Mr. F. Acton, having succeeded in getting the Standing Orders suspended, called attention to the "dear food scandal, and the huge increase in the price of necessities of life." He pointed out that outdoor meetings had been held at ...orthampton, and moved a resolution in favour of the holding of similar meetings at different parts of the town for a week, the campaign to conclude with a mass meeting, at which attention would be drawn to the indifference of the Government to the exploitation of the people's food, and that the Women's Labour organisation, the I.L.P., the Co-operative Society, and other bodies be asked to join in the movement.

Mr. Crump Hall seconded, and said they ought to make it pretty warm for the food profiteers throughout the town.

Mr. A. West said he did not entirely agree that the indifference of the Government was the chief factor in the high prices, but the indifference of the people themselves. If organised Labour, and even unorganised Labour, had moved in the matter they would have got the Government to control the prices of food the same as they had done in regard to freights. People had to pay for luxuries, and war was a luxury. He mentioned that quite recently there was plenty of wheat in Manchester, but the buyers could not get it, because it was being held up, but when Rumania declared war the price went down by 5s. to 6s. a quarter, which proved that some persons were exploiting the people.

Mr. T. R. Hill said the question of the price of food once more raised the clear issue between the rich and the poor. Organised capital was so powerful that it could control the markets.

Ald. Chaplin said the question had taken up a good deal of the time of the Trades Union Congress. There could not be two opinions on the matter, and they would all agree that they were the victims of gigantic theft, and also that there were men in England who were as deliberate murderers as any German. (Applause.) They knew that people were dying who were the unnatural victims of those murderous scoundrels who were sucking the life's blood of the women and children. The only point in the resolution he was not quite sure about was as to the holding of meetings with the co-operation of the other bodies. He would go further than the resolution, and decide that even if the other bodies did not join, they, as a Trades Council, should go in for the demonstration. They should also stand at street corners, as they used to do in the old days. (Hear, hear.) He was afraid they had bot to be a bit too respectable. (Laughter.)

Mr. Farber suggested the holding of a procession, which would not be confined to trades unionists, but thrown open to the wives and children of the men who were fighting at the front.

Several delegates, having spoken in favour of holding a procession on a Sunday, Councillor Perkins said it had been stated that, during the war, there were no parties; that all were doing what they could for the country. While that might be true as to politics, he believed there were three parties in existence, one being those who were bleeding for their country, the second those who were bleeding their country, and the third those who were bleeding them. (Applause.)

Eventually it was decided to refer the matter to the Executive Council to arrange for a procession, and the advisability of holding district meetings.

Upon the motion of Mr. Poulton a resolution protesting against the continual rise in the price of food, and calling upon the Government to take steps to put a stop to the same, was carried.

Daily Graphic.
11.9.16.

662.
662/25

RAILWAYMEN'S 10s. DEMAND.

COMPANIES' AND MEN'S DELEGATES TO MEET THIS WEEK.

Mr. J. H. Thomas, M.P., of the National Union of Railwaymen, speaking in the interests of the Union's Orphan Fund at Queen's Park, yesterday, dealt with the railwaymen's demand for a 10s. increase in wages, stated that a meeting between the railway companies and the railwaymen's representatives had been agreed upon, and would take place this week.

He said he had never minimised the fact that if there was one section of men more than another who would be able to hold a revolver at the State and say, "These are our terms, and we demand them," it was the railwaymen. But if railwaymen had ever decided to take such a course they would have had to find another leader to present their demands. (Applause.) He would never have attempted it, and the railwaymen never wanted to take advantage of the nation's position.

Railwaymen, he declared, were quite as important to the country as the soldiers in the trenches. The country realised that they had to see to the efficiency of the soldiers in order to win the war. The country should consider that the same thing was necessary in the case of the railwayman, who was [illegible] essential in the winning of the war. Through circumstances never foreseen either by the companies or by the men, the great mass of railwaymen soldiers were today compelled to work for a wage which did not enable them to maintain a proper standard of efficiency.

A demand had been made in certain quarters for an immediate stoppage in order to force the position. If they (the railwaymen) believed they had a good case, he was entitled to ask that that case should not be prejudiced by any ill-considered or ill-advised action on their part.

The Co-operative News
T- 1.10-16

662/26 662

WOMEN'S CORNER.

ALL communications intended for this Page should be addressed to the Editor of the "Women's Corner," "Co-operative News" Office, Long Millgate, Manchester.

THE PROTEST OF THE CONSUMERS.

HOW WE ARE IN THE HANDS OF THE PROFIT-MONGERS.

LESSONS FROM THE FOOD COMMISSION'S REPORT.

THE Departmental Committee on Food Prices has now issued an interim report, and, as was to be expected, matters of great importance and close interest to women and to co-operators are touched upon, if not fully developed therein.

The report deals with the rise in prices of the chief articles of food—meat (including bacon), fish, flour, bread, tea, sugar, milk, cheese, butter, margarine, eggs, and potatoes—and a table is given showing the percentage of increase on each article, the average rise on all the articles being no less than 68 per cent. in large towns, 62 in small towns and villages, or 65 over all.

That is to say, a weekly wage of 33s. will only buy of these articles the same quantity as could be got for £1 before the war!

The main business of the report seems to be to devise ways and means of preventing prices from going higher rather than bringing them down, unless (and here we get at the root of the matter) the country takes possession of the sources of supply in the interests of the consumer.

It is most interesting to note how, from every consideration of the vast problem of re-organisation of the necessaries of life into which the war is forcing us, there emerges more and more insistently the truth that in co-operation, with its power of linking up the interests of the consumer with the producer, lies the best solution of the whole difficulty.

Referring especially to the milk problem, in which we women are so closely concerned, as our special correspondent pointed out last week, the broad facts of the case are found to be that the "gains made through high prices have gone chiefly to the primary producers," whose interests are not bound up in the interests of the consumer, but in the making of profit for themselves. The intermediate dairyman, who is hampered by increased cost of living, labour, horse-feed, and cans, is having both a harassing and unprofitable time of it in comparison with the wholesale distributor and the farmer.

The protest of the consumers seems as though it could have little weight whilst the consumer has absolutely no part or lot in the business except to pay the prices, and no weapon against the retailer except to boycott.

The Committee do not seem able to make any drastic suggestions for taking the milk supply in hand, except to suggest that the organisation of collection from farmers might be undertaken. A Minority Report of seven of the twelve members of the Committee makes a further suggestion that a committee of men and women acquainted with the conditions of the trade might be appointed to regulate prices, and endeavour to act fairly as between the farmers, the distributors, and the public.

No such new committee would be needed if, as Mr. Will Crooks suggests in an interview given to the press recently, the job were undertaken by co-operation—through the Co-operative Wholesale Society and the retail stores. For in our co-operative organisations we already take the committees—not appointed, but elected by the consumers themselves—to look after their own interests.

While the fabric of our very life's sustenance is based upon the profit-making system we are all helplessly in the hands of the profit-makers. It is hinted that the farmers' profits from the milk trade may not be too greatly tampered with for fear he would find it more profitable to sell his cows for slaughter, and the high prices of milk would be translated into a real shortage of milk—a national disaster indeed.

It is useless for us women to protest in mere words; let us, with this report in hand, sit down to study the question out for ourselves, and then, with knowledge of the conditions of trade, move forward on our committees towards a fairer and juster method of commerce, in which the good of the community, not the profits of the few, shall rule our ways.

We shall hope to refer to the report in regard to other items later on, but milk must take precedence in any scheme with which we women have to do.

LOWER PRICES AND LESS DIVIDEND.

WHY THE REPRESENTATIVE WORKING WOMAN IS NOT A CO-OPERATOR.

A WAR-TIME LABOUR CONFERENCE.]

[From a Woman's Point of View.]

THE subject under discussion was 'The High Prices of Food, and how a possible combining of co-operative, trade union, and labour forces might be used to effect some reform."

The meeting was held in the Mitchell Memorial Hall, in Manchester, last Saturday, and was attended by representatives of all the various Labour organisations, while the speakers were Miss M. Bondfield and Professor Hall, whose speeches are given in another part of this issue of the "News."

Those who followed the speeches, in the course of discussion, emphasised the fact—if it is a fact—that the subject was a matter for women to discuss, showing a state of things where they must bear the strain and weight.

Yet most of the speakers were men, and did a woman rise to her feet at the same time as a man, she invariably gave way, and the man spoke, in one or more instances explaining what he considered to be the women's outlook and position in a manner not calculated to soothe a perforce silent woman.

There were two brilliant exceptions to this rule; women who rose so often, were so persistent, that they were allowed to speak, and these two were the only women speakers during the discussion. One was Mrs. Eddie, of the management committee of the Pendleton Society; the other Mrs. Gordon, Women's Labour League; and both were in favour of the employment of trade unionists only by co-operators.

One claimed that the panacea for all our present-day evils was better education, with a Capital "E," so that labour might meet capital on equal terms.

662/27

The other thought that the comparatively slow spread of co-operation was due to the fact that a lack of attractiveness prevailed in co-operative shops; that mnaagers might be pleasanter, that the goods were more costly than in many other shops, and that a working woman with fifteen shillings—she was trying to make do the work of twenty shillings—could not afford to deal in the dearest markets.

Mrs. Gordon struck the right chord when she pointed out that if we really desire success in the co-operative movement, if we intend to make it the lever it ought to be for the upliftment of the workers, we must get at the ordinary working woman who is the wife of the convinced trade unionist, but who through lack of opportunities for education cannot realise the possibilities of co-operation, especially in reference to her own life.

There was a general spirit marking the speeches from both men and women to the effect that the competition between societies for large dividends was a drawback, and not in touch with the real aim of co-operative principles. "Let us have food nearer to cost price, and never mind the dividends. A working woman cannot afford to sit out of 3s. in every pound," said the man, and he was cheered.

Another ventured to say that the quality of co-operatively-produced goods always made up for any little extra cost, but he was interrupted by cries of "Not always," "Question," &c.

A wave of criticism swept over the meeting, washing over a goodly number of persons in its rise and fall, including our Government, municipalities, trade union officials, labour councils, C.W.S. directors, and last, but not least, the indifferent members of our societies.

On the way to the tea-room the women gave full vent to the opinions they had stifled during the meeting, and many different sides of the question were discussed; but high above the rest, in numbers and vigour, were those who cried for food at lower prices and less dividend.

"It's all very well to talk, but some of us can talk about less dividend and lose our jobs through it," said one. "And while we have big posters telling of a high dividend and trying to bribe the outside public that way, so long shall we have our prices, not lower, as they should be, but higher than the private traders."

ARE WE REALLY DOING THINGS?

A FEW PROPAGANDA SUGGESTIONS FOR GUILD BRANCHES.

WHY SHOULD WE NOT HAVE A MILLION MEMBERS?

If you want to do big things, you must make big efforts, would be a fitting motto to hang up in every guild-room.

My experience is that far too many guild branches are content to jog along year by year with the same sort of programme, the same round of speakers, the same number of members, never asking, "Are we really making progress?" "Are we really doing things?"

Not only members, but many speakers are content with the nice comfortable ways of standing still. Some speakers, if allowed to choose their subject, are much more ready to speak on one that interests them, rather than one that helps to explain and enlarge the mass of facts and truths around co-operation. No wonder members sit through afternoons all the year round, and still only have very muddled ideas of our great object.

So the membership and attendance in the guild-room in too many cases remain about the same; the same small circle of good, keen members take their seats each week, the same daring few ask questions when the "meeting is open to discussion."

This winter we are asked to do our utmost in the way of co-operative propaganda. I feel rather doubtful that we can do the big things asked of us by the resolution passed at Congress unless we can stir our own guild members to action in and for their guilds. The propaganda of co-operation must begin in the guild-room. Even the least enlightened of our members must be made to understand what is, after all, a complicated organisation and a difficult principle.

What is the best way of making her and others in a somewhat similar state of mind grasp the meaning of co-operative ideals? The best, easiest, and quickest way is in the guild-room.

A clever writer was once asked how it was he made all his writings so simple and clear? He answered, "Because I think of all my readers as fools." Somewhat in the same way have we to think of our members, old as well as new ones. Not as fools, far from it, but as women who have had their days filled with domestic details, who, in many cases, have only had the rarest peeps into the wider outside world beyond the home, and who have often been considered by their men-folk as "only women, and can't understand."

Two very simple items of propaganda which, I believe, would clear up a great many difficulties could easily be carried out in every guild. At least once a year in every guild a class could be held, when the whole organisation and principles could be explained as simply as possible by someone who understood the art of teaching; and every new member, on joining, should be given a pamphlet about the work and organisation of the guild. In this way members could learn what may be called the history and technique of the co-operative movement; but they can only learn its great ideals and principles by taking a share in its work.

Each member must be taught, and taught again, that she is responsible for a keen or an apathetic guild.

This spirit, much stronger and firmer, should be in our guilds. Each member must be made to feel it is her duty and pleasure to make the guild a live agent for all kinds of good works. She must be constantly thinking of the guild and what she can do for it. If there is any special meeting coming off, she must realise that she must do her bit if it is to be a success. If we could only get this spirit thoroughly into our guilds, very soon every society in the country would have guild branches formed at all its store branches; and, instead of 29,000 guildswomen, we should number at least a million. Why shouldn't we have a million guildswomen? Surely out of over three million co-operators we ought to have something like that proportion? To my mind, 29,000 is very inadequate. We have a strong, solid organisation behind us; we have material advantages to encourage principles; we have the management and educational committees to back us up; we have ardent leaders of utmost capability—our numbers ought to be very great.

Far too often, when one talks in this way to guildswomen, one is told, "This town is such a difficult place to work." Of course, it is. Every place is difficult. Because in every place there is indifference, scepticism, pride, snobbishness, and all the other vices that drag the wheels of progress. But all of us, wherever our branches are, have these things to fight. And, instead of this fact discouraging us, it should encourage—for the greater the fight the greater the victory. When we can be sure of the utmost effort of every guildswoman, the co-operative movement will go forward in strides, and true co-operation in every branch of life will very soon be within the reach of all men and women kind. But to do that we must begin to teach it now in our guilds.

F. R.

ANOTHER GUILD BRANCH FOR BRISTOL.

Even since the outbreak of war the number of guilds and members have gradually increased in the Bristol and Somerset district, and on September 20th the District Committee proudly opened their twelfth Bristol branch, supported by representatives from the Management Committee, Educational Committee, Men's Guild, and women from the other local guild branches. A very hearty welcome was given to all present by Mr. Treble on behalf of Cotham Educational Council. The chair was taken by Mrs. Lloyd (president of the district), and speeches were made by Mrs. Found (Central Committee) and Mrs. Bye (Sectional secretary).

662127

These were supported by Mr. Petherick, who represented the Management Committee and Men's Guild.

Refreshments were served, provided by the Cotham Educational Council, and at the close a representative from the Men's Guild suggested that a collection should be made in order to provide funds for the new guild. This was agreed to, and a welcome sum was handed to the new guild secretary (Mrs. Jewel). Thirty-five names were handed in.

H. E. Brown, District Secretary.

ELECTED TO THE NELSON SOCIETY'S MANAGEMENT COMMITTEE.

Mrs. Smith, a life-long member of the Nelson Women's Guild, has just been elected to her society's management committee. She is the first woman to be elected to this position, and was the first woman to serve on the educational committee, a seat which she lost later. "I did not find the work easy to start with," said Mrs. Smith in the course of an interview with a "Corner" representative, "and when the guild wished me to stand for the management committee I hesitated, because I did not want to be a failure. However, now, when elected, I shall try to do my best, trusting some day that other women will follow. After all, it is not for the position, but the hope that I can do something for the common good that led me to the decision to accept nomination."

Mrs. Smith.

WOMEN AND FINANCE.

At the quarterly conference of the Northampton, Wellingborough, and Kettering District Association, held at Kettering on September 20th, Mr. Wm. Ballard, C.C. (general manager of the Kettering Industrial Society), gave a very interesting and instructive paper on the above subject.

Mr. Ballard pointed out that the time had gone past when co-operative societies could be run by men alone, and had now arrived when women must take their fair share of work and responsibility. Incidentally, he paid a very high compliment to the work of the Women's Guild in the education of their members and making them become a valuable asset to any well-managed society.

In the discussion which followed, Mrs. F. Stein (Birmingham) contended that it was the duty of the member to vote for the most suitable person (when vacancies on the management committee were being filled), entirely regardless of sex.

A hearty vote of thanks was accorded to Mr. Ballard.

Mrs. Mould (Higham Ferrers), president of the association, presided.

A vote of sympathy was passed to the widow and family of the late Mr. Thomas Panther.

After the conference, tea was served to about a hundred delegates.

During the evening a public meeting was held, when the hall was well filled.

Mrs. Stein gave a much-appreciated address, and after the meeting games, dancing, and musical items closed a very interesting day.

PRESTWICH ENTERTAINS WOUNDED SOLDIERS.

On Saturday, September 30th, the Board and Guild Rooms of the Prestwich Society were again filled with wounded soldiers, who were entertained to tea by members of the Women's Guild, in conjunction with the society's board of management. The guests numbered seventy, who were conveyed to and from various local hospitals in motor cars lent for the occasion by several local gentlemen. Tea was provided by the society's catering department, and members of the guild were very diligent in attending to the wants of the wounded "Tommies."

After tea the company adjourned to the Guild-room, where Mr. James Hilton (board of management) presided where Mr. James Hilton (board of management) presided, and Miss Thompson (president of the Women's Guild) welcomed the guests on behalf of the guild and the board of management.

A programme of vocal, instrumental, and elocutionary items was gone through, and the event was brought to a close by the guests expressing their appreciation in a hearty "Three times three" and the singing of the National Anthem.

WOMEN'S PROGRESS AT BURNLEY.

Mrs. Mary Grindrod, ex-vice-president of the Central Guild branch at Burnley, has the honour of being the first woman candidate to be elected on the educational committee of her society. For a number of years she has served actively, loyally, and energetically on the local guild committee as a member, vice-president, and president (pro tem.). Since the outbreak of the war she has also taken an active part in the Soldiers' and Sailors' Executive Families' Association, and for three years has been the guild representative on the ladies' committee of the Burnley Victoria Hospital Her election, as the pioneer woman member of the educational committee, has given great satisfaction, and indicates the active progress which is being made by the women of Burnley.

Mrs. Mary Grindrod.

SHALL WE TRADE WITH THE ENEMY?

Dear Madam,—Each week I have been hoping to see in the "Women's Corner" some protest against the remarks made at the Guild Congress about "shaking hands" with the enemy. Many people are under the impression that this means that co-operators intend trading with the enemy just the same after the war, and I should be glad to know if this can possibly be true? If so, are we not going to help the individualist traders and financiers who are the great forces at the back of every war, and through them become the patrons of employers of sweated and child labour?

The enemy has had free trading and freedom enough with us in all conscience!

Germans have been admitted into our Parliament and Government offices, army and navy, yet it has not led to peace. It has only filled them with jealousy, envy, greed, and lust for power to dominate the world. "Germany over all" has been their constant cry.

To trade with them again means going back to the same state of things, and to encourage and help them to gain this power and prepare for another war. It will not destroy their hate, caused by their jealousy and envy; and it means that the babies whose lives the Guild women are helping to save (or their children) are to be reared to stand between us and the Germans as "common fodder."

Are we to shake the hands of people who can do all this? If so, then we sanction it, and as good as say, "Never mind about the women and children you have slain and tortured, give us your cheap goods." These cheap goods have turned out to be very dear. It largely rests with the women whether we trade with the enemy or not after the war.

If every branch of the Women's Guild would pass a resolution, and every co-operator resolve, not to buy any enemy products whatever, not in a spirit of revenge, but purely in self-defence and in simple justice and loyalty to the men who have risked life and limb, and have died in defence of our Empire, they would show a real gratitude to all who have fought for us and even crossed the sea from the colonies to help. Surely they have earned this expression of our gratitude.

Germany must redeem herself from within, rid herself of "Kaiserism," "militarism," become civilised, and form a commonwealth. Her co-operators will, I think, be helped most by leaving her quite alone to do this; and when she has redeemed herself, then it will be time to talk about shaking hands.

Germany will not starve; she is too well organised to do that.

The future generations, the new Germany that surely must arise after this war, will feel grateful to those nations who have stood firm and refused to deal with her present sweating traders, for, by doing so, they will have helped her to redeem herself.—Yours faithfully, (Miss) S. Rowe.

71, Mason's Avenue, Wealdstone, Harrow.

The Co Operative News
1-10-16
662/28
662

THE QUESTION OF FOOD PRICES.

CO-OPERATORS PUSH FORWARD.

DEMAND FOR GOVERNMENT INTERVENTION.

IN THE INTERESTS OF THE CIVILIAN POPULATION.

Co-operative interest in the question of food prices is developing.

At a large gathering held at Sheffield on Saturday the following resolution was passed:—

"That this conference, representing 1,275,000 members of co-operative societies in the North-Western Section of the Co-operative Union Limited of Great Britain and Ireland, emphatically protests against the inactivity of the Government in regard to the control of food prices; it calls upon the Government TO TAKE IMMEDIATE ACTION IN THIS MATTER, and to adopt such measures as are necessary to prevent the continued inflation of prices due to the monopoly power exercised by certain sections of the community."

In the course of his paper read at the conference, Mr. W. C. Anderson, M.P., said: It is my clear view that public purchasing and control should, as far as practicable, be extended for the benefit of the civilian population, and that the food thus purchased should be placed by the Government on the retail market subject to conditions that will ensure its sale at the lowest possible price. This might apply to meat, bacon, and other commodities largely imported from outside. With respect to the distribution of these commodities at fair retail prices, the co-operative movement, if it got a real chance, could render great assistance in this direction, and could set a standard which would have to be observed all round.

In any movement to resist rising prices, much greater use should be made of the co-operative societies. In the ordinary capitalist sense a co-operative society does not make profit, and was started for a quite different purpose. There would be no point in an artificial and unnecessary inflation of prices, since the surplus would have to be handed back to the members in proportion to the amount of their purchases.

A PRACTICAL QUESTION.

ARE SOCIETIES PREPARED TO OFFER THEIR ORGANISATION TO THE STATE?

This question was put by Mr. Jarman (of Warrington) to the hundreds of delegates at the North-Western Sectional Conference at Sheffield on Saturday last.

The conference, held in the Montgomery Hall, under the joint auspices of the Brightside and Carbrook and Ecclesall Societies was welcomed by Mr. Firth, on behalf of the two entertaining societies, and presided over by Mr. Goodenough (chairman of the Section), while the paper, written by Mr. W. C. Anderson, M.P., was read, in his absence, by Mrs. Anderson.

Mr. Jarman, who led off the discussion by the question quoted above, went on to point out how the Government had imposed a tax on sugar, which goes on to everything containing sugar, and how the duty on tea was 1s. in the pound. The policy of co-operators in the past was to do away with indirect taxation.

Mr. Reid (Birkenhead) contended that co-operators are not on the right lines when they charge the same prices for goods as the private traders. They must lower their prices and reduce the dividend. (Hear, hear.) And never heed the private traders. What the Government had done for the military, they could also do for the civilian population.

Mr. Whiteley (Manchester Tenants) asked for permission to add to the resolution the following words —

And in furtherance of such request hereby offer, as far as is practicable, to place the use of the whole distributive machinery of the co-operative movement in this section at the service of the responsible authorities (county, municipal, or national) to be utilised for such purpose, subject to a satisfactory scheme of working to be jointly arranged between the parties concerned.

The Chairman, however, explained that the board felt the delegates would not have had a mandate from their societies to vote on the suggested amendment, and he had therefore to rule it out of order.

Mr. Cooper (Hyde): "One would like to express an opinion on the Government Committee's suggestions contained in the daily papers of this morning."

The Chairman, in reply, asked Mr. Pollitt to submit the board's resolution, given at the head of this report. Mr. Pollitt said he was one of those who did not believe in asking the Government to do things which they could do for themselves. Another unfortunate aspect of the situation was that while the co-operative movement was asking for representation in Parliament societies were acting as so many million units. We must carry principles into action, (said Mr. Pollitt). They had already asked the Government to say what the price of milk should be. But what support had they had from co-operative committees? The Parliamentary Committee was not backed up. What was wanted was for co-operative committees to take a broader view of matters. Was the Co-operative movement prepared to place its organisation and its staff in the hands of the Government to help the people? As co-operators, they knew that the people are being exploited. Then let them tell the Government so, and urge them to take the necessary action.

Mr. Bentley (Burslem), in seconding, said it was no use passing resolutions unless they were prepared to take action. They wanted the whole community to be considered. They at Burslem had tried selling below the market prices. With what result? The position had been taken advantage of by other co-operative societies increasing their dividend.

Mr. Whiteley (Manchester) contended that the movement to-day is on narrow lines. It was necessary to deal with the bread and milk questions in an organised manner, and a system should be evolved whereby each one should get a fair share. Co-operators would have nothing to lose, but everything to gain, by placing their organisation in the hands of the Government.

Mr. Fitzgerald (Failsworth) thought the discussion was going into side tracks. There was no doubt about it, the cost of freightage was the cause of increased prices. The resolution had been moved very half-heartedly. If raw materials could be brought in at pre-war rates, the price of milk would not be questioned. If the Government could control the railways, why could they not control the shipping? Every shipping company was ashamed to show their profits. The resolution, in his opinion, was of a milk-and-water nature.

Mr. Firth (Sheffield) said the cause of high prices was not due to shortage, and he went on to point out the increases in the supplies of wheat in 1916 as compared with the 1915 supplies. It was the largest increase since 1898. The total wheat available was over 35 million quarters. And while the home crop had increased, America was sending us to the extent of 34 million quarters. America's contribution more than compensated for any loss from the Argentine, and yet wheat was up by 60 per cent. The food was there, and his advice was: Be resolute; be determined. He regretted the apathy of the people on this question of food prices. If only one-tenth of the people had come out in Sheffield last week to join in their demonstration against the high prices, it would have shown they were in earnest. There was too much committee work being done and too little propaganda work at street corners. The trade unions had taken up this matter, and what were they told by the Prime Minister? That they must allow shipowners to make profits in order that they could build ships when the war is over. Why could not all the people be allowed to make money so as to buy food when the war is over?

Mr. Major (Masborough) was not in favour of co-operative stores being handed over to the State or municipalities. They would only make a mess of them. The thing was to press the matter upon the Government at once. If coal could be controlled, then why not food?

Mr. Penny (Sheffield) felt that Mr. Anderson was holding back in his paper. They certainly would not get the Government to move by merely passing resolutions. If they wanted a thing doing they must definitely organise to get it done. And if the Parliamentary Committee said they could not do anything without representatives in Parliament, then they knew what to do.

Mr. Redfern (platform) supported the resolution, though he did not like asking the Government to do what they could better do for themselves. The Government was controlling frozen meat and sugar, and yet the prices of these articles had gone up. And while he considered the taxation of co-operative societies' profits an unjust thing, yet when they knew that the Chancellor of the Exchequer got £85 out of every £100 profits, they thought he did very well. They talked about getting at the sources of supply But did they realise what that meant? Let them take the milk, which had advanced in price least of all. For three million co-operators they would need 750,000 gallons; and supposing a cow gave three gallons a day, the yield would be 250,000 gallons; and, estimating that three acres would be required for every cow, 750,000 acres of land would be wanted, which would cost twenty millions of capital. (Laughter).

Mr. Ashley (Runcorn) said the whole question resolved itself as to the quantity of stocks of food available for consumption by the people in this country, and, according to Mr. Firth, the amount was secure. There was an adequate supply; they could therefore rest assured that exploitation was going on. He agreed that what had been done for the military could be carried out in the interests of the civil population. But how were they to stop this exploitation? According to some, Parliamentary representation was the only solution. But they would have to wait for a general election for this. They must organise meetings, draw the people, and make their protests heard.

Mr. Cooper (Hyde) also agreed there ought not to be any difference between the military and the civil population. Why should wife and children of a soldier be expected to live on dripping and margarine, and perhaps not enough of that? They must stand "four square" on the matter, and go right to the Government, and tell them that this exploitation must be stopped. He hoped the whole of the machinery of the movement would be put into operation for this purpose. (Hear, hear.)

The resolution was carried by a unanimous "Aye." Mrs. Anderson (better known as Miss M. M'Arthur) was thanked, and briefly replied; and the delegates adjourned for tea.

The Co-operative News.
1. 10. 16.

662/30

662.

FOOD PRICES SCANDAL.

INTERIM REPORT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE DEPARTMENTAL COMMITTEE.

A DISAPPOINTING DOCUMENT.

FALTERING REMEDIES.

A GLANCE AT THE COMMITTEE'S PROPOSALS.

An interim report was published last week-end by the Departmental Committee appointed by the Board of Trade to inquire into and find remedies for the high prices of food. The question is one of the utmost importance to co-operators as an organised body of consumers, and we therefore summarise the proposals of the committee below:—

LET it be said at the outset that the report will be a disappointment to any who had supposed that the Committee would suggest any drastic measures of reform. The timidity of the measures actually suggested seems to arise from the Committee's conclusion that the bulk of the increase of prices is due to natural causes, and cannot be remedied. For instance, the high price of meat, we are told, is attributable to the tremendous demand for beef by the Allied armies, the serious curtailment of supplies from Australia on account of the drought in 1915, the reduction in the tonnage of shipping devoted to the Plate and Australian trade, and the rise of 50 to 80 per cent. in the price of beef in the Argentine. With regard to the home supplies of meat, the Committee point out that the cost of production has been added to in the way of labour, feeding stuffs, and fertilisers. This augmented cost of production also applies to milk, in the distribution of which, says the report, account must be taken of all "the items of increased cost of living in the case of the retailer, such as taxes, food, clothing, labour, horse-feed, and cans."

Where the Committee are Unanimous.

Each of the twelve members of the Committee signs the report, so we may take it they are unanimously of the opinion that the main causes of high prices lie beyond the region of State control. This belief, whether justified or not, obviously limits the sphere of State action in reducing prices, hence the faltering nature of the remedies proposed. But such as they are, let us examine them.

The Committee urge that private consumers should voluntarily eat less meat, and ask the War Office to consider more economical methods of cooking and serving meat without reducing the amount actually reaching the individual soldier. In other words, the Army is asked not to waste food.

Increase of Supply.

When the Committee approach the question of increasing the supply, they recommend that the slaughtering of any animals in calf, in lamb, or in pig be prohibited. As regards foreign meat, they recommend the development of freezing works in Brazil, in order to still further tap the South American source of supply; and they urge the building of more merchant steamers to bring food to England; and also recommend the importation of dried milk, and summer milk from Ireland.

Limiting the Profits.

There remains to be considered the question of limiting the profits of food distributors, and the Committee recommend that the Government should develop the sources of supply from which they can make direct purchases, and in disposing of the meat purchased for the civil population should impose conditions upon wholesale and retail dealers as would tend to secure the sale of such meat to the public at reasonable prices. The committee also urge that fresh powers should be given to local authorities to open municipal shops when there is any reason to believe that any group of retail traders are using the present abnormal situation to obtain excessive profits; and urge that all local authorities should start a sufficient number of maternity centres, baby clinics, and child nurseries where milk can be provided for children under five and dinners to expectant and nursing mothers. Further, in regard to milk, all wholesale dealers, they say, should be required to furnish to the Board of Agriculture or Board of Trade full details of their contracts with farmers, so that it could be at once seen where and how the profit on milk was being made.

But it is apparent that, with all these recommendations, the Committee do not expect much to be done in the way of reducing prices, for they urge all employers and public bodies to take steps to increase the wages of those employés who have not sufficiently benefited by the general upward movement of wages.

Supplementary Report.

The addenda, signed by seven out of twelve members of the Committee, including the Labour members, suggests that the Government should, where possible, become the sole purchaser of meat and bacon, and should insist upon the purchasing public getting the full benefit of the advantageous buying; and it also recommends the formation of a committee to regulate the price of milk, and act fairly as between the farmers, the distributors, and the public.

So the matter ends, and we can only echo the general expression of disappointment with which the report has been met by the press.

THE WOMAN'S POINT OF VIEW.

By Margaret Llewelyn Davies.

WOMEN who are struggling each week to fit the family budget to the rise in prices will find little comfort or hope in the report of the Food Prices Committee. As winter sets in the privations many women and children in particular are suffering will become more intense. In the face of what working women know to be a real menace, we have a report which even "The Times" confesses to finding "timid."

In the main, the causes of high prices are due to war conditions, such as the shortage of ships, leading to high freights, and the large demands of the army. As regards the cause of "profiteering," which inspires so much resentment, the committee's treatment of this subject is very inadequate. They never seem to realise that "profiteering" does not depend on the existence of "rings," and that the problem is to check individual profit-makers as well as combinations. Discussing cattle dealers' profits, the committee tell us that one of the two British companies which export meat from the River Plate paid a 12 per cent. dividend for 1915, and put £100,000 to the reserve fund, though neither in 1914 or 1913 had that company paid any dividend at all. "However," says the committee (anxious, it seems, to belittle this achievement), "no such profits appear to have been made in the meat-importing trade as in some of the leading war industries." It is impossible for us not to feel that 12 per cent.—and the handsome addition to reserve—is a large profit to make, and it is poor consolation to think that even if meat importers have made this amount, still, compared with the enormous profits others have made, 12 per cent. becomes almost negligible. As regards the action of wholesale and retail dairymen, it would be interesting to hear what co-operative societies have to say.

There are only the most tentative suggestions as regards the Government control of supplies. Vested interests have evidently been too strong to admit of proposals to utilise the co-operative movement, with its technical knowledge and absence of capitalist profit-making, although in France this has been done in the case of frozen meat. Municipal shops are certainly suggested, but in such a way as to be practically useless. As to the "meatless day," it will be well if those who already experience meatless weeks or months can raise a smile.

62.

662/31

Only three recommendations in the main body of the report appear to be of much value. A serious warning is given as to the effect of the continually increasing shortage of labour, which should give pause to the press incitements to withdraw exemption certificates and "comb out" industrial workers. Dock and transport labour is specially referred to, but undoubtedly the position is equally serious with regard to agriculture.

The definite statement that "wages ought to be substantially increased" in the case of those who may be considered "low-paid workers," will, we hope, be taken to heart by those co-operative societies which have not even adopted the Congress female minimum scale. The necessity for higher wages was urged by the Guild in their evidence before the committee.

The Guild also pointed out the serious effect of high prices on maternity, and we are glad to see that our recommendation has been adopted that municipalities should be empowered and urged to supply dinners and milk to expectant and nursing mothers, and children under five, and that the Government grant should be extended to cover this work.

The "Appended Memorandum," signed by seven members, including the representatives of Co-operation, Women, and Labour, shows that the majority of the committee were by no means satisfied with the proposals. It is to be regretted they did not develop a definite scheme on the lines they suggest. One cannot but wonder whether a committee entirely free from Government pressure would not have gone much further.

The lesson of the report is that committees can have little effect against official inertia and vested interests, unless backed by a strong public agitation, such as has been necessary again and again in connection with Naval and Military pensions. Action by co-operators in this direction is now more necessary than ever. Societies should organise labour demonstrations in every town, and resolutions should be sent to Ministers and M.P.'s, urging:—

(1) That the Government should take all taxes off food;

(2) That the Government should control the supply o necessaries—especially milk and coal—and arrange for their distributions through co-operative societies and municipalities.

(3) That Public Health Maternity C committees should be made compulsory, Maternity Centres started where they are not already at work, that dinner s for expectant and nursing mothers, and milk for young children, should be supplied by municipalities with the as sistance of a Govern-ment grant.

"The Overthrow of Individ ualism."

Mr. J. J. Worley (Productive Feder ation), speaking at the Midland Sectional Conference at Ne wark, on Saturday, said the interim report of the Food Co mmission, published that morning, represented the overthr ow of individualism, and the establishment of the co-operat ive principle in this national crisis. What was good enough i n a time of national crises was surely good enough for norma l peace times.

GRAY'S PROTEST.

Government Apathy in Regard t o Food Prices Condemned.

We have received a copy of a resoluti on which was unanimously carried at a large public meet ing held under the auspices of the educational department of the Grays Society to protest against the high food prices. Mr. J. Jones (presi-dent of the society) occupied the chair , and the resolution was spoken to by Mr. George Lansbur y, who aroused tremendous enthusiasm by a powerful spe ech. The resolution was as follows:—"That this meeting records its emphatic protest against the Government's apath y on the question of food prices; condemns the action of the shipowners and others in charging exorbitant rates, and thereby largely increasing the cost of the necessaries of life; and calls upon the Government to take over the cont rol of all shipping, together with the control of food sup plies, so that the nation's resources shall be organised and used in the interest of the community."

MUNICIPAL SHOPS.

Would They Be Able to Serve the Community Better than Co-operative Societies?

Opinions of Well-known Co-operators.

BELOW we give the views of some well-known co-operators on the report of the Departmental Committee, more particularly in reference to municipal shops.

C.W.S. President's Opinion.

MR. T. KILLON.

Mr. T. Killon (president of the Wholesale Society), when asked his opinion regarding municipal shops, said that if they could serve the community better than co-operative societies he would not have the slightest objection to the suggested departure in municipal activity. It was, however, such a big problem that he was afraid the whole system of production and distribution would have to be recast before developments in the direction indicated could take place.

Mr. Fred Hall's Views.

MR. FRED HALL, M.A.

Mr. Fred Hall, M.A. (Adviser of Studies, Co-operative Union), in course of conversation with a member of the "Co-operative "News" staff, said municipal organisation, owing to difficulties created by the war, were not in a position to open out as dealers in general commodities, but they might quite well take up the sale of certain articles, such as milk, meat, bread, and coal, and secure many advantages to the consumer by economising in distribution. He would welcome municipal shops by way of experiment, and if they were successful the co-operative movement would be free to devote its time and attention to other things. But municipal shops meant municipal production, and, to some extent, control of the means of transport; and such an extension of municipal endeavour was too large a subject to be dealt with in a brief interview.

Councillor R. J. Davies.

Councillor R. J. Davies, who presided over the working-class conference held in Manchester on Saturday, drew attention to the recommendation of the Food Prices Committee that, under certain circumstances, the municipalities should open shops for the sale of bread, milk, and meat to the people, and said the adoption of the suggestion would mean that the municipality would control the trade (retail and wholesale) through capitalistic channels, because capitalistic interests were in the majority on most, if not all, of their public bodies. Municipalities were at present utilising profits made through communal control of industry for the relief of the rates of the rich, and that principle would almost certainly be applied to profits made out of municipal bread, milk, and meat shops.

The manager of one co-operative society informed a representative of the "Co-operative News" on Tuesday that his experience was that municipalities could not carry out business undertakings as economically as co-operative societies; and the manager of another society said that, in his opinion, the Food Prices Committee had done all that could be reasonably expected of them.

The Co-operative News
7th 10-16

662/32

662

HAS THE WORKER A CASE?

WHAT HE THINKS ABOUT THE SHOPPING SIDE OF CO-OPERATION.

CONFERENCE OF WORKING-CLASS ORGANISATIONS

PRAISE FOR AND CRITICISM OF THE WHOLESALE SOCIETY.

[From Our Own Reporter.]

Why does not the average working man find his way into the co-operative ranks in bigger numbers? What are his objections? Or, as an alternative question, if he is already in the co-operative movement, why does he not take an active instead of a passive interest in its welfare?

SEVERAL of the retail societies in the Manchester area having a praiseworthy desire to find the answer to these all-important questions, invited the various social organisations in and around the city to send representatives to a conference which was held in the Mitchell Memorial Hall, Balloon-street Manchester, on Saturday last. The attendance was in every way representative of working-class thought, and amongst those present were many whose names are household words in the co-operative, trade union, labour, and brotherhood and P.S.A. movements. Councillor R. J. Davies (chairman of the committee convening the conference) presided, and with him on the platform were other members of the committee, including Mr. A. Taylor (secretary); the principal speakers, Miss Margaret Bondfield (London) and Prof. F. Hall (Adviser of Studies, Co-operative Union); Mr. W. E. Dudley, director of the Co-operative Wholesale Society; and Miss E. M. Bradley (Bolton), who recently began her duties as woman assistant on the staff of the Educational Department of the Co-operative Union.

The Average Man and Co-operation.

The Chairman, in opening the proceedings, enumerated the organisations represented, and described the conference as "probably the most unique ever held under the auspices of the co-operative movement." Proceeding, he said he had been rather surprised at times, when speaking to his friends in the labour movement, to find how uninformed they were of the aims and objects of the co-operative movement and the magnitude of its operations. The average working man seemed to regard the co-operative movement as merely an aggregation of shops, and nothing else; and there were those who believed that if the co-operative movement was going to do anything for the working classes it must stand for something more than purely and simply a shop. (Hear, hear.) The object of the conference was to bring all those movements which could be said to be working-class movements into contact with the retail societies and the Wholesale Society in the district.

Co-operation and the Family.

Miss Bondfield, who took for her subject "Co-operation, and How It Affects the Family," said: "I do not know that there is any subject which is more important to the nation at the present time than the means by which we can maintain the standard of life for the family." She was afraid family life had been disintegrated by the development of the capitalistic or competitive system. It had prevented the bread-winners from having sufficient of the wealth they produced to maintain themselves and the non-producers (the older and younger members of the family) in reasonable comfort. The competitive system, therefore, failed to meet the demands of the community, and that was why the State had to provide old-age pensions, make provision for the feeding of school children, and give financial assistance in times of sickness through the National Health Insurance scheme. The faults of the system were apparent before the war, but since the war it had completely broken down, and had had to be supplanted by co-operative methods and co-operative ideas.

Tragedies Occasioned by High Prices.

Proceeding, Miss Bondfield said the question of food prices was pre-eminently a woman's question, and one which vitally affected the working-class home. She quoted the statistics prepared by the Workers' War Emergency Committee, showing how prices had advanced since May of 1914, and asked what had been the result? Tragedies in hundreds and thousands of working-class households—tragedies which she could not describe, but which they as working men and women were no doubt very familiar with. When prices generally began to rise, co-operative societies kept their prices down until the stocks they held were exhausted, and they took steps to spread the goods they had over as wide an area of their membership as possible, in order that rich members should not have any advantage over the poorer members. She also quoted the prices of the Co-operative Wholesale Society for biscuits and soaps, which were very much lower than general prices, and expressed the belief that, much as the Wholesale Society had done in this direction, it could have done far more had it greater control over raw materials.

A Word to the Women.

The power wielded by women (proceeded Miss Bondfield) was enormous, but she was afraid it was little understood. "We want every working man's wife to buy on principle, just as her husband as a trade unionist sells his labour on principle. (Hear, hear.) If they could get that spirit into the co-operative movement, and reflected on their boards of management, then they would be able to forge ahead much more rapidly than they had done in the past.

A member of the audience, in the discussion which followed, said the rank-and-file of the trade-union movement distrusted the C.W.S., and on his statement being challenged he said it was perfectly true. He said the C.W.S. paid the same rate of wages to non-unionists as they did to unionists; and when the directors decided that every employé in every factory controlled by them should be a member of his particular union, then they would take the first step towards winning the confidence of the rank-and-file of the trade-union movement.

Miss Bondfield said it was lamentably true there was distrust in the trade-union movement regarding co-operative societies and the employment of labour, and suggested that, as members, they were responsible for the conditions of labour which obtained in their societies.

Co-operation and the Worker.

Prof. Hall followed with an address on "How Co-operation Affects the Worker." He asked the question, What does the working man complain about at the present time? He complained about low wages, high prices (which, after all, was only another side of the low wages question), irregular employment, and lack of control over his industrial conditions. He thought it could be safely said that the co-operative movement, so far as it had been true to its ideals and to the extent it had developed, had done something for the worker in regard to those four points. There was little doubt, for instance, that the movement had exercised a beneficial influence on prices during the last two or three years. Only the other day a Cabinet Minister stated that the Government went to the co-operative movement for some idea as to what prices should be. That was a significant tribute to the co-operative movement; and showed that the prices charged by co-operative societies were neither inflated nor exaggerated; and, after all, why should prices be inflated in the co-operative movement? They would only be deceiving their own selves by so doing.

Proceeding, Mr. Hall said that, despite temporary defects in various parts of the co-operative movement, wages paid to co-operative employés were higher than those in similar business undertakings outside the movement. He thought it could also be safely said that employment was more regular inside the co-operative movement than outside; that there was greater desire on the part of co-operative societies to fill in slack times for employés than there

CONSTITUTION OF THE CONFERENCE.

The conference was attended by nearly six hundred delegates, and its constitution was as follows:—

CO-OPERATIVE ORGANISATIONS.

General committees of societies.
Educational committees of societies.
Federal institutions.
Branches of the Women's Guild.
Branches of the Men's Guild.

OUTSIDE ORGANISATIONS.

Executive committees of the Manchester and Gorton Trades Councils and the Manchester and Salford Labour Party, and the branches of the various trade unions affiliated to those organisations.
The Women's Trade Union Council, Women's Trade Union and Labour Council, and the Women's Labour League.
Various P.S.A.'s, Brotherhoods, and Adult Schools in and around the city.
Trade Unions and Friendly Societies which have their central offices in Manchester and Salford.

662/33

was on the part of private firms. In regard to conditions of labour, the co-operative movement might not be as far ahead of outside organisations as it ought to be, but—and he now spoke as one who had visited many undertakings in various parts of the country—he believed the conditions of employment in co-operative establishments were better than those which prevailed in workshops privately owned.

Appeal to the Workers.

Towards the close of his address Mr. Hall ventured to remark that he was inclined to believe that the workers were in the subordinate position they found themselves in to-day because they had not realised the power they possessed, and did not take advantage of opportunities for improving their economic conditions as they came along. Judging by the applause which followed, the audience quite agreed with the remark; in fact, one delegate went so far as to say, "Serve them right."

Concluding, Mr. Hall appealed to the workers of the country to be no longer indifferent to their own welfare, but to intelligently use the force they undoubtedly possessed to effect improvements in their social, economic, and industrial conditions.

Discussion.

Another critic of the Wholesale Scoiety—or rather of its directors—revealed himself in the discussion. He said he had occasion to go on a deputation to the directors, and "they did not seem to think I was much." They gave him the impression that they were a lot of autocrats.

A subsequent speaker stated that in many cases working men could not afford to purchase at the co-operative stores —(hear, hear)—because their prices were much higher than in the ordinary retail shops.

Cries of assent and dissent came from all parts of the room, and before the speaker could resume Mr. Yates (manager of the Failsworth Society) appealed for the quality of co-operative goods to be stated as well as price.

The speaker who raised the question of prices admitted that the quality of goods sold at co-operative stores was excellent, but maintained that the average working man could not afford the price. There was the dividend, but the man could not wait until the end of the quarter for the return on his purchases.

Finest Thing Ever Done.

Mr. Purcell (Manchester and Salford Trades Council) said the finest thing ever done in this country, from an industrial point of view, was done by the Wholesale Society, and that was the sending of a food ship to Dublin. (Hear, hear.) Co-operative societies were not beyond criticism—there were many societies buying goods from blacklegging firms—but that should not discountenance what they did in other ways.

Mr. Sutton (platform) said he realised there was distrust amongst the workers towards the co-operative movement, and that was one of the reasons why they had called that conference. They found it very difficult to deal with that want of confidence because it kept in the background; it did not show itself in the quarterly meeting, and they had to hunt it. He gave instances where the prices of co-operative societies were lower than private traders, and challenged any man in the room to go into the best grocer's shop in the town and spend 10s., and do the same at a co-operative store, and find more than a copper difference between the two transactions.

Mrs. Gordon said it was not only a question of price at the co-operative store; there was also sometimes a want of ordinary civility.

Mr. Hall, in reply, asked those who had criticisms to make regarding the co-operative movement not to stand outside and criticise, but come inside and help to put things right there.

PRESENTATION TO A C.W.S. PRINTER.

An interesting ceremony took place at the C.W.S. Longsight Printing Works premises on Friday evening, September 29th, when the members of the compositors' companionship showed their appreciation of Mr. A. Venn's comradeship. Mr. Venn, who is retiring, has been a member of the companionship for upwards of eleven years. Mr. Hill (father of the chapel) presided. Mr. James Smith (overseer), in a few well-chosen remarks and the recital of some appropriate verses of poetry, presented Mr. Venn with a beautiful lamp (C.W.S.), suitably inscribed, and half-a-pound of tobacco. Mr. George Brearley (manager), as is his wont whenever old employés are leaving, also spoke in the highest terms of Mr. Venn, and recalled the fact that they had worked together some thirty-three years ago. Messrs. Waddington (deputy overseer), W. Frost, and J. Nicol also bore testimony to Mr. Venn's popularity amongst his fellow-workers, and wished him long life and happiness in his new home in Oxfordshire. Mr. Venn thanked them all for the present, and also for their appreciative remarks.

HOW PRICES OF PRIVATE TRADERS ARE CHECKED.

President of the Board of Trade and Co-operation.

The President of the Board of Trade (the Right Hon. W. Runciman, M.P.) paid another tribute to the co-operative movement at Dewsbury last week. Mr. Runciman was dealing with food supplies and prices, and said they (the Government) checked the prices that the private shopkeepers sold their goods at by the prices that were charged in the co-operative stores, and they would be the last to admit that the prices in the co-operative stores were excessive. (Laughter.) Mr. Runciman had for his chairman, by the way, Mr. George Thorpe (director of the Co-operative Wholesale Society).

The Municipality, the Retail Trader, and the C.W.S.

Municipalities might buy more advantageously than the ordinary retailer, but I doubt (says "Dux," in the "Sunday Chronicle") whether they could buy more advantageously than the Co-operative Wholesale Society, and the fact that the co-operative societies can sell at only a fractionally lower price than the ordinary trader (discounting the amount returned in "dividend") is clear evidence that, as a rule, it is not the retailer who is the daylight robber.

Miss Margaret Bondfield.

Miss Margaret Bondfield (London), who was one of the principal speakers, said the chairman had referred to the likelihood of municipal shops being a menace to co-operative trading. It was just possible, if the co-operative movement was sufficiently extensive to have butchery and grocery shops in every town, village, and hamlet, its machinery would be used by the State for distributive purposes. That would be a very practical and a very sensible thing, but in the absence of that extension (for which the working classes themselves were mainly responsible), and in the absence of that complete machinery, she doubted whether it would be wise to set themselves against the idea of municipal trading.

THE CO-OPERATIVE PRESS IN WAR-TIME.

Owing to the pressure of the reports of many conferences this week and the Government restriction on the supply of paper, we are reluctantly compelled to hold over several special articles, a number of reports, and many letters, whilst the reports appearing have had to be curtailed according to the space at our disposal.

We want societies to realise the position in which the "Co-operative News," in common with all other newspapers, is placed at present, and how impossible it is to carry out the improvements and developments which were in contemplation when the war broke out.

When more normal times come round, however, we shall have several proposals to place before societies with a view to making the "Co-operative News" into an organ fully representative of the movement in every sense. Meanwhile, we have to solicit the forbearance of correspondents and readers until these better times are with us.

At the same time we want societies to realise the increased need there will be, after the war, for a strong co-operative press to resist the efforts which capitalism will make to get its strangle-hold upon the great mass of the workers.

Co-operators should now be considering how best to increase the circulation of the "Co-operative News." We shall have something to say on this point very shortly.

ROCHDALE PIONEERS.—The committee wish to thank all applicants for the position of butchering department manager, and to intimate that the vacancy has now been filled.

ROYAL ARSENAL.—The committee desire to thank all applicants who responded to the recent advertisement for a chief clerk to the society. An appointment has now been made.

HOURS OF LABOUR.—With the putting back of the clock to normal time, the employés of the Andover Society (Hants) have had their hours of labour reduced. In future the shops will be closed half-an-hour earlier on Monday, Tuesday, Thursday, and Friday, and an hour sooner on Saturday. The difference for the week is three hours. For this concession the employés have expressed their thanks to the committee.

Mark Lane Express.
9.10.16

662

KENT.

EXECUTIVE MEETING.

Mr. B. Champion presided at a meeting of the Kent Executive of the National Farmers' Union held at the offices of the Kent Branch, Maidstone, on Thursday. There were also present Messrs. W. H. Skinner (Boughton Monchelsea), T. E. Clifford (Eastchurch), H. Stonham (Plaxtol), S. H. Little (Borough Green), W. Reaveare (Staplehurst), W. A. Judge (Tenterden), R. S. Stroute (Ashford), J. A. Raynham (Marden), W. F. Wood (Sittingbourne), W. Goodwin (Leigh), E J. Overy (Paddock Wood), C. Simmonds (East Peckham), E. W. Wood (Rochester), A. J. Hickman (Egerton), Jesse Weeks (Cranbrook), J. Fife (Kemsing), R. Mitchell (Sevenoaks), J. Dyson Laurie (Sevenoaks), P. B. Cardwell (Edenbridge), H. Steven (Edenbridge), John Watson (Rochester), and A. Skinner (Cranbrook), with Messrs. H. G. Chambers and P. W. Cox (hon. secretaries).

The Sheep Dipping Order.

Mr. Cox having read a letter from the clerk to the county council, stating that the Sheep Dipping Order had been revoked.

Mr. Stroute said his point at the last meeting was that the Order had been relaxed in some districts. He was pretty certain that a great many lambs sent to the sales at Ashford this year had been dipped.

The Chairman: Do we as a body of farmers want the authorities gingered up in this matter?

Mr. Stroute: Personally I am very strongly in favour of the Order.

After some discussion it was agreed that Mr. Cox should communicate with the Board of Agriculture, asking for the enforcement of the Order next year, so as to prevent the exposure of undipped sheep and lambs at sales.

The Price of Milk.

A letter was received from Mr. H. W. Palmer, General Secretary of the Union, on the question of the price of milk. It was generally agreed, he said, that any retail price above 6d. per quart would be fatal, not only from the economical point of view, but also because public opinion in that case would compel the Government to step in. The difficulty was that wholesale merchants were determined not to give more than 1s. 3d. per gallon, and farmers would not take less than 1s. 5d. He suggested a compromise at 1s. 4d., which, if agreed to, would save trouble.

One or two members stated that 1s. 6d. per gallon was now the wholesale price in their districts, the retail price being 6d. per quart. Some of the retailers could not get enough even at 1s. 6d.

It was agreed that Mr. Palmer's letter should lie on the table.

The Valuers' Association.

The Secretary reported that Mr. Clements, of Ashford, was willing to act as a delegate from the Union to the Valuers' Association, but Mr. Rogers had demurred on account of the conditions.

Mr. Rogers was pressed to accept nomination, but finally declined to do so.

The Military and Farm Labour.

Mr. Cox having reported the result of an interview he had had with Mr. Acland with regard to the taking of farm hands for military service,

The Chairman remarked that if there was to be substitution, farmers did not want a young skilled wagoner taken and replaced by a wounded or unfit man who perhaps had never had anything to do with horses. They wanted to get their own men back on the farms if they were not required for foreign service.

The Secretaryship.

Mr. H. G. Chambers having, to the great regret of the whole of the members, intimated his intention to relinquish the hon. secretaryship at the end of the year,

Mr. Stroute, on behalf of the Ashford Branch, reopened the question of the appointment of a paid secretary. He said the opinion of his branch was just as strong as it was in March last, when they first brought the question forward. They felt that if they could not pay a man sufficient to devote his whole time to the work they ought to come to some arrangement for paying a sum for clerical assistance. The work of the Union had become very big, and there were a number of district branches that needed to be helped up. If they had a paid secretary he would be able to go round the country doing propaganda work, with the result that their membership would increase and subscriptions would be got in more satisfactorily than was the case at present. He moved a recommendation to the annual meeting to the effect that a secretary be appointed to undertake the collection of outstanding subscriptions attend branch meetings, and carry out propaganda work generally, and that he be paid £75 per annum for clerical assistance, a small sub committee to draft a report on the details of the duties to be undertaken. The speaker added that the Ashford Branch desired to see the present assistant hon. secretary (Mr. Cox) appointed if he would take the office.

Mr. Wood seconded the motion.

Mr. Chambers spoke in support of the resolution, and endorsed the suggestion that Mr. Cox, who had practically done all the work for six months, should be appointed. His (the speaker's) only doubt was as to how they were going to continue paying a secretary with their present subscription of ½d per acre. He suggested that the subscription should be doubled.

The Chairman said that whatever happened they could not afford to lose the services of Mr. Chambers, who had done more for the National Farmers' Union in Kent than any other member. He thought, therefore, that they should ask him to accept the vice-chairmanship at the annual meeting (Hear, hear)

Mr. Cardwell said the Edenbridge Branch considered that they must be prepared to pay £150 per year in salary, to say nothing of the provision of a motor bicycle.

Mr. Judge did not agree that the present subscription was not sufficient to justify them in paying a secretary. The weakness of their machinery at present was that the ½d per acre was not collected. The speaker gave details of the financial position of the Ashford Branch, and added that he did not think there could be better evidence that ½d. per acre was sufficient.

Mr. Dyson Laurie suggested that £50 should be allowed purely for clerical assistance, and that over and above that sum the secretary should receive out-of-pocket expenses.

After some further discussion Mr. Cox intimated that he would be prepared to accept the appointment and do his best at £75. He said he had the interests of the Farmers' Union very much at heart, but he confessed that, as a man with his own business to look after, his conscience was not quite easy with regard to what he was now doing.

The Chairman having said that the £75 must be regarded as a payment for clerical assistance, and that out-of-pocket expenses must be met, the resolution was carried by a unanimous vote, the chairman and vice-chairman (Mr. Wood), and the chairman and secretary of the Ashford Branch, with Mr. Dyson Laurie, being appointed the sub-committee.

Parliamentary Representation.

The following resolution from the Sevenoaks Branch was next considered: "That the Sevenoaks Branch of the National Farmers' Union, realising the paramount necessity of direct representation in the House of Commons, urges that immediate steps be taken by the County Executive so as to guarantee an adequate Parliamentary Fund being available for the purpose of supporting one or more suitable representatives of the National Farmers' Union at the next General Election, and recommends that a minimum subscription of 1s. per member be levied for the current year." In moving the resolution, Mr. Dyson Laurie, said that in April, 1914, a circular was sent out appealing for subscriptions to the Parliamentary Fund, and the sum of £19 was collected, but in 1915, apparently, nothing at all was received. The Sevenoaks Branch felt that there should be a national fund, and that every member should contribute something. They had made a start at Sevenoaks, and had not met with a single refusal.

Mr. Judge undertook that the Ashford Branch would do its utmost in support of the Parliamentary Fund. The next two or three years would be fraught with the biggest problems for agriculture farmers had ever had to face, and yet they had not a single direct representative in the House of Commons.

The Chairman pointed out that they could not legally make a levy for a Parliamentary Fund; any contributions from members must be voluntary.

Mr. Cardwell suggested that members should contribute at the rate of 10 per cent. of their subscriptions to the Union.

Mr. Hickman seconded the resolution.

Mr. Skinner moved that the word "raised" should be substituted for the word "levied."

The amendment was agreed to, and the resolution, as amended, was eventually carried.

Air Raid Damage.

A member having asked for information as to the position of a tenant farmer holding a repairing lease in the event of his buildings being damaged or destroyed during an air raid, it was agreed that the point should be placed before the hon. legal adviser for his ruling.

Trained or Untrained Women.

Miss Edith Bradley, the official organiser of women's labour for Kent and Sussex, invited an expression of opinion from the meeting as to desirability or otherwise of women being trained for farm work. Addressing the members, she explained that the question had arisen in connection with the work of the Women's County Committees. There was to be a conference in London of representatives from the counties of Kent, Surrey, and Sussex, at which it was desired to outline their future policy, and it was hoped there would be a federation of the three counties for the purposes of future action. In Sussex, Miss Bradley added, there was a desire that there should be an arrangement for training women, but in West Kent a different view prevailed.

The Chairman thought that where there were cows to be milked the training of women was desirable, but he did not think training was necessary in a general way.

Mr. Judge took the same view, while Mr. Raynham expressed himself in favour of general training.

Mr. Chambers said his experience was that women needed very little training. Set to do certain work and shown how to do it, they succeeded very quickly.

Mr. Wood expressed himself in agreement with the chairman's view, holding that women did not need training for general work, but Mr. Hickman thought that a little training for women, whatever they had to do, was better than no training at all.

On a show of hands the majority of the members declared themselves in favour of training.

Daily Express
no date given

Daily Express
11-10-16

662

662/35

SOLDIERS' WIVES WANT MORE MONEY.

NOT ENOUGH TO FEED THE CHILDREN.

OUT-OF-DATE SCALE.

The War Workers' Emergency Committee have just appointed a sub-committee to consider the question of increasing the separation allowances to soldiers' wives, with a view of initiating a campaign in this direction.

It is contended that the scale of allowances which was fixed in 1914, when the cost of living had increased only 17 per cent., were either too high then or was too low now, when the cost of living has increased 68 per cent. among the working classes, who, unlike the well-to-do, cannot effect any material economies by lopping off the superfluities of pre-war days.

"Something must be done for the great army of brave, self-denying women," said Miss Mary R. Macarthur (wife of Mr. W. C. Anderson, M.P.), hon. secretary of the Central Committee of Women's Employment, and a member of the Prince of Wales' Committee, to a "Daily Express" representative.

"A serious domestic crisis confronts the country to-day, and unless the State, even for the State's sake—to say nothing of the nation's obligation to the soldiers' families—enables the mothers to nourish their children properly and bring them up respectably, then the physical and moral fibre of the race must deteriorate.

"The hardest case, strange as it may seem, is that of the woman with one child, who has no margin for the exercise of ingenuity in 'making a little go a long way.'

"You cannot properly feed a child a year old to-day on less than 7s. a week, of which 4s. 6d. will go probably in milk alone—and I know what I am talking about, for I have one. I could read you extracts from hundreds of letters—pitiful human documents—in which mothers beg for work so that they may feed their little ones better; and, of course, if a soldier's wife goes out to work, she must either neglect her children or pay some one to look after them.

"The following is the scale of allowances as last adjusted in February 1915:—

Private or corporal's wife	12s. 6d.
With one child	17s. 6d.
With two children	21s. 0d.
With three children	23s. 0d.

"After that she receives 2s. for every other child under the age of sixteen, and in London there is an additional grant of 3s. 6d. a week for rent. Included in these allowances is 3s. 6d. taken off her soldier husband's pay.

"With staple food at normal prices, this would barely suffice for health and comfort, but considered in connection with the great rise in the cost of living, it is sadly inadequate.

" not whining or exaggerating. The for themselves. It is the cry of I hear—the children who are f the State. tell me that attend

STARVED BY THE STATE.

FOOD PRICES RISE; SEPARATION ALLOWANCES DO NOT.

A large number of soldiers' wives and widows have written to the "Daily Express" supporting the statement made by Miss Mary R. Macarthur in our issue of Monday last regarding the insufficiency of separation allowances, in view of the greatly increased cost of living.

"A Widow of War" writes from Hayes End that she is allowed 12s. 6d. for herself and 10s. 6d. for her three children, and asks: "How is it possible for me to clothe, shoe, and feed them on that money and make them strong now that food is so dear? It takes half the money to pay the baker, and then there is the weekly rent.

"A poor woman gets little to heal her wound after giving her all to the country. When I had my husband we all had good food, and it grieves me much to see my children living so poorly."

A Norwich soldier's wife says: "I have three big growing children, and all our days are meatless. We never know the taste of butter. With milk at fivepence a quart, I have to make a small tin of condensed milk do all the week, and never have a penny over to pay for a tram fare, let alone to go to pictures."

Writing on behalf of his wife and family, "Joined up—1914" says: "I have three children, one four years, the other two at school. My wife receives 24s. 9d. per week, including my weekly allotment of 5s. 3d. Out of this she has to pay 5s. rent and 2s. 6d. week clothing club. Can anybody tell me how she can feed four persons—except in semi-starvation fashion—on 17s. 3d. a week, including coal and lighting?"

IV.

Kom. Gen.: Gen. d. C
ABI BM

Chef d. Gen. Stabes
3 B2

A minor controversy has arisen on inferiority in the Somme battles. T paper called this General "von Ar proving conclusively that the name v afterwards War Minister at the time now in command of the Germans at the names are at

Morning Post
26. 2. 17

WOMEN AND RATIONING.

THE BREAD ALLOWANCE FOR THE POOR.

A conference of working women on the question of "Food Rationing" was held on Saturday at the Central Hall, Westminster. Mrs. J. H. Barker, who presided, said this was a question between the State and the individual and not one in which the co-operative societies could do much. If it was really true that there was no more grain and flour in the country than would admit of an allowance of more than 4lb. of bread or 3lb. of flour for each person, they must make up their minds to grin and bear it, but when the brewing of 10,000,000 barrels of beer was to be allowed annually it did not seem reasonable to limit the supply of bread and flour to the amounts suggested. People who could afford 2½lb. of meat per head per week could manage with 4lb. of bread a week, but for the poor who could not afford to buy meat the bread allowance was absolutely insufficient. It was also essential that adequate arrangements should be made for the distribution of three-quarters of a pound of sugar per head per week on an equitable basis. (Hear, hear.)

Mrs. M. Clarke (Women's Labour League) moved a comprehensive resolution, declaring that the proposed meat ration is more than the majority of working class families can afford, though not greater than their needs; that there is urgent necessity for improving the present system of distributing sugar; that the ration of 4lb. of bread per head per week is far less than sufficient, and that as the provision of substitutes would entail expenditure of fuel and time which working women can ill afford, it is necessary that available supplies of bread should be distributed in such a way as to give a larger share to working class families where there are many children or workers engaged in heavy physical toil. (Hear, hear.)

Living by Bread Alone.

She said that in the East End of London many of the people lived by bread alone with a little margarine spread on it now and then, and mothers and children frequently went short of food in order to keep up the strength of the hard-working father. Poor persons could not afford to pay the present prices, exceeding a shilling a pound for such meat as neck of mutton and shin of beef which they could formerly get for a few pence per lb.; nor could they afford to pay as much as 2s. apiece for rabbits. In these circumstances the bread ration of the poor should be doubled, and raised to at least 8lb. per head per week. In view of his attitude towards the dockers in the past and of the fact that he was head of a great food-producing firm, no confidence was felt in Lord once there would be trouble in the poorer districts of London similar to that which was being experienced in Germany and America. (Hear, hear.)

An amendment sent in the name of the Kensington Branch of the Independent Labour Party urging that in view of the world shortage of food the Government should without delay obtain peace by negotiations was ruled out of order on the ground that the meeting had been convened with the special object of discussing the question of the feeding of the nation and not the question of a possible peace by negotiation.

After considerable discussion, in the course of which adverse personal experience of the rationing system was expressed, the resolution was adopted unanimously.

Municipal Milk Supply and Kitchens.

A second resolution was also passed at the instance of Mrs. Hood, representing the Women's Co-operative Guild, urging the Government to take over the milk supply and arrange for its distribution by municipalities in conjunction with co-operative societies; that it should be made compulsory for municipalities to provide dinners and milk for mothers and young children on the order of a doctor, and that the Government should immediately bring in the Bill promised last autumn, as the delay is causing great suffering and injury to health.

Another resolution adopted suggested that in order to secure the more economical use of the available supplies municipal kitchens at which food could be bought at cost price should be established.

Weekly Dispatch
25. 2. 17

FOOD PROBLEM COMES HOME.

Working women demanded at Westminster (1) better sugar distribution, (2) more bread for working-class families engaged in heavy toil, (3) a Government milk supply, and (4) municipal kitchens.

Miss Mary MacArthur said she was convinced that the present system of voluntary rationing was no good whatever.

She wished she could command words sufficiently grave to convey her fear for the future, and especially in regard to the children.

People
25. 2. 17

662/36

662

WORKING WOMEN & FOOD RATIONS.

Meat Allowance Declared to be More than They Can Afford—Bread Allowance Said to be Inadequate.

Specially Written for "The People" by Dr. MARION PHILLIPS, Secretary of the Women's Labour League.

Within the last few weeks the nation has approached a food crisis of the most serious kind. Everywhere there is talk of the possibilities of the food supply running short. So far as the working people are concerned there are many families which have gone short for a long time because the high cost of foodstuffs has been prohibitive. The faulty distribution of sugar, with the iniquitous system of selling it only to those who buy a certain supply of other goods, has created something very near sugar famine, although at the same time we have been told that there is enough for each of us to have 1lb. a week and sweets and beer and jam and aerated waters as well! Milk has gone up in price so that it has become still more of a luxury for the children in working-class families than it was in the bad old days before the war that was to make us all brothers and sisters sharing equally in the country's wealth.

Poor People Hit Hard.

The rising price of bread has hit the people very hard. With the cost of other foods at famine rates, bread has become more than ever the staple of the meals of the poorer folk. It means a saving of fuel as well as money; it saves time, too, where a mother has had to go out to earn, or is already overdriven by work at home. The Women's Labour League felt as soon as Lord Devonport's proposed system of voluntary rationing was made public that the time had come for working women to meet together and discuss the situation. From this resolve the conference of representatives of women's industrial organisations, which took place yesterday, quickly grew. I think the view of the league itself may be put very briefly and simply in these terms: If it is true that there is only enough of the staple foods in the country to go round in this way, then we have to consider in the first place how working people are going to manage on it.

Dr. Marion Phillips.

Working Woman's "No!"

There will always be much less difficulty for the well-off. Rations are not going to cover every kind of expensive food, but only the staple foods. The well-off people can use substitutes for three reasons; first, they can pay high prices for them; second, they can spend the necessary money in fuel; third, they can pay for the labour and time spent in their preparation. But the working people are handicapped in all these ways, and they depend so largely for their supplies on the staple foods themselves that any system of rationing, if it is to keep them in health, must allow sufficient under the rations themselves to do that. Do these proposals of Lord Devonport do that? The working woman's answer, so far, is a very definite "No."

The meat is more than she can afford to buy in an ordinary case. The sugar she could do with well enough, if only she could get it, but the bread simply doesn't go round.

Take, for instance, an inquiry recently conducted by the Women's Labour League into bread consumption. The League asked, "Can you do with less bread?" The answers were invariably, "No, because owing to the high price we have cut it down as far as we possibly can." The consumption of bread amongst healthy working-class children and workers, especially those engaged in physical toil, is often double the proposed ration.

Meat and Milk.

There are many cases where there is practically no consumption of meat, but where the bread is more than 8lb. per person per week. On the other hand, amongst well-to-do people the 4lb. ration, even though it include flour, is more than the usual amount save where wasteful methods are rampant. The working woman is ready enough to have any modifications made in the wheaten loaf. But what she wants is a good nourishing food ready cooked and at a reasonable price in the form of bread of some kind. If there is not more than enough to do this 4lb. a person ration, then she is of opinion that the hard workers and the children should have first say, and that the rest should have a smaller amount. As to meat, she would like to be able to buy more, but is so used to doing with less that she is not anxious about it. But she does want to feel some security as to the milk supply. This is of such importance to the young of the nation that she wants to see it given freely to those who cannot afford the present price, and who have real need, for health's sake, of regular supplies. The nursing mothers and the infants are the first consideration here and the others should get only what is left over if scarcity exists.

Communal Cooking.

There is, however, one way in which an enormous saving of essential supplies might well be made, and that is by the institution of communal cooking by the municipalities. By means of this system, the municipalities would establish central kitchens and distributing centres at which cooked food would be sold, without profit, to all who wished to buy it. Porridge, soups, stews, puddings would be the main supplies, and the kitchens could also have experimental and advisory sections for encouraging the use of foods that could best be spared from our national store. The saving in quantities, costs, fuel and time would be enormous, the difficulty of popularising new foods would be minimised, because they would be properly cooked from the first, and the Food Controller would have a ready means through them of recommending all sorts of economies. To these communal kitchens the League looks with great hope. They appear to them to supply a much needed help to the situation without in any way injuring the comforts of home. The food would be carried there and made hot there, and the workers of the family and the children would thus get what they needed and yet have the quiet and controlling influence of the home unimpaired. The scheme is thus wholly different from the many ideas put forward for feeding the people (meaning always the poorest of the people, since the others would avoid it), in great common dining-halls.

A Fair Distribution.

The Women's Labour League is by no means blind to the necessity for care and economy. Its members have always, in peace as well as in war, had to practise it.

But they are cautious now that the available supplies shall be made to go as far as possible, and they are convinced that in any ordinary scheme of rationing the hardship falls too heavily on the working folks and too lightly on others.

They want equality of sacrifice as far as possible, for the working people depend for their livelihood upon strength of body, and food is essential to maintain it. They recognise however that food tickets may well be a necessity for the chief articles of diet. They have long urged that they should be used for sugar, and they fear that for bread they will be necessary too. But let the distribution be fair and take in the special needs of the small wage-earners, the young children, the large families, and the hard workers!

Middlesex county rate is up to 3d.

The Duke of Connaught has presented a memorial bedroom in the extension of the Union Jack Club.

Morning Post
2-7-17

662/37 662

PREMIER'S WARNING.

FOOD PROFITEERING TO BE STOPPED.

GOVERNMENT ACTION.

NECESSARY WAR SACRIFICES.

The Prime Minister was on Saturday presented with the Freedom of Dundee. The ceremony took place in the Kinnaird Hall, which was filled with an audience numbering about two thousand. Lord Provost Don presided, and among others on the platform were Mrs. Lloyd George, Mr. Winston Churchill, Senior Member for the City, Mr. Robert Munro, M.P., Secretary for Scotland, Mr. Ian Macpherson, M.P., Under Secretary for War, Mr. J. W. Pratt, M.P., and Mr. MacCallum Scott, M.P. The Lord Provost, in presenting the Freedom, spoke of Mr. Lloyd George's eminent services to the State, particularly since the outbreak of war.

THE SPEECH.

Mr. Lloyd George, on rising to reply, was received with great cheers. He said: I have first of all to thank you for the great honour you have conferred upon me in making me a citizen of your famous city. It is indeed a distinction to have your name inscribed in that book—the oldest book of citizenship I have had the privilege of signing—containing such distinguished names in the past history of this country. The Lord Provost, in the much too kind words he has used about me in concluding his speech, referred to the noble part which Dundee had taken in the great struggles of Scottish freedom; and freedom is a refrain which is constantly repeated in the rugged music of Scottish history. He has told you that William Wallace started his great struggle here. We in Wales are accustomed to boast that William Wallace was really William of Wales—(laughter)—and that he came from that part of the world. (Renewed laughter.) However that may be, it is appropriate that at a time when the whole forces of this country are engaged in the greatest struggle for human freedom that the world has ever witnessed, that I should come here to Dundee—the home of freedom, the citadel of freedom—which during the whole of its career has devoted its strength to every struggle for freedom that Scotland has ever taken part in. (Cheers.) The Lord Provost has been good enough to refer to two or three of the operations in which I have been engaged, and in which I took a leading part in the prosecution of this war—the part I took in the great financial crisis which threatened us at the beginning of the war. I think the lesson of the measures we took then was this: that in war you must not be afraid of doing things which have never been done before. (Cheers.) After we have learnt that in war I hope we will remember that perhaps there is a lesson even for peace. (Cheers.)

Sufficient Reserve of Munitions.

The boldest measures are often the safest. With regard to munitions, the story—which, I think, in the words of Dr. Addison is a romantic story, of the way in which the people of this country organised and mobilised their resources for war—was told by my friend, the Minister of Munitions, in the House of Commons the other day. We have now such a reserve where at one time we were short that even the German submarine, whatever it does, cannot deprive us of the necessary munitions for prosecuting the war to a successful termination. (Cheers.) As an old Minister of Munitions, as well as the head of the Government, I take this opportunity of thanking officials and employers and workmen for the great part they have taken in the successful gathering together of a sufficient stock of ammunition to make the prospect of this country secure throughout the war. (Cheers.) Especially I thank that large body of volunteers, men drawn from every kind of business and profession throughout the land, and from every corner of the land, who, when I began organising the Ministry of Munitions, came freely and without reward, except that which comes from a sense of having discharged your duty to your country, came and placed their services at the disposal of the State and helped us to organise that great effort. (Cheers.) Naturally there were a good many Scotsmen amongst them. (Laughter.) We cannot get on without them—(hear, hear)—this race which, by its virility and intelligence, has taken a part in the government of the Empire and the fashioning of its destinies far beyond its numbers. Sir William Weir, Sir Ernest Moir, John Hunter, Sir William Stevenson, and, I believe, Sir Eric Geddes is also a Scotsman. (Cheers.) There is a list of men who rendered conspicuous service to the British Empire, and I am very glad to repeat their names in the presence of their fellow-countrymen. (Cheers.) It is my special pride, in reference to munitions, that from the first I advocated a great programme of big guns and superabundant missiles for the purpose of destroying the barbed wire and the trenches of the enemy. As Minister of Munitions I had to make enormous arrangements for manufacture on a great scale. At the time it was subject to a good bit of criticism, much of it rather forceful, but I think that is past. (Cheers.) There is no doubt that the fact that we have got such a number of big guns of the heaviest necessary that we should have a sense of unity in the nation—a sense of unity which makes us feel that every man in it ought not merely as a sense of duty, but ought to be delighted to do what he can to help the nation in the hour of peril to achieve its greatest purpose. (Cheers.) If the objectives of the war are imperative enough and exalted enough to justify us in calling upon our best young men, the flower of our land, to risk terror, torture, and death on the battlefield, yea, and the dreary discomfort of the life behind the battlefield, then surely it is enough to justify us, who are living comfortably at home, being summoned by the State to make any sacrifice within our power to assist these gallant fellows who are fighting for us. (Loud cheers.) I draw a distinction between privation and deprivation. There have been no privations in this country yet. (Cheers.) There are in Germany; there are in Austria, and they are still fighting. Is British patriotism of a poorer quality than the patriotism of Germany?

No Cause for Complaints at Home.

What do I mean by drawing a distinction between privation and deprivation? I will give you a simple illustration what is a deprivation. Let us say a man was in the habit of getting three glasses of whisky a day—(laughter)—and owing to Government regulations he can only get one. Well, that may or may not be a deprivation. (Laughter.) I express no opinion. (Laughter.) Supposing that a man were in the habit of getting three meals a day and he were reduced to one—now that is a privation. (Laughter and cheers.) Don't let us mistake and confound the one for the other. When we are restricted, when we are limited in our luxuries, because I assume Scotch whisky is a luxury—(laughter)—when we are limited don't let us give ourselves the airs of the men who are enduring insufferable tortures for the sake of our native land. The complaints are not coming from the men who are facing real sacrifices. (Cheers.) They are full of joy, they are full of cheer—yes, when they had a worse time even than they have now. If you drove through France and saw them—their faces were like stars in a black wintry night—full of brightness and cheer. These are not the men who are growling, and when you get these men, facing death every day, full of heart, full of confidence, full of everything but complaints, we ought to be ashamed that there are any complaints at home. (Cheers.) But the country is entitled to ask from the Government under those conditions at least three things: That its commands and restrictions, and limitations shall have a genuine war purpose—(cheers)—that they shall not be imposed merely for ulterior purposes, associated with some theory or conception, the way in which the world ought to be run under normal conditions—(hear, hear)—the measures must be war measures, and in war measures I include demobilisation after the war because I consider that an essential part of the war purpose.

War Measures.

I will give you an illustration of what I mean. We have practically stopped house-building. Well, now there is no man in this country who thinks that house-building is a bad thing in itself. I have heard of many associations for all kinds of impossible purposes, but I never heard of an association to stop house-building. (Laughter.) Therefore, I take it that there is something that everybody agrees is in itself a beneficent object. We have had to stop it. Why? It takes too much labour. It takes material which is essential for war purposes. It takes transport, which you cannot possibly spare. If you permit house-building it interferes with the prosecution of the war. Therefore, to stop that is an essential war measure. I apply the same principle to every restriction which is introduced. Take, if you like—it is rather a debatable restriction—that in regard to horse-racing. There are people, I believe, who disapprove of horse-racing. I neither approve nor disapprove. I have absolutely no views of any sort or kind on the subject of horse-racing. But the question whether it is good or bad in itself has nothing to do with the action of the Government. It is entirely a question of the extent to which you can permit it without interfering with the war work and war activity of the country. Anything beyond that is irritating and mischievous. Anything short of that is not adequate to the needs of the case. The one test is—is it necessary as a war measure? I dare not mention the other topic. (Laughter.) But if you apply these principles to the question of drink you will find that these principles will work out all right. The whole question is now. After the war is a different matter. We can discuss afterwards our theories. The whole test now of any proposal made by the Government with regard to drink is to what extent it is necessary for the prosecution, the successful prosecution, of the war. That is the test we propose to apply. To a certain extent we have applied it. To what greater extent we have to apply it will depend entirely upon the way the food of the country stands at a given moment. No man in his senses would sacrifice the food of the people to any drink, however alluring it may be. (Cheers.) The second condition which I think the country is entitled to ask from the Government is that they will not permit the burdens of the country to be increased by what they call profiteering. (Cheers.)

Profiteering.

Although I have been criticised for using that word—I believe on the whole it is a rather good one—(laughter)—it is profiteering as distinguished from profiting. (Laughter and cheers.) What do I mean by profiting? Profiting is fair recompense for services rendered either in production or distribution. Profiteering is an extravagant recompense given for services rendered. I believe that to be unfair in peace. In war it is an outrage. (Cheers.) That is why we have taken action, very necessary action, to restrict the profits of shipping—which I think were a perfect scandal in the first two years of the war—profits in mines, and we propose to deal very drastically with unfair profiteering in food. (Cheers.) That brings me to the third condition. Food must be brought within the reach of the people. The worst method of enforcing economy is by extravagant prices. It means provoking discontent. It means, in addition to that, that the poorer the people the more they will suffer. High prices are inevitable in war—nothing you will do can prevent that. One reason is many have gone up very the glorious splendour of spring was upon the earth, and I knew France was free. I tell you now, although the winter tarries the springtide of victory will come. (Loud and prolonged cheers.)

TRIBUTE TO WOMEN WAR WORKERS.

The Prime Minister was subsequently entertained at luncheon in the Albert Galleries. Mr. Ian Macpherson, Under Secretary for War, replying to the toast of the Imperial Forces, expressed his own personal feeling of pride in what the War Office had done. In three short years we had created the greatest Army, the most efficient Army, the most daring Army, and the most brilliant Army which was fighting for us in every corner of the world. (Cheers.)

Mr. Lloyd George, responding to the toast of "Our Youngest Burgess," said: One of the pleasantest memories of my life will be my trip to Scotland on this occasion, when the citizens of the great city of the West—Glasgow—gave me a reception of the kindest and warmest and most cordial description. When I came to your great city I found the same kindly welcome that is always associated with Scottish hospitality. The Lord Provost has said you are proud of your city. You may well be. It is not merely its fame in history it is great for. It is associated with great events in Scottish history. In this war you have made a contribution in material and in men. As far as the material is concerned, I believe a great deal of work has been done by the women of Dundee. The sandbags which have been turned out at Dundee have been about the most valuable protectors of the lives of our fellows at the front, and the shell factory at Dundee, with which I had something to do in the starting, has been one of the great successes of the war. Not only has it come up to the quota we laid down for it, but has considerably exceeded it. I congratulate those who are associated with that institution for the great success of the work which they have turned out there. I believe the factory is worked by women operatives. It is surely part of the debt which we owe to the women of this country in this war. (Cheers.) I do not know what would have happened to this land when the men had to go away fighting if the women had not come forward and done their share of the work. (Cheers.) I have always been in favour of giving them the vote, though they used to worry me a good deal when I said so. (Laughter and cheers.) But I am more convinced than ever that I was right then. Their contribution to the defence of the country has been simply incalculable. (Cheers.) It would have been utterly impossible for us to have waged a successful war had it not been for the skill, the enthusiasm, and the industry which the women of the country have thrown into the work of the war. (Cheers.)

The Black Watch.

But Dundee has made a great contribution in men. No city in the Empire has made a greater contribution. (Cheers.) This is the home and the centre of one of the most famous fighting regiments in the world, the Black Watch. (Cheers.) I do not think throughout the world there is a better known name than that of the Black Watch. They are known for deeds and achievements which are part of the history of this country. It is a great record. There has hardly a great battle been fought in France but the men of Dundee have achieved distinction and fame, not merely for themselves and their native country, but for the Empire. That is true of the Scottish regiments throughout. (Cheers.) How proud Scotsmen must be of their gallant sons in the war. Well have they upheld the fame of their native land. It is not merely the Allies who know what Scotsmen have done. Our enemies know it, too, and they know it to their cost. (Cheers.) There is a temple—I think it is in Italy—where the marble has been drawn from many lands. The temple of liberty is now being constructed. The marble out of which it is built is drawn from many countries, and cemented by blood of men of many races. But for ever in that fabric conspicuously will stand granite hewn out of the rocks of Scotland. (Loud cheers.)

Mr. Churchill and the Nation's Strength.

Mr. Winston Churchill, replying for the Houses of Parliament, said he had been asking himself what was the personal quality and characteristic which the Prime Minister had displayed during this war which had enabled him to render the services he had done. In his view it was his power of not allowing himself to be diverted by the innumerable multitude of superficial incidents and phenomena which in every direction, on every hand, confused and baffled the eye, and on being able to search patiently and penetratingly for those deep underlying causes which far beneath the surface were affecting the movement and decision of the events of the war, and would ultimately settle the fate and destinies of the nations of the world. (Cheers.) This was a time when public men in official situations required and had a right to the help, comfort, the sympathy, and support so far as it might be rightly given of all. The Houses of Parliament had from the beginning of the war—he did not speak of cliques or factions, but of the Houses of Parliament—had had since the beginning of the war only one object in view, namely, to provide a stable and sure platform for wise and valiant executive action. And so there was no opposition. His right hon. friend was fortunate in having as leader of the party of those who sat opposite to him a man like Mr. Asquith. (Cheers.)

The Situation Reviewed.

Proceeding, Mr. Churchill said: The situation in which we stand is a grave one, and it would be foolish not to look it plainly and boldly in the face. If we look back on the position as it was when I last had the honour to address you in Dundee, a little more than two years ago, we can see how great and serious many of the changes have been. In those days the Russian Government included all their great system of strategic railways, radiating from Warsaw, and they stretched into Hungary as far not only as Lemberg, but as Przemysl, and they backed that mighty line with their great and active armies. In these days there is the submarine attack on commerce, on merchantmen, on peaceful merchantmen—that outrage and barbarity as I shall never cease to brand it. (Cheers.) That first attack had been so signally repulsed that Grand Admiral von Tirpitz, father of the German Navy, was actually driven from his office by his despairing colleagues, who were wishing to continue it and to renew it. In these days we still had the opportunity and the power, if we had only used the means that were available either at the Dardanelles or at Salonika, to have dominated the situation in

As Minister of Munitions I had to make enormous arrangements for manufacture on a great scale. At the time it was subject to a good bit of criticism, much of it rather scornful; but I think that is past. (Cheers.) There is no doubt that the fact that we have got such a number of big guns of the heaviest calibre and abundance of ammunition has not merely enabled us to triumph over our cruel foes, but it has also saved life. You have heard of Hill 60, I have no doubt; I rather think the Scottish regiments were there. In 1915, I think about the end of April or beginning of May, we attacked that hill, and after days of the fiercest fighting we were unfortunately driven back. A few weeks ago, merely as an episode in a greater battle, we captured that hill in about half an hour or three-quarters, and the losses were only one-fourth what it cost us to be beaten from that hill a year before. (Cheers.) That was due to the fact that when the first attack was made we had an inadequate supply of heavy guns and ammunition, whereas when the attack was made this year we had an overwhelming supply of both, and that made all the difference. (Cheers.)

German Army's Humiliation.

We have driven the great Army of Germany underground. (Laughter and cheers.) It must be a humiliating thought for that proud Army that it has to dig in the ground to hide itself from an Army that it despised a year or two ago. (Cheers.) Can you imagine the Kaiser before the war in one of his swaggering speeches saying to the Prussian Guard: "My gallant warriors, descendants of the men who fought under my ancestor Frederick the Great, the time has come for you once more to face the foes of the Fatherland. When that time comes I will see to it that deep caverns are made in the ground to hide you from all your enemies, and especially from that very contemptible British Army which is seeking your life. But I will do more than that. Should they by some diabolical machinery be able to destroy these shelters, I will see that you have got behind other shelters to which you can run. And if you cannot take your guns with you, leave them behind." (Laughter and cheers.) When an Army, a proud Army that talked for years of trampling down the legions of Europe, is driven to these tactics it is the beginning of the end. (Cheers.) They are rabbit tactics, and it means that we are pounding a sense of inferiority into every pore of the German military mind. That is good for the war; it is even better for after the war. (Cheers.) It was one of the things that was necessary as long as the Prussian had got that idea in his mind. Europe was not a place for decent people to live in in peace; it will be easier after this. (Cheers.) The Prussian has many virtues, but a sense of humility has never been amongst them. Now they have been taught that virtue with a fierce and relentless lash it only requires that we should hold fast and hold together. I was glad to hear the note struck by the Lord Provost that this is not the time for party distinctions and disputes. (Cheers.) Unity is essential to victory. Every land has discovered it. In France you have got Republican, and Monarchist, and Imperialist, Conservative, and Socialist all working together, and in the same Ministry complete co-operation. France realises that unity is essential to its very life. The same thing applies to Italy. I am glad to say that the same thing is realised in Russia. Men of every shade of opinion are co-operating together in order to ensure victory against the common enemy. There is one special reason why unity in war is more essential than in peace.

Sacrifices of War.

In a war people are called upon to make all kinds of sacrifices and to face every kind of hardship. In war people are called upon to make the greatest sacrifice of all. You cannot have that except with a perfectly united people, with one common purpose and common will, one common enthusiasm animating them all. (Cheers.) When you are calling upon people to make sacrifices it is easy to persuade some people that it is not necessary, and it is still more easy to persuade them that it is the duty of someone else to do it—that there is a greater call for someone else to do it. War takes us out of our habits, out of our comfortable habits, rouses us up, summons us to do things, and to suffer and endure things we never thought possible before. When you are called upon to do that, you rather resent it. At six o'clock this morning I was roused by a summons, which I believe you must have heard many a time before—(laughter)—to all the inhabitants of Dundee to rouse themselves from their slumbers and betake themselves to work. Well, I did not find it easy to respond at that time of the morning—(laughter)—and I thought to myself, supposing this came to me on a cold, wintry morning, and I was invited to go out into the bleak, raw air, I should have felt in the mood to join in an association to protest against everybody, and to abolish everything. (Laughter.) War is the great shrill syren that calls the nation out of its slumber and ease to face the cold, bleak, bitter facts of the winter of history. (Cheers.) You don't do it with pleasure. It is nothing but the sense of duty or sense of discipline that makes you do it, and it is easy to persuade men under these conditions that it is not their turn to get up. That sort of appeal, that sort of feeling if encouraged, if it is disseminated, is fatal to the energy, and the determination, and the activity, and the success of any land when it has undertaken a great and dangerous task like ours. (Cheers.) Let me say this—men who set themselves to spread that feeling are doing more harm to their country than the Prussian cannon. (Cheers.) The Prussian cannon cannot defeat us. A feeling of that kind, if it become universal, could. Therefore, it is to the third condition. Food must be brought within the reach of the people. The worst method of enforcing economy is by extravagant prices. It means provoking discontent. It means, in addition to that, that the poorer the people the more they will suffer. High prices are inevitable in war—nothing you will do can prevent that. One reason is, wages have gone up very considerably. At first, I do not say in the long run, but at first high wages mean high prices of commodities. The cost of material has gone up, and there is another circumstance which I should like the community to bear in mind—that as far as food is concerned the great bulk of it is purchased abroad, where we have no control over prices. Four-fifths of the wheat supply of this country is brought from lands across the sea. We have no control over the prices beyond the seas. (A Voice: "You ought to have known that two years ago.") My friend here says we ought to have known that two years ago. All I can say is that we have taken steps at the present moment so that next year we shall be producing sufficient stuff in this country so that we need not depend upon abroad. (Cheers.) I agree with him you might have done all that two years ago, but that is what they call in London jobbing backwards. (Laughter.) Let us march breast forward. Lord Milner in the House of Lords the other day gave a detailed account of the steps we are taking to make this country self-dependent as far as the food is concerned. I hope we shall be able to do it, but for the moment—and that is what I have got to deal with—you cannot live for twelve months on nothing in the hope that in the harvest of 1918 you will have plenty to eat. Therefore we have got to deal with the prices for the moment, and those are dependent largely upon prices over which we have no control. President Wilson—(cheers)—has taken measures to deal with this problem, and I am perfectly certain that in the action which he takes he will deal fairly with the Allies who are fighting under such trying conditions for their lives in Europe. (Cheers.)

The Government and Food Prices.

The Government are taking steps within their power to keep prices of food within bounds. They are first of all taking strong action to prevent unreasonable profits swelling the price of food, and if necessary we shall even go to the extent of resorting to the Exchequer in order to see that at any rate the price of bread is within the compass of the bulk of the people. (Cheers.) It is vital, in war as well as in peace, that if the people are to be kept up to the efficiency which is necessary in order for them to carry through their task, they should have abundance of the essentials of life and that these should be at a price which will be within the reach of every class of the community. (Cheers.) When we think of the great task which we have undertaken, don't let our minds be distracted by subsidiary things. In every great struggle there are tiring and squalid details that wear out the hearts of the stoutest men, and when men feel faint under the wearing process they should lift up their eyes to the great purpose of that conflict. That is what we have to do. Do not sink under a burden of the details of the struggle. Lift up your eyes to the purpose of the goal; yea, I say it with reverence, as the Lord Provost said, to the God that rules the destinies of men and mankind. (Cheers.) Our purpose is clearer than ever. Were there ever any doubt, the speech of the Austrian Premier two days ago makes it quite evident what we are fighting for. When he with disdainful emphasis rejected the notion that the wishes of the people in any land had anything to do with the government of their choice he made clear what we were fighting for. Alsace Lorraine? "What have the people got to do with it?" says the Austrian Premier. "This is the divine right of Kings." It is true that in 1870 they protested against being taken away from the French household they loved and forced into a family they detested. They protested. What did that matter? They were like cattle, who are the mere spoil of war. The doctrine of 1870 is the doctrine of to-day, and is the doctrine we are fighting for. The world and we mean to eradicate it. (Cheers.) The Poles want to live their lives; they want to resume the thread of their national independence. "Who are they? It is our will," say the two Kaisers, "that they should be our subjects." Arabs in Mesopotamia or Palestine—it is all the same; these men are just the dumb driven cattle that can be transferred at the will of Emperors. That is what we are fighting for—for the rights of men as men; and we shall win. (Hear, hear, and cheers.)

A Prolonged Struggle.

I know the struggle is a prolonged one. I always knew it would be. I said so. I have always urged plans on the assumption that it was going to be a long one. The evil was a great one, and you don't root great evils out of the earth without great struggles. All the same, with a continuous, persistent, unflinching, unfaltering will, we shall win. (Cheers.) There are occasional discouragements; there are occasional disappointments. So there are in every great struggle. The end seems to be postponed. I remember in the early days of April attending a conference on the Italian frontier. I passed through lands that ought to have been green with springtime. They were bleak and grey. There was not a bud to be seen. The land was still locked in the cells of winter. All was cold and forbidding. I entered the warm valleys of Savoy and they were blind with a driving blizzard, and I said: "Will the winter ever cease? Will the spring ever come? Shall we ever see the summer sun and the harvest again?" For the moment I had a thrill of horror that some visitation had come upon the earth. I came back in a fortnight, and the sun was shining; the trees were in bud; the earth of France had burst the shackles of winter. The almond was in bloom,

That first attack had been so signally repulsed that Grand Admiral von Tirpitz, father of the German Navy, was actually driven from his office by his despairing colleagues, who were wishing to continue it and to renew it. In these days we still had the opportunity and the power, if we had only used the means that were available either at the Dardanelles or at Salonika, to have dominated the situation in the Balkans, to have united in one solid block the Christian States of the Balkan Peninsula against their natural and hereditary enemies in Turkey and Austria. In those days Serbia was still unconquered. Roumania was still inviolate, and Bulgaria, most important factor of all, was still a potential Ally. You can see, looking over these facts, and one must face the facts, that the road we have travelled in these two terrible years of effort and sacrifice has been a stony and painful one.

America's Intervention.

What have we on the other side. Let us not underrate the facts. What have we got to set against all this loss? We have a deep wound inflicted upon Germany by the terror of the British Army. We have what under Providence we must regard as our mainstay—the strong right arm of Britain's might in this great war, even after all these months of struggle, not yet arrived at its culminating point. We have the soul of France. We have the active energies of Italy. We have all this, and, I was delighted to hear, we have hope for a revival of Russian energies in a new and healthier form. Most precious of all, most potent of all, making amends for all, we have the accession to our cause of the United States of America with its measureless and untouched resources in men, in material, in money, in moral, in virtue, and encouragement of inventive ingenuity. But time is requisite to realise the full power of these overwhelming forces that are coming to our assistance. (Cheers.)

Daily News & Leader.
30.-7.-17.

THE CONTROL OF HUNGER.

WORKING WOMEN & LORD RHONDDA'S POLICY.

By MARION PHILLIPS, D.Sc. (Econ.).

Lord Rhondda's food policy has shed a ray of light into the homes of working people; though if we have grown a little wary of congratulating ourselves before a promise has been carried into practice no one can blame us. So we cannot receive a statement of policy made by Mr. Clynes and Lord Rhondda with too ready a satisfaction.

So far as promises go, the proposals are good. We still await their fulfilment. Three main points stand out which are of special importance to working women. The first is the control of meat prices; and on this Lord Rhondda's policy appears to be entirely sound. He will control prices right through; and a progressive reduction in the cost of meat can be looked for with certainty. The policy is of value also in laying down principles for other commodities; and for such action the people will look forward eagerly.

★ ★ ★

The compulsory reduction of the cost of bread, the second important feature of his policy, will be of a value that few people realise to the poorer members of the community. For these bread even at 1s. per quartern was still the cheapest form of food; but though it was the cheapest its price was so high as to place many families on short commons.

Less satisfactory than the reduction in the price of bread is Lord Rhondda's insistence on the food value of the present flour; but whatever the experts say, the facts remain that war bread goes bad quickly, and frequently upsets children and delicate grown-up people. It is hard and coarse and sour; and the number of people who have to bury mouldy pieces of old loaf in their gardens for fear of being detected in wasting it, is probably more than Lord Rhondda guesses.

The sugar scheme is somewhat puzzling, and until further details are issued it is impossible to say whether it will meet the needs. At first sight Lord Rhondda appears to have accepted the method of registration of customers, which has been advocated for a long time by the Workers' National Committee; his whole scheme has been adopted very largely from their program. On close examination, however, it is not clear whether he means that the customer should be supplied according to a fixed ration or no. If inequality of supplies for each family are to be allowed, irrespective of numbers, the rich will still gain at the expense of the poor—and gain the more from the regularity of distribution which the scheme will secure. It is quite certain that working people will not be satisfied if this is the case. They rightly hold that they have at least an equal claim upon the supply of one of the most important staple foods.

These are the three foods with which Lord Rhondda's scheme deals; but he holds out a hope of extending his methods to cover the whole field of important supplies. For this purpose he is setting up quite sufficient machinery; and it is the machinery the Workers' Committee have advocated for so long.

★ ★ ★

With great satisfaction the working people see the end of the War Savings Committees as food administrators. Committees of the local authorities are the right thing to have, and representatives of labour and of working women should serve upon them; but the basis laid down by the Food Ministry of one representative of each is nothing like high enough. Working men and working women are above all those whom the new regulations concern, and they can scarcely be satisfied with so small a representation as this.

On communal kitchens Lord Rhondda has taken the advice frequently advocated in these columns, and made their establishment one of the duties of the Municipal Food Committees for food control. He has still, however, to find the amount of support and encouragement of supervision and control which the central authority will exercise. Such kitchens are the most important method of accomplishing true food economy; but they will do little unless established on right lines under well standardised regulations. They should be in working order before the winter comes; and no time is to be lost now if this result is to be attained.

★ ★ ★

There is some account of the intentions

Daily News & Leader 662.
30.-8.-17.

662/38

FOOD CONTROL.

WOMEN AND THE LOCAL COMMITTEES.

By MARION PHILLIPS, D.Sc. (Econ.)

The worst of it is that the food difficulties are growing and not decreasing. We suppose that the efforts of Lord Rhondda are some time going to become effective, and of course it is nice to know that the customers of Selfridge's and Harrod's are getting their bread cheap. But that doesn't help the ordinary every-day working woman. The intentions of the present Food Ministry are good. We believe in them all right. But when are they going to materialise in hard, concrete facts?

Bread we wait for patiently. We know that it is going to be cheaper; and, to be quite fair, its quality is rather improving. Meat is still intolerably dear, and as to bacon! And the tea prices are awful! The quality of everything that we buy is deteriorating, and things do not keep well, so that economy is too often a disappointment, saved food going bad before it is eaten.

Just at the moment, fruit and vegetables are cheap and plentiful, but the lack of sugar makes the glut of plums a fearful and exasperating irony; and no one can live on raw fruit unless they have been brought up to it. The people of this country certainly cannot, for fruit is too much of a luxury most of the year for the habit to be a common one. In any case, fruit is a thin diet for a cool climate, and not the thing to work hard on.

More Troubles.

To add to the general bother of things comes the threat, which is sometimes more than a threat for the individual, of a match famine. Not to have as many matches as you want, not to have them, no matter how economical and steady a match-user you may be, is an inconvenience that those who have always a fire at hand do not realise. And little inconveniences like this become very serious troubles when you are doing your best to economise on fuel, and using oil or spirit for the little cooking that is absolutely necessary. Two shops in my village to-day were short of matches. One had a very few that they were distributing in driblets. The other, a tobacconist, had five boxes left, and no idea when he would get more.

What no one who shops can help noticing is that there is a fast-growing scarcity of all the accustomed articles of food. Maize and other unaccustomed foodstuffs there may be. But the usual thing is more often absent than not. Eggs, e.g., are up to the absurd price of 3d. each for a very uncertain and over-hoarded article. Jam is going to be so scarce that many grocers simply cannot get in new supplies. Golden syrup has become an occasional "find."

These difficulties are what the ordinary retail buyer finds, and whether or no this represents the wholesale shortage the ordinary woman has no way of discovering. But for her it means continual worry and need of experiment which she has not time, and often not skill, to make. She looks out on the rain to-day with real fear and anxiety, wondering whether it may mean a shortage in the main potato crop. and the consequent cutting off of the friendly supply that is now coming to her. Her feelings towards the potato this year are not of the quality that usually greets a foodstuff. It is almost with affection that she scrapes the mud off and puts them on to boil. The rain is making her frightened about the most precious part of the food supply after bread.

Representation of Women.

Yet it is just this woman, with all her perplexities and troubles, the only class in the community that knows day by day the position of the retail buyer, that is being less represented than any other on the Food Control Committees that are being set up. The food seller in every form, wholesale, retail and manufacturing, is being placed upon these Committees, but the representatives of the housewife are almost entirely absent. Co-operators are having some small show upon them (though far less than they ought to have), but the working woman is being entirely unrecognised by the whole official hierarchy, and the local authorities are only too ready to follow this bad example.

WOMEN & COMMITTEES.

The Value of Association with a Working Class Organisation.

So far as the Women's Labour League is aware, among the scores of Food Control Committees already appointed only two, both in the North-Eastern Counties, include representative working women in their membership.

The immense importance not only of electing women (beyond the minimum of one insisted on by the Food Controller), but also of electing the right sort of women, was insisted on yesterday by the secretary of the League.

"Merely to co-opt the Mayoress or a couple of members of the War Savings Committee doesn't meet the case at all," she said. "These people, however well meaning, are generally quite out of personal touch with the problems that face the working-class housewife from day to day. The ideal member of a Food Control Committee is undoubtedly a woman who has some working-class organisation behind her from which she can draw both information and support. Such a woman focuses the real feeling and experience in the homes of the people, which is what every Food Control Committee ought to want to know."

In the view of the League, one of the easiest ways out of the difficulty created by the appointment of thoroughly bad committees would be to increase the membership from twelve to, say, fourteen, additional members to have certain qualifications for their office.

true food economy; but they will do little unless established on right lines under well standardised regulations. They should be in working order before the winter comes; and no time is to be lost now if this result is to be attained.

★ ★ ★

There is some earnest of the intentions of the new Food Ministry to be gathered from recent appointments to its staff and recent resignations from its directorships. The new Costing Department belongs to the first class. The resignation of Mr. Kennedy Jones to the second; for with the passing away of the Director of Food Economy we hope we have seen the last of the lecture campaigns and economy exhibitions. Nothing has so much reduced confidence in the Ministry among working people as the time wasted in advising them to eat less, while the food profiteer still went his way unharmed. The Ministry now seems to be settling down from the era of newspaper "stunts" to a period of solid work, with the object of getting to the people as much food as possible at as low a price as can be achieved.

The old motto of the Ministry appears to have been to control food so as to prevent the mass of the people getting too much of it. It is to be hoped that the motto of the new Ministry will be to control hunger by supplying as much food as the country can provide.

entirely absent. Co-operators are having some small show upon them (though far less than they ought to have), but the working woman is being entirely unrecognised by the whole official hierarchy, and the local authorities are only too ready to follow this bad example.

How, indeed, can she be helped? At least distribution should be made as good as possible. There should be no failure here so far as goods are available, and it would also be well worth while to let her voice be heard as to what goods are felt by her to be most important. The match difficulty, e.g., has been talked of as though the only person that suffered from it was the smoker. He, however, can get over some of the difficulties by a flint light. But let us ask any man to go through a day's house work without a match at hand, and suggest to him to set his flint going whenever he has to boil a kettle or fetch the milk from the larder, or go to see what is wrong with a child crying in bed upstairs. The Industrial Commissioners found that much of the labour unrest was due to worry and anxiety. Imagine what the worry of the unresting mother in a working-class home is to-day with every single moment some difficulty to meet, and you will be surprised that she bears along at all.

To Meet the Demand.

But however good the distribution of food supplies, and other commodities, there is shortage of many goods, and this shortage ought to be made thoroughly well known. People should know what it is that they cannot get because there is none in the country, and so be able to distinguish between the necessary and the unnecessary inconveniences. And what there is should be made the most of; and this making the most of it should not be left to chance and the individual housekeeper.

The Public Kitchen can alone meet this demand properly, and Lord Rhondda has placed upon these Food Control Committees the duty of developing these. But how are they to proceed unless they have the advice and knowledge of the working woman to go upon? Who else knows what kind of food is wanted, and how it should be prepared, and how it should be served, and the times at which it is to be served? The whole science of working-class housekeeping is so far undiscovered. The women themselves are the only people who have, up to now, taken any interest in it, and to make their knowledge available they must be asked to serve on these Committees which are to help solve the difficult problems of the distribution of food in the localities.

Food Control Committees cannot do their work unless they control food for the benefit of the consumer and not for the benefit of the food seller. That is elementary, simple, common sense. The pity is that Lord Rhondda, starting with the goodwill of the community behind him, should have foreseen so little the effect of his first circular to the local authorities. He has disregarded the primary importance of ensuring the presence of the right kind of representative upon the Food Control Committee, has demanded a maximum number for each with a minimum representation for women and labour, and the result is that the minimum for the latter has become the maximum. The only way left for him out of the muddle is to raise his maximum and require the addition of representatives of the principal consumers, the working women.

South London Press 662/39
25.-8.-17.

Daily News & Leader 662.
12-9-17

FOOD CONTROL COMMITTEES

South London Boroughs' Meagre Recognition of Women Representation

NOW FOR LOWER PRICES?

During the past few days the Borough Councils of South London have had under consideration the appointment of committees to deal with the distribution of food, the control of prices and the prevention of profiteering. The probable taking over of all foodstuffs by the Government and the relegation to the local committees of increased powers and duties imparts more than ordinary importance to the constitution of the committees but general approval of the membership will be accorded.

An important part of the duty of the new committees will be the registration of retailers and the enforcement of the conditions under which card-holders register with them. The keeping down of prices by fixing maximum standards according to districts and the all-important but difficult problem of equitable distribution will also form part of their functions.

On Wednesday evening Camberwell appointed its committee giving only one seat to a woman and two to Labour whilst Lambeth on the same evening selected for its committee two women, two direct labour representatives, two tradesmen and six members of the Borough Council. Southwark the previous week, as already reported in these columns, elected its committee consisting of one woman, one direct Labour representative, two former members of the Council and eight present members of the Council, whilst Bermondsey constituted its committee wholly from members of the Council, one of whom is Mrs. Richmond.

CAMBERWELL'S COALITION COMMITTEE.

Eleven Men but Only One Woman to Regulate Prices.

The Mayor (Ald. Thos. Coomba, J.P.) presided over a special meeting of the Camberwell Borough Council on Wednesday evening.

At the outset Clr. Pexton remarked that the composition of the committee was an important matter. It should be representative of the whole of the people of the borough. He hoped that when the Council came to the nominations they would take care that there was not the slightest tinge of party.

Ald. St. Cadd said he would like the Council to send a resolution to the Local Government Board recommending them to insist upon the gentlemen charged with this business to take steps at once to take care of the immense amount of foodstuff which the land was producing.

Clr. Shrimpton complained of the inequality of distribution. Take the case of sugar, for instance. It was well known that anyone who had plenty of money could get any amount. (Cries of "No, no.") He protested against local committees being appointed unless they were given powers to insist upon an equality of distribution.

Clr. O'Neill said it did not look as though the committee would be a very energetic one, seeing that the nominations came from one particular party. He thought such a committee should be dissociated from party.

The Mayor assured the speaker that there was no question of party in the selection of members.

Clr. O'Neill: The names, as they appear on the paper, would lead one to think that they were of party origin.

Ald. Molony remarked that before they appointed the committee they ought carefully to weigh the position. Apparently all the committee would be able to do would be to carry out the instructions of the Local Government Board and the Food Controller. He thought that the committee should have power to call people who were dealing with foodstuffs before them and to go fully into the question of the profits that were being made. He would like to see an end put to profiteering.

WHAT IS THE COMMMITTEE TO DO?

Clr. Dowton moved that the appointment of a committee be deferred until a deputation had waited upon the Food Controller and had ascertained from him what the powers of the committee would be.

Clr. Haile seconded.

Clr. Meade observed that as matters stood the committee would have little more power than school managers—they would have power to make recommendations but no power to see that they were enforced.

Clr. Newton-Knights pointed out that the circular stated that powers in regard to the distribution of foodstuffs and other matters would be given to the local committee and that it would be their first duty to safeguard the interests of consumers.

Ald. Brenchley followed on similar lines.

The amendment having been negatived, The Mayor moved that the committee be composed of the following:—The Mayor, Aldermen Molony and Cudd, Councillors Daly, Vicary, Shrimpton, Aldridge and Dobbs, Mr. A. C. Warwick [illegible] and Labour Party, and Mr. [illegible] shall be coal overseer. It is suggested that there shall be a reserve stock of 1,000 tons of coal at each of the following depots:—Grove-vale, Peckham Park-rd., Glengall-rd. and Addington-sq.

Clr. Newton Knights said the committee had no wish at all to interfere with the business of coal merchants. All they desired was to store coal in the most populous parts of the borough, in order that they might be able to dole it out if necessary to small consumers. The Council would make no profit out of the matter and all their facilities for cartage would be placed at the disposal of the people of Camberwell if necessary.

LAMBETH REPRESENTATIVE COMMITTEE.

Two Women and Two Labour Members Appointed.

The Lambeth Borough Council sat for two hours on Wednesday evening to consider the appointment of a local Food Control Committee and a local Coal Overseer in accordance with the Household Coal Distribution Order.

The Mayor (Ald. C. H. Gibbs) presided and there was a large attendance.

The Mayor explained what was proposed to conform to the wishes of the Local Government Board. The committee was to consist of twelve members, and it was provided that it must include at least one representative of Labour and one woman. The Council was directed to take full advantage of the experience of representatives of co-operative societies and other trades in the borough. His worship pointed out that the duties of the new officials should be carried on at the Town Hall, and he suggested that the rooms now occupied in the basement by the military authorities should be utilised, the present occupants finding accommodation in the library, Brixton-rd. A special staff would be needed to cope with the work which the committee would have to carry on, and their remuneration, together with other necessary expenditure of the committee, would be a charge on the Exchequer. Provision would be made for the advance of expenses at the disposal of the local authority. The committee would have to deal with the sugar problems at the earliest possible opportunity. Lambeth had a population of [illegible] and it would therefore be seen that the work would be of a stupendous character, especially when it was remembered that sugar cards would have to be prepared by September 15. During last week he had consulted several members of the Council regarding the constitution of the committee. A Labour organisation had suggested that it should be represented by 75 per cent. of the members, but he thought that number was excessive. On matters appertaining to food two well-known local tradesmen, Mr. William Hayden and Mr. C. Partington, had been asked to give the committee the benefit of their experience.

A REPRESENTATIVE COMMITTEE.

The Mayor suggested the following should form the committee, the particular interests represented being indicated against the name of the member:—

Ald. George Hinds. The Council, particularly the North Lambeth Division.

Clr. Geo. Brittain, J.P. The Council, the Guardians of Lambeth, and the Kennington Division.

Clr. F. William. The Council, the [illegible]

WOMEN AND LOCAL COMMITTEES.

By MARION PHILLIPS, D.Sc. (Econ.).

There is Lady A., who has always taken a really intelligent and sympathetic interest in the life of working women; there is Mrs. B., the Bishop's wife, who has by marriage, as we may say, an interest in the subject; there is Miss C., who has positively devoted herself to helping the poor women of the East Ends of all our cities; and yet with not one of them is the working woman really satisfied as her representative. This dissatisfaction has reached a high point since the Food Control Committees began to be formed, and is showing itself by the efforts that working women's organisations are making to obtain representation thereon. But still many people consider that the failure to accept the estimable Lady A. and Mrs. B. and Miss C. and the Lady Mayoress is strange and incomprehensible. So many are these doubters that it is worth while explaining the matter a little more fully.

What Working Women Want.

The first thing that the working woman wants is that she should be represented by someone who knows through and through the conditions under which she lives. But she wants more. She wants that representative to take views as to their alleviation which seem good to the working woman herself. The small political powers hitherto in the hands of women have influenced her readiness to take part in public affairs, and organisation amongst them for political and social purposes has been slow. But the fact remains that the only way in which the opinion of a class can be discovered is through the organised or associated groups of that class. To know many individuals is not sufficient. The associated individuals have an organised opinion that is often wholly different from that gathered by the visiting of the separate individual. Moreover, it must be the opinion gathered up as a result of discussion and intercourse amongst equals. That is why the opinion of the women who attend a meeting of the Mothers' Union is not representative in anything like the same sense as that of those meeting in, say, the Women's Co-operative Guild or the Women's Labour League. In the one case, the meeting is organised for the women who attend it. In the others, the women who attend the meeting are themselves the organisers.

The Important Question.

This is really the fundamental question. The woman, no matter what her economic or social position may be, who genuinely stands as the representative of a working woman's self-governing organisation, can speak for her fellow members. The woman who is an outsider, no matter how generous in spirit and how varied her experience as an outsider may be, cannot speak with any certain voice for others than herself. Her knowledge of the working woman's life, for instance, may be wide, or it may be small, but it will have been gained not in an atmosphere of equality of membership, where each stands on her own merits, but by the fortune of her tact and understanding. The representative must speak in the name of those she represents, and cease to represent them if she fails in that duty. The woman chosen for her individual quality of knowing "all about working-class life," may even know what is best for the working woman; but it is doubtful whether she has any certainty as to what the working woman thinks best for herself. And that, after all, is a still more important question for a democracy.

The Industrial Organisations.

The only sure way, therefore, of representing working women on Local Government Committees of this kind is to choose them through their own bodies. The only women who are organised in any considerable numbers are working women; and those whose organisations are affiliated to the Standing Joint Committee of Industrial Women's Organisations are well over [illegible]. This is not inconsiderable when the obvious difficulties in the way cillors Baty, Vicary, Shrimpton, Alfd. Green and Ogdon, Mr. A. C. Warwick (Camberwell Trades and Labour Council), Mr. W. Kelly (Royal Arsenal Co-operative Society), Dr. Helen Hatton, and a representative of the Amalgamated Society of Engineers. The Mayor declared that in making those nominations he had no regard to party.

Clr. Perton thought there should be a greater representation of outsiders who were consumers.

Clr. Vicary nominated Clrs. Haile, Doughty and Collins as members of the Committee.

Clr. Dyer expressed the view that the Town Clerk and not the Borough Treasurer should be the executive officer.

COUNCILLOR MOSS HAS HIS DOUBTS.

Clr. Moss remarked that if it could be shown to him that any of the proposed members of the committee would be able to cut down the price of any commodity he would be very glad to vote for the whole of them. He saw, however, no reasonable probability of their being able to do that.

Clr. O'Neill suggested that the ladies should be more fully represented on the committee, seeing that they were even more interested in prices than men.

Clr. Shrimpton agreed with that view.

Clr. Hearn regarded it as an utter insult to the other sex to set up a Food Committee of 12 members and only put on one lady. To have a perfectly satisfactory committee they should have two more ladies and another Labour member.

Clr. Oscar Rose pointed out that the committee would have power to appoint sub-committees, and in that way provision could be made for the co-operation of ladies.

Clr. Dowton nominated Mrs. Phillips and Mrs. Morris as members of the committee.

Clr. Alfd. Green nominated another Labour member, Mr. Geo. Holloman.

Clr. Keyse suggested that four members of the Council should be appointed on the committee and the remaining seats should be given to outsiders.

A ballot was taken, with the result that the committee was constituted as follows:—The Mayor, Dr. Helen Hatton, Alderman Evan Cook, Councillors Alfd. Green, Shrimpton, Baty, Vicary, Ogdon, Haile, Doughty and Collins, and Mr. W. Kelly. Clr. Collins is a prominent Trades Unionist and the Council regarded him as a fitting representative of Labout.

COAL DISTRIBUTION.

3,000 Tons to be Kept in Store in the Borough.

The Special Coal Committee reported that in order to give effect to the Coal Order, they had passed a series of resolutions and had forwarded them to the Local Government Board. It is proposed that the borough shall constitute one coal district and that Clr. H. Newton Knights nington Division.

Clr. P. Willson. The Council, the Lambeth War Savings Committee, and the Brixton Division.

Clr. Geo. H. Mallinson, M.A. The Council, the Lambeth Distress Committee, and the Norwood Division.

Mr. W. Prosser. Labour (nominated by the local branch of the National Union of Railwaymen).

Mr. Henry A. Urie. Labour and Trades Unions.

Mr. William Hayden. Wholesale and retail butchers.

Mr. C. F. Partington, J.P., wholesale and retail provision trade.

Clr. W. E. Green. Lambeth War Savings Committee.

Mrs. Alice Bond. Women and North Lambeth Citizens' Association.

Mrs. J. Dewar Robertson. Women and nominee of the L.C.C. on the Kennington After-Care Committee.

Ald. Charles H. Gibbs, J.P. Mayor of Lambeth.

Clr. Iremongh congratulated the Council upon taking Labour into its confidence. The co-operation of labour was most essential where the question of the saving of food was concerned. It was proposed to appoint a sub-committee to assist the committee, and it was on that body that useful purpose could be served by representatives of labour.

Ald. Evans moved the appointment of the nominees of the Mayor

Clr. Mills, in the discussion which followed, said it was of the utmost importance that any person connected with the trades that would be concerned should in no way be connected with the committee He thought it would be better to have a committee which had not a single representative upon it who had indirect dealing with the foodstuffs concerned.

Clr. Rice thought that Clr. Hawes should be appointed to the sub-committee in order that his long experience as a butcher should be utilised.

Clr. Gough Cook presumed that the Committee would be subject to the Council; if not the latter would be taking upon themselves a serious responsibility because the ratepayers might hold the latter liable, if matters went astray.

The Mayor replied to the criticisms regarding the constitution of the Committee. The duties of its members, he pointed out, might occasionally be of an unpleasant character and realising that fact he had suggested a list of representative men and women whom he was convinced would loyally and fearlessly discharge their duties. (Hear, hear.) If Clr. Gough Cook had only complaints to make his best course would be to attend before the Committee.

The Committee as suggested by the Mayor was agreed to.

Ald. Evans moved that the details regarding office accommodation for the proposed new Committee should be referred to the General Purposes Committee of the Council and this was agreed to.

Mr. C. H. Edwards (the borough engineer) was invited to discharge the duties of coal overseer.

over 300,000. This is not inconsiderable when the obvious difficulties in the way are thought over. Amongst them are a small, a very small number of women who by good fortune have that education and comfort of surroundings which gives them the despised title of middle-class. But so far as these are chosen as representatives by the members of their organisations, they are chosen because they make good use of their advantages in being able to put their thoughts clearly and in using administrative machinery to help forward their fellow members' desires. They help to think out reforms that are needed; they are often more skilled in fighting a difficult battle in public work; but they must come to their fellow members who have the rich experience of life that working women get, for the knowledge without which their technical training would be of little avail.

The Ideal Representative.

And because they share in the management of their associations, the attitude of the working woman to these colleagues is a very different thing from their attitude to the innumerable middle and upper class women who come in contact with them in other ways. In the one case, all are going in the same direction; in the other, who knows? As a woman once explained to the present writer in discussing a very pleasant health visitor, whose visits she quite enjoyed, "Of course, I couldn't tell her all the truth. I didn't know what she was at. I wouldn't dare take the risk." That expresses just the relationship which is so frequent between those whom the ordinary conditions of daily life have so widely separated. It can only be broken down by a real bond being formed between them such as membership of a common organisation can give, expressing as it does similarity of aim and outlook.

But the ideal representative is to be found in those women who have been able to train themselves for public life while remaining of the working class, for in them there is a keen edge of personal exasperation with the confused muddle of national organisation that gives a deeper significance and a more trenchant vigour to their advocacy of the interests of the home makers they represent.

Lloyd's Weekly News.

662/40

662.

YOUR·HOUSEHOLD·BUDGE

GET AHEAD of the GOVERNMENT and SOLVE the PROBLEM by CO-OPERATION.

by Mary Delaney

THE cost of every article of food has risen enormously since the outbreak of war. But our breakfasts and our dinners and our suppers are going to cost still more in the future. Before that wonderful, happy day when victory for the Allies is shouted in ringing tones throughout the civilised world, milk may reach eightpence a pint, meat two shillings a pound, while butter and bread tickets may be doled out to us by a careful Government—as in Germany.

The Government has already been accused of callous indifference to the heavy cost of living. A certain Minister has proclaimed his lofty ignorance of the price of tea. Helpless, impotent, dismayed, the women of England demand bitterly that action should be taken to prevent a further increase in the price of vital foodstuffs.

It is very understandable. It seems such an unnecessary evil that the middle-class woman is called upon to endure. It is impossible not to sympathise very deeply with women who believe that those who have in their hands the destinies of our land have failed hopelessly in their great task.

But one has to remember that if economy in spending is urgently necessary, so is economy in time. It is a wise policy for any Government to adopt that, in times of immense stress and strain, matters that can be safely left to private effort and enterprise should not divert the attention of Parliament from the big business in hand.

Voluntary effort has won crowning victories during this war. The care of thousands of our wounded men is in the hands of voluntary workers. Voluntary societies sent women to toil on the land long before the Government made their appeal. All the canteens and clubs that make for the happiness, and so for the efficiency of our fighting forces, are directed by voluntary effort.

So, also, it has been in endeavours for personal advancement. The energy of trade unionists has accomplished more than the beneficence of members of Parliament. If the man at the machine had waited for the Government to do something—well, he might be waiting still for his better conditions and his higher pay.

The women of England, if they organised themselves on a business-like footing, could, in a week, bring down the cost of living, and make abnormal profits out of the sale of foodstuffs utterly impossible. The individual woman can do nothing. As a part of an enormous, relentless organisation for killing the food profiteer she could do undreamt-of wonders. Here is a chance for a leader, a woman with a big heart and a fine brain and a great determination to win through. She could do some of the best constructive work for her country that has ever been done—by man or woman.

Milk has been raised almost everywhere to sixpence a quart. You probably protested to your dealer. He shrugged his shoulders and made the conventional reply about the high price of everything. You ordered half a pint less if there were no children to consider—and the matter ended.

If your neighbour, Mrs. Jones, and her neighbour, Mrs. Smith, and all the anxious housewives in your village or suburb or country town had banded themselves together and refused to pay sixpence a quart for milk, the price would have come down immediately.

Foodstuffs must inevitably be dearer in war time. But there is no reason why they should rise periodically to provide a little extra profit for some grasper whose pockets are already bulging out with money won at the expense of your babies' health.

There exists in America a very effective housewives' league, the object of which is to prevent the exploitation of the household purse. On one occasion eggs suddenly rose to an absurd price. The league got going, as they say across the Atlantic. A certain number of eggs were secured by post from remote country districts. Shop dealers were banned. Within a few days the price of eggs was normal. If ever the strike weapon is justified it surely is in a campaign against abnormally and unnecessarily high food prices.

We are wanting very badly the woman leader to whom I have referred. We want a Mary Macarthur in the domestic world who can pick up the stray ends of various societies, knit them together, and turn them into one vast organisation for the speedy end of food profits in war time. Meanwhile, there is not a woman in the land who cannot make a beginning. And it is the country woman who has the best chance.

In a small village most of the women know each other. Perhaps there is only one grocer's shop, one butcher. The lack of competition may be an inducement to charge fancy prices. Here is your chance. Canvass all the women you know, get them to make an organised protest. If that is not effective—and probably it won't be—ban the particular dealer who is to blame—and do without.

It is not fair, of course, that an innocent tradesman should suffer. If he is a victim of grasping wholesalers he can do little. But I am thinking of men who, for instance, paid the old pre-Budget prices for matches, and instantly increased them when the tax was announced to secure profits for themselves. That sort of thing is likely to occur again, and it can be stopped by women, if they have the common sense to combine.

Manufacturers of tinned salmon, sold in huge quantities, will not be greatly concerned if one dealer in some far-off village announces a domestic ban. But your farmer, who has raised the cost of milk and is too far from a station to sell it at a profit in town, will be very greatly concerned if there is a village strike. Milk won't keep, and every day of the housewife's strike means a loss to him, and a gain to the makers of condensed milk.

These are only beginnings, but they hint at the greater things that could be achieved, under powerful leadership, without necessity of Government action. It is a time-tattered truism that a Government cannot legislate in advance of public opinion. Women can create that opinion by strong action, and the Government will follow very respectfully in days to come.

More personal and certainly less drastic is domestic co-operation in buying things in bulk. A side of bacon, shared out amongst neighbours, is much less costly than buying rashers by the pound. Canning rashers by the pound. Canning rashers by the pound. Canning

The Northampton Co. C.
9/6/15

WAR BONUS.

ANOTHER SHILLING A WEEK FOR SHOE OPERATIVES.

As the result of the meeting of the committee of the Northampton Arbitration Board on Tuesday, Northampton shoe operatives have secured war bonuses.

All male operatives over 18 years of age will, from June 6, receive a war bonus of a shilling a week whatever their usual minimums are. This, of course, is additional to increases at the beginning of the year.

The Union authorities are contending that the increases granted some months ago should be regarded as permanent increases in wages, and not as war bonuses, but that is not the view that has been, so far, taken by the masters. The question is still in dispute, and is to be settled at a further meeting of the parties. The new advance of a shilling is a war bonus pure and simple.

The girls over 18 will also receive more. Those engaged on first-class operations will have a war bonus of 1s. 6d. a week, and the others 1s. a week.

The Daily Mail
9/7/15

P.O. WAR BONUSES.

HALF INCREASES FOR WOMEN.

Sir James Woodhouse's decision as arbitrator gives increased wages to two of the three grades of postal servants claiming them The increases are styled war bonuses.

Men receiving up to 40s. a week claimed 4s.; they are awarded 3s.

Between 40s. and 65s., claim 3s. more; 2s. allowed to those up to and including 60s. a week. There is no reference to the claim to 2s. extra for those receiving up to £210 a year.

The increases date from March 1 last. Women are to receive half these increases, and part-time workers proportionate amounts. The increases also go to wives of men on active service

It is estimated that the award will add a million pounds to the wages bill.

Financial News.
11.2.15.

AN EXCELLENT EXAMPLE.

The following notice has been issued by the Dunlop Rubber Co., Ltd.: "In view of the increased cost of living, and with the object of encouraging their employés to do everything possible to meet the present demand, the directors have decided to pay until further notice a bonus on wages to all rubber workers, both male and female. The amount of the bonus will be 10 p.c., or 2s. in the £, and it will be earned each week by those who have not lost more than one hour in that week except through sickness. Absentees through sickness who claim their bonus must produce a doctor's certificate.—By order. February 8, 1915." Employers who treat their staff in such a generous manner are certain to be well served.

The Guardian
Feb. 24 1915

MORE WAGES TO MEET RISE IN PRICES.

WAR BONUS MOVEMENT.

COTTON WEAVERS' APPLICATION.

The number of semi-public and important private concerns which have raised the wages of or granted bonuses to their workpeople to mitigate the hardships involved in the rise of the cost of living was yesterday strengthened by the addition of several large firms:—

The British-American Tobacco Company and the Imperial Tobacco Company are both giving emergency allowances to employees who receive not more than £200 a year. The workpeople of the latter also receive an annual bonus on wages, which this year amounts to 9 per cent.

The directors of the Manchester Brewery Company and of Messrs. Walker and Homfrays, brewers, have spontaneously given an increase in wages of 3s. a week to all employees earning less than 30s. a week.

The North-Eastern Railway Company have also granted their employees virtually the same war bonus terms as have been conceded by other railway companies in Great Britain.

Other labour developments include the following:—

On behalf of the Operative Weavers' Amalgamation, the secretaries of the Cotton Spinners' and Manufacturers' Association have been approached with a view to a joint meeting to discuss a rise in wages.

The Clyde strikers number, roughly, 10,000. Yesterday some men resumed work, while others joined the strikers.

Elswick engineers, who were to have gone on strike to-day, have suspended their notices, and it is believed that there will be no stoppage.

The Dockers' Union have offered on behalf of London dockers that if the employers will confer with them—as it is complained they have shown no disposition to do—and no settlement is reached, they will submit their case to an independent Government tribunal.

The President of the Miners' Federation yesterday declared at a conference of that body that if the cost of living went up or remained up it might become necessary for the miners and other workers in this country, wage agreements notwithstanding, to seek relief by demanding an increase of wages.

The British-American Tobacco Company, Limited, announce that in view of the general increase in the cost of living owing to the war, each of their employees in the United Kingdom whose earnings do not exceed £200 a year will, each four weeks, dating from the 1st of this month, receive an emergency allowance of

1s. a week in the case of those whose wages do not exceed 10s. a week.

2s. a week in the case of those whose earnings are between 10s. and £1 a week.

3s. a week in the case of those whose earnings exceed £1 a week but do not exceed £200 a year.

Allowances to piece workers calculated on their average weekly earnings.

The allowances will not be paid to any employee who has not been continuously at work for the four weeks preceding any date of payment.

A deputation from the National Federation of Labour Exchange and Unemployment Insurance Clerks' Associations, which met at Leicester recently, interviewed the General Manager of Labour Exchanges in London yesterday, and presented a requisition for increased salaries, in view of the additional cost of living. The proceedings were private, and nothing was disclosed as to what occurred at the interview.

COTTON WAGES.

trays, brewers, have spontaneously given an increase in wages of 3s. a week to all employees earning less than 30s. a week.

The North-Eastern Railway Company have also granted their employees virtually the same war bonus terms as have been conceded by other railway companies in Great Britain.

Other labour developments include the following:—

On behalf of the Operative Weavers' Amalgamation, the secretaries of the Cotton Spinners' and Manufacturers' Association have been approached with a view to a joint meeting to discuss a rise in wages.

The Clyde strikers number, roughly, 10,000. Yesterday some men resumed work, while others joined the strikers.

Elswick engineers, who were to have gone on strike to-day, have suspended their notices, and it is believed that there will be no stoppage.

The Dockers' Union have offered on behalf of London dockers that if the employers will confer with them—as it is complained they have shown no disposition to do—and no settlement is reached, they will submit their case to an independent Government tribunal.

The President of the Miners' Federation yesterday declared at a conference of that body that if the cost of living went up or remained up it might become necessary for the miners and other workers in this country, wage agreements notwithstanding, to seek relief by demanding an increase of wages.

The British-American Tobacco Company, Limited, announce that in view of the general increase in the cost of living owing to the war, each of their employees in the United Kingdom whose earnings do not exceed £200 a year will, each four weeks, dating from the 1st of this month, receive an emergency allowance of

1s. a week in the case of those whose wages do not exceed 10s. a week.

2s. a week in the case of those whose earnings are between 10s. and £1 a week.

3s. a week in the case of those whose earnings exceed £1 a week but do not exceed £200 a year.

Allowances to piece workers calculated on their average weekly earnings.

The allowances will not be paid to any employee who has not been continuously at work for the four weeks preceding any date of payment.

A deputation from the National Federation of Labour Exchange and Unemployment Insurance Clerks' Associations, which met at Leicester recently, interviewed the General Manager of Labour Exchanges in London yesterday, and presented a requisition for increased salaries, in view of the additional cost of living. The proceedings were private, and nothing was disclosed as to what occurred at the interview.

COTTON WAGES.

WEAVERS APPLY FOR AN ADVANCE.

A few days ago it was reported that operative cotton weavers in certain parts of Lancashire were pressing the trade union leaders to consider the question of an application to the employers for an advance in wages to meet the higher food prices which now prevail. Mr. Joseph Cross, the secretary of the Operative Weavers' Amalgamation, has now sent a communication to the secretaries of the Cotton Spinners' and Manufacturers' Association asking for a joint meeting to discuss a rise in wages. Mr. Cross, who is away from home for a few days, has not yet received a reply, but as a matter of course the masters will arrange a date, whatever their opinions may be with regard to higher wages.

The joint conference will be held in Manchester at the end of this week or at the beginning of next. In view of the success which has attended the efforts of workpeople in other industries, the action of the trade union has not occasioned much surprise, but employers on 'Change in Manchester yesterday were unanimous in stating that the condition of affairs would not stand a further increase in the cost of production. There is little probability of the masters agreeing to a definite rise on the standard lists (writes a cotton correspondent), but some compromise may be arranged in the way of a special bonus for a few months. It is estimated that between 180,000 and 200,000 workpeople would be affected.

Northampton Daily Echo
21/3/15

WAR BONUS.

TEN PER CENT. FOR BOZEAT AND WOLLASTON WORKERS.

The boot and shoe manufacturers of Bozeat and Wollaston have decided to grant a bonus of 10 per cent. to all male workers in their employ.

The decision was come to at a meeting held at the Nag's Head, Wollaston, on Tuesday, over which Mr. A. W. Partridge presided. The following resolution was passed and sent to the National Union of Boot and Shoe Operatives:—

"That owing to the increased cost of living and other causes a bonus of 10 per cent. on their wages be paid to all male workers from March 29th, 1915, such bonus to be paid monthly, as an emergency bonus only, during the continuance of the war, and to be calculated so that any increase in wages given since January 1st, 1915, shall be considered as part of, and included in, the 10 per cent. bonus referred to.

Further, that the advance in wages due in July next under the agreement made on March 27th, 1914, shall not be paid until the end of the war so far as males are concerned. To females the advance in July shall be paid as specified in the agreement."

The Glasgow Herald,
3-4-15.

BONUS FOR FOUNDRY WORKERS.

The foundry workers of Falkirk and district, with the exception of the members of the Central Ironmoulders' Association, are to receive war bonuses as from Monday first. In the case of male employees over 18 years of age the bonus will amount to 6d per day, and for those under that age the advance will be 3d per day. Female workers are to be given 3d per day. Any advance in wages given since the commencement of the war will be calculated as a portion of the bonus. Negotiations are in progress between the employers and the Central Ironmoulers' Association whose members are at present excluded from participation in the bonus.

The pattern-makers, who are among the workers to receive the bonus, have intimated a demand to the employers for an advance on their present rate of wages of 2d per hour, to come into operation on April 19.

The following firms in Bonnybridge district have intimated to their employees that they have decided to institute the payment of a war bonus:—Messrs John G. Stein and Co. (Limited), Castlecary and Milnquarter Brickworks; Messrs Smith and Wellstood (Limited), Bonnybridge Foundry and Columbian Stove Works; Messrs Bonnybridge Silica and Fireclay Company; Messrs James Dougall and Sons (Limited), Bonnyside Brickworks; and Messrs George Turnbull and Company, Bonnymuir Brickworks. The average rate of payment will be 2s per week on wages over £1 and 1s per week on wages under £1. The management committee of Bonnybridge Co-operative Society have agreed to give a war bonus to the whole of their employees as follows:—Married employees, 2s per week; unmarried employees, 1s per week. All over the concessions have given entire satisfaction.

Textile Mercury.
3.4.15.

of these men in their old employments Thousands have been so shaken out of their old selves in their service with the Colours that they will not tamely return to their old rounds. It is still debatable whether the effect of the war will be to cause a dearth or a surfeit of male labour in this country. Efforts are already being organised to attract the time-expired to agricultural work in the new countries, and if these succeed the provision of new industries expressly for the absorption of surplus labour loses some of its urgency. Evidently one of the specific questions upon which answers were sought from individual manufacturers referred to the subject of establishing in this country industries at present domiciled in Germany. It gives no surprise to read that in so many instances the capture of German trade involves the purchase of special and expensive machinery, and that outlay upon the new plant could only be justified by protection against German competition for a term of years. Had the Germans themselves not been protected it is likely that several of these same trades would never have grown up in their country at all.

It is easy enough to dismiss demand for import tariffs as those of a section, and abundantly clear that upon this subject manufacturers are not all of one mind Circumstances vary, and tariffs are obviously of more potential use to some than to others. Tariffs of course are not recommended, and could not be sought, by those to whom they are of no use. They are wanted purely for their utility, and it is a matter not of opinion but of fact that tariffs could be made the means of stimulating a great new activity in the development of our dormant resources. There is the certainty of much higher taxation and the prospect of higher wages in this country. In Germany there must also be higher taxes and perhaps lower wages, with greater desperation to secure foreign orders for goods. The position of our established industries is touched; and in view of the need for developing new wealth and consulting the wishes of those who are partners, doctrinaire opinions cannot be allowed to debar departures from a policy in which very large gaps have already been opened.

COTTON AND COLOUR WORKERS AND WAR BONUSES

The members of the Amalgamated Weavers' Association pride themselves, no doubt, upon the vigour and the perseverance of their officials, but they will assuredly derive little satisfaction from the result of the repetition of the demand for a "war bonus" to meet the increased cost of living. They cannot complain of any lack of doggedness on the part of their leaders, but they must realise by now that the energy devoted to pressing forward the demand for increased pay has been used in an unproductive channel. When the original application for the war bonus was made three or four weeks ago the employers' representatives made it clear that, not only could they not agree to grant an advance of 10 per cent., but they could not give a "war bonus" of any kind in the then existing state of the cotton trade. On Friday of last week the weavers repeated their application, and it was considered at a joint conference of representatives of the Amalgamation and of the be taken over from the first moment of their deposit. It would never occur to a manufacturer to hold customers liable for the loss of his goods through fire while in course of their processes, although there is just as much to be said for that practice as for the claim of the War Office. Possession implies its own responsibilities, whether the goods are only on order or are passed, sealed, and accepted. Not least of the responsibilities that it imposes is one of giving a clear intimation whether goods held in trust are or are not protected against a contingency of common enough occurrence.

Further Objection to Female Piecers

Trade-union leaders in the Lancashire cotton industry appear to be divided on the question of the employment of females as mule piecers. The tendency to reintroduce women for this work has increased as boy piecers have become scarcer. At one time females in mule-spinning rooms were almost as numerous as males, but their numbers diminished until, thirty years or so ago, they were to be found almost only in the non-trade union mills. Of late years, however, they have been readmitted to the spinning rooms, and a protest is now being made against their employment. Trade unionists in the Bolton district appear to have no objection to females being employed as piecers, but the Oldham Operative Spinners' Association have recently condemned such employment, and have received the support of Mr. James Billington, of the Preston Operative Spinners' Association. Mr. Billington is the vice-chairman of the Operative Spinners' Amalgamation, and he objects to female piecers on moral and physical grounds. He states that he would regret the stoppage of any mills through shortage of labour, but he has "no hesitation in declaring that this is preferable to going back to the days of fifty years ago, when female labour at a time of trade depression. The weavers, like other operatives in the cotton industry, are now being paid at a rate which is equal to 5 per cent. above recognised list prices.

The cardroom workers' application for a ten per cent. increase of wages, to which reference was made in our last issue, came before the general committee of the Federation of Master Cotton Spinners and Manufacturers' Associations—also on March 26th—and the committee eventually decided to confer with the representatives of the workpeople on Tuesday of this week.

At the conclusion of the conference the representatives of the Federation informed the Cardroom Workers' Amalgamation that they could not agree to the request for a ten per cent. bonus.

Employers in the dyeing and kindred trades have also received applications for war bonuses. The demand in this case was of a widespread character, and concerned workers in Yorkshire, Lancashire, Derbyshire, Cheshire, and some parts of Scotland. The application for an advance of one penny per hour to time workers, and 15 per cent. for "piece" workers, was addressed to the Bradford Dyers' Association, the British Cotton and Wool Dyers' Association, and the Calico Printers' Association. The employers have offered certain concessions, which were considered at a conference of workers' representatives (drawn from twelve trade unions) at Bradford on Saturday. The report of the 662 A.

662a/6

Liverpool Courier.
27. 4. 15.

LIVERPOOL TELEPHONE GIRLS.

No War Bonus, No Charity.

The telephone girl operators at the Liverpool General Post Office are making a determined protest against the refusal of the Government to grant a war bonus to postal employes.

When the decision of the Government became known seventy out of a staff of over a hundred trunk telephonists intimated that owing to the low wages they receive and the increased cost of living they could not afford to continue their contributions to the Post Office Relief Fund for the dependents of Post Office employés killed or wounded in action.

Inquiries go to show that the protesters earn on an average considerably less than 20s. a week, and they feel quite honestly that they ought not to continue to make voluntary contributions to charity when the calls upon them in respect to the necessities of life are increasing week by week. The bonus that was asked for by post office employés was 4s. a week to an individual earning under 40s. a week and 3s. to those in receipt of between £2 and £3.

Girl telegraphists are now reported to be following suit, and postmen in the outdistricts are similarly and for the same reason ceasing to make contributions to the fund.

The protest, it appears, has not in any way been engineered by the post-office trades union associations, but is quite unofficial and spontaneous.

34,000 Recruits from Post Office.

The liberal support which the Post Office Relief Fund has met with from the staff has enabled the committee to give assistance on a wide scale in necessitous cases arising from the absence or death of Post Office servants with the colours. The number who have joined the forces now exceeds 34,000. Among many other forms of assistance, some 400 maternity grants of 30s. have been made to wives who could not benefit under the National Health Insurance Act. Regular weekly grants have been made in cases where the dependents were not eligible for separation allowances, and special grants have been made to dependents of men who have lost their lives in the war in lieu of grants which would otherwise have been borne by the the Royal Patriotic Fund. There are on the books of the fund 417 widows and other dependents; and 624 children.

Yorkshire Eo: Post.
21. 4. 15.

THE WAR BONUS IN THE CLOTHING TRADE.

It is complained that there is an absence of uniformity in regard to the war bonus paid to Leeds clothiers' operatives. That is explained by the fact that there are a number of firms who are outside the Wholesale Clothiers' Association, and who are in some cases exceeding the bonus recommended by four-fifths of the trade.

The bonus adopted by the Association is an allowance to all factory workers (other than piece-workers) under the following scale: Sixpence weekly to boys and girls under 18 years of age; 1s. weekly to youths and girls of 18 and over with less than 30s. a week wage; 2s. weekly to men and women with wages of over 30s. and under 50s., and to all married men over 18 years of age. In regard to the question of extra payment for overtime during the war it has been decided by the Association "that we pay time and a quarter for overtime to time workers after 49½ hours per week."

Inasmuch as piece workers have lately been earning from 40 to 50 per cent. more than they do in normal times, no bonus is being paid to them, nor does it appear to be expected.

Northern Daily Telegraph.
17. 4. 15.

CHURCH FIRM'S WAR BONUSES

Messrs F. Steiner and Co., calico printers and dyers, of Church, have decided to give a war grant to a large number of employees at their various works. Women and girls will get 1s 6d per week extra; males under 18 years of age, 1s 6d per week; all males over 18 years of age, and earning under 20s, 2s 6d per week; males receiving 20s and under 35s get 2s per week.

Birmingham Post.
14. 4. 15.

A determined spirit was shown last night at mass meetings of pottery operatives held at Burslem and Tunstall on the questions of an all-round advance in wages and the employment of female labour.

At both meetings a resolution was passed demanding an immediate advance of 10% to male and female operatives in all branches of the industry, and calling upon employers to grant an immediate conference. A further resolution was passed approving of the principle that where female labour was employed to do work which would ordinarily be done by men the same rate of wages should be paid.

Mr. A. Hollins, assistant secretary of the National Society of Pottery Operatives, speaking at the Burslem meeting, explained the negotiations which had taken place with employers. The latter had promised that women employed in the place of men should be paid as far as possible the same price, provided that such work had been generally regarded by the trade as men's work. It was the qualifying words "as far as possible" to which the union officials objected. The question of female labour was of the greatest importance and was likely to lead to an acute crisis in the trade. As to the demand for an increase of wages, the employers held that they recognised the trade custom that the only time at which an increase could be demanded was at the annual bargain time on March 25.

Several operatives expressed the opinion that the ordinary rules and regulations as to the annual bargaining could not be held valid at the present time. The conditions caused by the war were extraordinary, and workers n almost every industry had secured advances to meet the increased cost of living.

The proposal of the union officials for a 10% advance was also criticised as being too moderate, and an amendment was moved that an advance of 20% should be demanded.

Another operative suggested that no further conference should be held with the employers, but that the 10% increase should be demanded at once and without negotiation.

Mr. S. Cowes, organiser of the union, urged the meeting to support the officials. They had said 10%, and they meant to get 10%. He urged also that they should adhere to the proposal for a conference. When they had exhausted every reasonable means of settling the dispute, then would be the time to consider other measures. The amendment was lost and the resolution carried by a large majority.

Yorkshire Observer.
12. IV. 15.

WAGES IN THE HEAVY WOOLLEN DISTRICT.

WAR BONUSES GRANTED.

As the result of further negotiations between representatives of the Heavy Woollen District branch of the General Union of Textile Workers and the Heavy Woollen District Manufacturers' Association a higher scale of wages has been arranged to meet the increased cost of living. The agreement will remain in operation until three months after the termination of the war. The increases offered by the employers and refused by the workers a fortnight ago ranged from 6d. to 2s. per week. An all-round improvement has been secured except in the case of the very small number of young people who are earning not more than 10s. per week.

The amended offer of the manufacturers was considered at a crowded meeting of members of the Textile Workers' Union held at the Town Hall, Dewsbury, on Saturday under the presidency of the Mayor of Batley (Mr. Ben Turner), who together with Mr. Allen Gee (Huddersfield) had been mainly responsible for the negotiations.

Mr. Ben Turner, in the course of an opening speech, remarked that during the last few weeks working people had been lectured considerably with respect to alleged time-breaking in consequence of indulgence in drink. Many of the allegations were unfounded, and certainly the charge that the output had been restricted owing to drinking habits could not be applied to the textile industries of the Heavy Woollen District, which contained a sober and hard-working population, among which there was practically no time-breaking because of alcoholic excess. Referring to the new terms to be submitted to the meeting by Mr. Gee, the chairman said there had been no attempt on the part of the union officials to bring about a breach of the existing agreement, which would naturally come to a termination on October 1. They did not regard agreements as mere scraps of paper, but as bonds to be honoured and kept. It was a matter of gratification, therefore, that they and the representatives of the employers had been able to arrive at an amicable arrangement with respect to changes which were due solely to the increased cost of living caused by the war.

Mr. Allen Gee reported that the revised terms offered by the Manufacturers' Association included advances of 2s. 6d. per week to all men now in receipt of wages of between 20s. and 30s.; 2s. per week to those with wages between 30s. and 40s.; 1s. to "liggers-on," condenser minders, burlers, knotters, &c.; and 6d. per week for young people earning between 10s. and 20s. With regard to the weavers, it had to be recognised that at present 75 per cent. of the cloth produced in the district was either khaki or blue-grey, and that weavers' wages for those fabrics had been increased 7½ to 10 per cent. in the last few months, but a bonus of an extra shilling per week was to be given. All the advances would be in the shape of war bonuses, and would be continued until three months after the declaration of peace. The bonuses would be payable upon the normal wages of a fifty-five or fifty-five and a-half hours' week would apply to both night and day workers, and would be irrespective of overtime pay. Next Friday the extra wages were to be paid as from the first pay day in April.

There was considerable discussion of the employers' offer, and some regret was expressed that the highest advance had not reached three shillings per week, but eventually the terms were accepted by a large majority, and the officials were authorised to sign the agreement on behalf of the union.

Daily Express
22. IV. 15.

NIGHT WORK ON TELEPHONES.

WOMEN WORKERS REJECT GOVERNMENT APPEAL.

The refusal of the Government to allow Post Office employees any war bonus to meet the extra cost of living is not the only matter which is causing considerable friction.

Trouble which may become serious is arising in connection with the night work of the telephones.

"The Post Office authorities," Mr. Newlove, the secretary of the Postal Telegraph Clerks' Association, told a "Daily Express" representative, "are trying to make girls work the night exchanges. Previous to the war this work was done by men, who were paid thirty shillings a week with a chance of rising to thirty-five shillings.

"The authorities insist that they cannot get men, and so they have issued an appeal to the women day workers to change to night work at wages averaging a pound a week. The women workers are refusing to do this.

"We deny that it is impossible to get the necessary men. In answer to an advertisement the authorities received more than 400 replies. Trials were given to 200 applicants. When trained and expert, they were paid 25s. a week.

"Each week large numbers leave because they cannot live on the money. From inquiries made we know that they would remain in their positions if the old wage of 30s. a week were paid."

Statements were made at the meeting of the London section of the association, held on Tuesday, that unless the authorities were willing to reconsider their attitude on this and the bonus question much more serious measures would be taken by the association.

Bradford Daily Argus
22-5-16

THE HEALTH DANGERS OF WAR WORK.

"Washing Blankets Often More Injurious":

—Miss Clementina Black.

THE health of the hundreds of thousands of women who have taken the place of men gone to the war has become a problem of immediate interest. A famous specialist remarks that unless the community is careful and considerate in its treatment of these women workers, a large proportion of whom are doing work to which they have been wholly unaccustomed, there is danger of serious breakdowns and, what is equally important, the health of the future mothers of the race will be gravely undermined.

Miss Clementina Black.

No one speaks with greater authority on all matters connected with women in the industrial world than Miss Clementina Black, whose work and writings on the Woman's Movement are so well known, and in an interview with a Weekly Dispatch representative she said it was very desirable that information on this subject of the health of the women workers should be collected in order that those occupations which were having a deleterious influence on the health of those employed in them should be known.

"At present," added Miss Black, "there is no data to guide us, but I believe that steps to bring about the necessary investigation are likely to be taken before long, and then we shall know where we stand in this matter. It is no secret, of course, that certain lead processes in pottery manufacture are injurious to women as potential mothers, and this is the only ground for differentiating between man and woman when we come to consider questions of health.

NOT ALL PROSPEROUS.

"In many firms, I am glad to say, welfare secretaries are doing admirable work in suggesting improvements in the conditions under which women are working, and steps to bring about the necessary investigation are likely to be taken before long, and then we shall know where we stand in this matter. It is no secret, of course, that certain lead processes in pottery manufacture are injurious to women as potential mothers, and this is the only ground for differentiating between men and women when we come to consider questions of health.

NOT ALL PROSPEROUS.

"In many firms, I am glad to say, welfare secretaries are doing admirable work in suggesting improvements in the conditions under which women are working, and this care must have a salutary effect. Again, a large proportion of the women workers are earning to-day wages that permit them better food. This coupled with the more sensible clothing that women wear must tend to conserve their health.

"On the other hand, it is a mistake to suppose that all the women are prosperous. There have been munition workers earning as little as 2½d. an hour, but I believe this rate of pay no longer obtains. There are girl clerks earning 35s. a week and supposed to be doing well, but in their case it is forgotten that the purchasing power of the sovereign to-day is only 11s. 9d.

"Some of the occupations which women have undertaken obviously are healthier than others. The woman omnibus conductor, for instance, seems to find her duties and the open-air life agree very well, and I have only noticed one woman conductor who looked pale and tired. The lift girls in charge of lifts that work easily also seem to enjoy good health.

INJURIOUS HOME WORK.

"Occupations that we think dangerous to women are not necessarily so. The washing and wringing by hand of blankets and other heavy things often does more harm than other work which we think dangerous, and often domestic work as it is carried on in some of the poorer homes has a more injurious effect on women as mothers than many occupations that are often quoted.

"Unduly long hours and ill-ventilated workshops along with under-feeding are the main sources of injury to women's health. In the past it was considered the correct thing for women to be very genteel in their appetites, and the present generation to some extent is suffering from that folly; but, generally speaking, the modern girl is more robustly built than her mother and inherited influences are gradually being eliminated.

"Again, the larger opportunities for work for women are certainly improving the health of a certain class of girls, the daughters of fairly well-to-do parents, who have suffered in the past from underwork, which can be quite as injurious to health as overwork. Formerly women were reproached for going into work; now I expect women will be reproached for staying at home, for undoubtedly they have proved their capacity in the industrial world.

"I think that relaxing the regulations of the Factory Acts was a mistake. Experience has proved that if you work people unduly long at a stretch you do not, except for a few weeks, increase the amount of their output, and there is no doubt that women's health has suffered as a consequence of these abnormal demands on their vitality. Nevertheless, I think it only fair to say that I have not heard during the [illegible] of any woman dying from overwork."

Newcastle Chronicle.
14.4.15

TRAMWAYMEN AND THE WAR BONUS.

Resolution to Take a Strike Ballot.

The Board of Trade to be Approached.

A mass meeting of Newcastle tramwaymen was held in the Temperance Institute, Rutherford Street, on Sunday morning, for the purpose of considering the recent decision of the City Council on the question of war bonuses. It will be remembered that the tramwaymen first approached the Council for a 5s. a week bonus all round, but the Council met this with an offer of 2s. 6d. a week to men earning less than 30s. a week, 1s. 6d. to those earning 30s. or more but less than 40s., and 1s. to boys of 18 years of age. That scale came into force on April 1, and has given rise to dissatisfaction among the men, with the result that at the last meeting of the City Council a further deputation from the Newcastle branch of the Amalgamated Association of Tramways and Vehicle Workers waited upon the members, and asked for the matter to be reconsidered. They urged that the scale hit the older men of the service unfairly.

Yesterday's meeting was presided over by Mr. P. Millane, and there was only a small attendance. The Chairman announced that the local committee had not been able to arrive at any satisfactory settlement, and had passed a resolution to be submitted for the approval of the mass meeting. The facts were that there were men of certain departments who were receiving war bonuses of 2s. 6d, 3s., and 4s a week, while the tramwaymen were singled out for a bonus of 1s 6d. They did not wish to take any hostile action, but they were out to demand equal treatment for all traffic employes. ("Hear, hear.")

Mr. H. Goodhead, secrteary of the branch, reported upon the negotiations with the City Council ant the Tramways Committee. He considered that the chairman of the Tramways Committee and the manager throughout the whole business had treated the men in the most callous manner. ("Hear, hear." They had not treated the men as they should have done in times such as they were living in. The men had been made a laughing stock, and had been fooled long enough. The ballot had already gone against the Council's scale, and it was for that meeting to consider the resolution passed by the branch committee. That resolution was as follows:

"That this meeting calls upon the City Council to grant 3s. bonus to all tramway employes over 21 years of age, to be paid pro rata; and that unless this be included in the wages paid on Friday, the 23rd of April, the men withdraw their labour as from midnight on Friday, the 23rd. That a ballot be taken on Monday, the 19th of April of all grades of tramway employes."

Mr. Goodhead then referred to the possible introduction of female labour on the tramcars, and what he called the pessimism of Alderman Rodgers. He said that at one time the men agreed to stop the cars if women were introduced, but since then matters had changed, and they did not yet know what they might have to face. Accordingly, they were prepared to meet the City Council so long as their own interests were safeguarded. If the Tramways Committee would consult the branch, he felt sure the officials were quite prepared to do all in their power to assist in any genuine attempt to help the country. They must see, however, that the women received the man's wage for the same work, and that the women were members of the trades union. (Applause.) Those were the only conditions they would make. He contended that before any employer changed the personnel of any labour, the trade union organisation affected ought to be consulted. If the Tramways Committee consulted them they would assist the women.

In reply to a question, the Secretary said the permission of the Executive of the Association had not been sought to press the proposed resolution to its extreme.

It was moved, as an alternative to the proposed resolution, that the Board of Trade should be asked to intervene with a view to the matter being settled by arbitration, but this was not seconded.

Another member suggested that in any case the Board of Trade would step in, and it was for the men to take some drastic action, and show they were going to stick up like men. He moved the resolution as submitted by the Branch Committee, and this was seconded by another member.

A member of the last deputation suggested that if Monday's ballot was in favour of a strike the secretary should be empowered to open up negotiations with the Board of Trade for a settlement by arbitration. He said that this course would avert a strike on Friday.

[redacted]

Nottingham Guardian
13.4.15.

662A.

662a/8

WAR BONUS FOR DERBY MILL GIRLS.

After the 250 girls employed at Mr. A. Green's tape and gimp mills, Agard-street, Derby, had been granted a war bonus of 1s. a week yesterday, a number of them came out on strike on the question of overtime rates. They returned, however, on a promise being given that the matter should be discussed with a deputation. Government contracts are being executed at the mills.

Yorkshire Observer.
1.2.15

THE WOOLLEN CLOTH TRADE

BATLEY MILLS BUSY ON WAR CONTRACTS.

PROFIT-SHARING FIRM'S INCREASED BONUS.

As managing director of the profit-sharing firm of Messrs. J., T. and J. Taylor, Ltd., woollen manufacturers, Mr. Theodore C. Taylor delivered an important speech at the twenty-third annual meeting of the company, which was held in the Victoria Hall, Batley, on Saturday night. The chairman was supported by Mrs. Taylor and Messrs. A. Medway (London), F. Bean (Bramley), Montagu Crothers, W. Barron, R. Simpson, Hamilton Crothers, H. Binks, J. W. Barrow, W. Rushby, T. Smithson, R. B. Hocknell, J. W. Simpson, N. Grimshaw, A. Hampshire, A. H. Bird, A. P. Bland, E. Kirk, J. Isles, T. H. Sykes, H. Brook, and others. There was a crowded gathering of employees, who received with enthusiasm an announcement of a cash dividend of 12½ per cent. on the shares, as compared with 10 per cent. twelve months ago, and single and double wage bonuses of 7½ per cent. and 15 per cent. respectively, as against 5 per cent. and 10 per cent. last year.

Mr. Theodore Taylor stated that the firm began business seventy years ago with a capital of £120 subscribed by John Taylor, £80 by James Taylor, and £50 or £60 by Joshua Taylor, the speaker's father; but the family had been engaged in the cloth making trade for 150 years, including ninety-four years at the Blakeridge Mills, which were bought by his grandfather in 1820. Twenty-three years ago, when the speaker took over the business from his late partners and placed it on a profit-sharing basis, there were 600 employees, and now there were 1,800 in the Batley mills alone. During last year the firm had purchased premises and machinery at Bramley for the extension of their business.

The year 1914 would always be memorable, Mr. Taylor went on to say, as that in which the greatest war in the history of the world began, and no one knew the year in which it would cease. Already the cost, the destruction, the ruin, and the horrors of the war had amply justified those who had made it part of their life's mission to work for peace, and there could be no better reason for fighting through to the end than the belief that they were fighting for an ultimate and permanent peace, not based on military despotism but on liberty. Those who were engaged in manufacturing and trading concerns must recognise that in the long run they would lose by the war. The enormous sums now being spent by the nations which were fighting, and by other nations in preparing for war, were for the most part being borrowed—less in proportion, he believed, by England than any other country—and later on they would have to be repaid out of the toil of a poorer world. It was an absurd and false doctrine that wealth could be increased by the destruction of property, and it was deplorable that intelligent nations were engaged not only in killing each other but in ruining each other and themselves. Not only from a Christian and humanitarian point of view, but on economic and financial grounds they must believe in, pray for, hope for, and work for the coming of a world-wide peace.

In the meantime all should do their utmost to secure victory for the cause of justice and truth. In this connection Mr. Taylor stated that, in spite of the fact that almost ever since the war broke out the firm had been so busy, no fewer than fifty-two of their men had volunteered for military or naval service or to assist in the care of the wounded. He most heartily approved of the compilation of rolls of honour, and therefore he would give the names of all those who had gone from the company's mills to take part in the war. Having read the roll of honour, Mr. Taylor said that as half the employees were women or girls, and a large proportion of the men were over the military age, he thought the firm's contribution was not a bad one. (Hear, hear.) He was very glad that the funds of the company would permit of all the dependents of those who had gone away being so provided for that they would be no worse off than if their menkind had remained at home—(applause)—and that this would be done without any call upon the local war relief fund. He hoped that in Batley there would be periodical free conversaziones for the wives of soldiers and sailors, and he suggested this as an addition to the excellent work which the Mayor and Mayoress were doing.

CLOTHING THE BRITISH FORCES.

Proceeding, Mr. Taylor observed that the firm's greatest contribution to the war was the manufacture of cloth for the Government. From the first he and all his colleagues in the management felt that nothing could be too good in the way of food, clothing, and equipment for our fighting men. Therefore they decided that if the Government would pay a price for cloth made entirely of wool they would [redacted] superior technical training, partly to commercial enterprise, and partly to monopolist methods, the Germans had captured 90 per cent. of the dyewares trade. The British Government had been preparing plans for meeting the difficulty, but their first scheme was thoroughly impracticable. The scheme as amended was much improved, but he would strongly advise the Committee to learn a lesson from those of the English working-classes who were looking after their own interests by co-operation and "divi." He was pleased to see that the President of the Board of Trade had secured the services of Sir Mark Oldroyd on the Committee, the recommendations of which he hoped would include the provision that profits should be distributed largely in the shape of dividends on customers' purchases. The users of dyewares should be asked to co-operate in the scheme, and they should be rewarded in proportion to the practical co-operation which they gave as customers.

DIVIDEND AND BONUSES.

In conclusion Mr. Taylor said he supposed the workpeople for the firm would expect a dividend based on the conditions of things which had lately prevailed, but he was afraid they would be disappointed. He hoped, however, that the directors and managers would not be considered unworthy of confidence when he announced that they could not pay a dividend of more than 12½ per cent. on the shares. (Applause.) He was glad to learn from the reception given to the statement that the workpeople could be so reasonably satisfied. (Laughter.) The dividend on the shares would be in cash. The bonus on wages would be 7½ per cent. to employees who had been with the firm for a year, and a double bonus of 15 per cent. would be given to those not less than 21 years of age who had been employed by the company at least five years and owned shares to the value of half a year's wages. The bonuses would be given in fully-paid shares, which would participate in any future cash dividend. (Applause.)

[illegible] strike on Friday
[illegible] was a good deal
[illegible] of the present time,
[illegible] was going to be a struggle the [illegible] Committee should be made responsible for it. They were ready for arbitration, and had a good case for arbitration.

An addition was made to the resolution empowering the secretary to approach the Board of Trade after the result of the ballot was known, and the resolution in the amended form was carried.

A ballot for or against a strike will be taken amongst the tramwaymen to-day.

greatest contribution to the war was the manufacture of cloth for the Government. From the first he and all his colleagues in the management felt that nothing could be too good in the way of food, clothing, and equipment for our fighting men. Therefore they decided that if the Government would pay a price for cloth made entirely of wool they would make it of nothing else, and, as those in the audience knew, they had done so. If they had not made as much profit as otherwise they might have made they had the satisfaction of knowing that some hundreds of thousands of British soldiers were wearing cloth which, he ventured to say, was more durable than soldiers had ever worn before. Now that the needs of the Army were being more fully met and the requirements of the Government might be somewhat relaxed it was hoped that the firm would be able to serve better those ordinary customers who had shown such loyal patience in forbearing to press for the execution of orders.

Before leaving the question of Army and Navy orders, Mr. Taylor said he wished to say that so far as his own knowledge went there was no foundation for rumours that the Government had accepted inferior or rubbishy cloth. There was no doubt that such cloth had been made, and he believed it had been used by the Territorial Forces and not ordered directly by the Government. In the early days of that firm the Government adopted a foolish policy of demanding from each firm a declaration that no shoddy should be used in the cloth. The only result was to put a premium on lying and to place orders with the worst rather than with the best of the manufacturers. Now the British Government, like all others who understood their business, had adopted the much better plan of a strength test, which was the best which could be applied to the wearing qualities of cloth. It was possible to make cloth of tender or even rotten wool, and in that case it would be worse than that produced from good waste or good shoddy. Of course there was nothing to beat wool if it was new and sound, and it was from such material that the firm were supplying the needs of the Government.

In regard to the matter of equipment the speaker said we could always afford to admit the truth, and there was no doubt as to the thoroughness of the Germans. They were thoroughly wicked, thoroughly cruel, and they were thoroughly intelligent, educated, and prepared for war. When comparisons were made, however, it should be remembered that the German preparations had extended over many years, while ours had not—his being one of the best proofs that England did not intend war and that Germany did. (Applause.) The manner in which Lord Kitchener and his colleagues had overcome the difficulties with which they were confronted at the commencement of the war was one of the most creditable stories in the history of the War Office. When victory was achieved, as it surely would be, it would be due not only to the bravery of our forces and the tactics of our generals and admirals, but to the fact that our soldiers and sailors had been properly fed, clothed, and armed.

SACRIFICES OF THE WORKERS.

Mr. Taylor next expressed his thanks to the employees for the willing manner in which they had worked overtime. He said he had seen in the press statements, which he hoped were exaggerated, as to excessively long hours and the bad effects on the health of the workers. He was sorry that women should have to work overtime, but he knew they had done it cheerfully for the sake of the soldiers and the sailors. When he heard the girls singing as merrily as larks in the mill at 7 o'clock at night he had said, "Those girls know they are doing their duty to the country," and they were. (Applause.) The speaker proceeded to refer to the agitation for the subduing of the lights at the mills in view of the possibility of Zeppelin raids, and said the firm had decided to provide blinds which would give a proper degree of darkness, and tend to safety from the attacks of aircraft. Turning to the measures taken in connection with the firm under the Insurance Act, Mr. Taylor said that in two years over £1,000 had been disbursed in sickness and maternity benefits, and he estimated the sanatorium benefits at about £800. The firm paid death benefits of £5 to the relatives of deceased employees, and paid half the workpeople's insurance contributions as well as the whole of the employers' contributions.

As to the course of trade in the past year, Mr. Taylor traced the gradual revival during the first six months, and agreed with Sir Edward Holden that the curious slackening in July was due to the action of the German financiers, who must have been secretly informed of Germany's intention to commence war, and accordingly cleared the decks by realising securities in this country. By the end of July the crisis had come. The immediate results of the declaration of war were disastrous, and for a time many otherwise sane and sober men of business lost their heads. Very soon there followed similar results to those which attended the Franco-German war forty-four years ago. Notwithstanding the fact that England was now one of the fighting nations the woollen trade for the time being—and he used that qualification advisedly—had gained as greatly as it did from the last great Continental war. Following the scarcity of wool the difficulties of manufacturers had been increased by the dyewares problem, which had become acute. Owing partly to Manchester Guardian, May 1st. 1915:

662a/9 662a

COTTON TRADE DISPUTE.

CARDROOM DEMAND FOR BONUS.

A DIFFICULT SITUATION.

An endeavour by the Oldham Cardroom Association to secure the payment of a 10 per cent bonus on wages at two Oldham mills has assumed a large importance in the cotton industry. The Emergency Committee of the Federation of Master Cotton Spinners issues the warning that if the cardroom workers persist in their demand the dispute will not be fought out sectionally but by the trade as a whole. In other words, the whole strength of the Masters' Federation will be employed to resist the payment of the bonus.

The language is ominous, and it is significant of the gravity of the situation that the Masters' Federation puts its case forward so fully. But it is apparent that the controversy need not have reached a final stage. That depends, at the moment, on the wisdom and tact exercised by the Cardroom Association. If the workpeople at the termination of the notices begin a strike, the area of the dispute will at once be made trade wide. If, however (to use a phrase prompted by the times), the beginning of hostilities can be deferred and opportunity given for the claims to be investigated, it may be possible to reach a peaceful settlement of the trouble.

The Master Spinners decline to reopen the question of the payment of a war bonus, and they repeat their statement of the reasons why the trade is unable to bear the charge which a bonus would lay upon it—"After the war commenced many firms continued running their mills simply for the purpose of finding the workpeople employment; many took orders at unprofitable prices; and, at the present time, taking the trade as a whole, financial sacrifices are being made by employers in order to keep their mills running." If it is not a war bonus but a bonus on coarse counts which is wanted the employers point to the lists and agreements which govern such questions. But there is, in the Federation's statement, a suggestion that perhaps it is neither of these things which the workpeople specifically want, and that if it is a case of claiming a share in "more than normal profits" resulting from the fulfilment of War Office contracts the Federation will be prepared "very favourably" to consider the claims. It is on this by no means sure ground that a way out of the difficulty may be found. We understand that the Cardroom Association has not made quite clear what are the grounds upon which the bonus is asked for.

The Masters' Position.

The following is the statement issued by the Master Cotton Spinners' Federation:—

A special meeting of the Emergency Committee of the Federation of Master Cotton Spinners' Associations (which represents all the districts in the Federation) was held on Thursday under the chairmanship of Mr. J. B. Tattersall for the purpose of considering what action should be taken in connection with the claims for a 10 per cent bonus made by the Cardroom Association on Messrs. the Forge Mill Company, Limited, Oldnam, and Messrs. James Stott, Limited, Oldham. Similar claims, it was reported, were being made on three firms spinning 36's counts and below. The ground on which the claims were made on the two firms was that they were spinning coarse counts. The claims had been dealt with by the Joint Committees in Oldham without any settlement being come to.

The matter was very carefully discussed by the Emergency Committee, and it was the unanimous opinion of that Committee that these and similar claims, if persisted in, should be unitedly resisted by the whole force of the Federation. The following resolutions were unanimously adopted:—

1. If these claims are made simply because the firms are spinning coarse counts, by which we understand you to mean 36's and below, which definition we cannot accept, we emphatically decline to agree to them. An acceptance of such claims would mean the abrogation of all agreements and lists where provision is already made for the payments of coarse counts and would be a grave injustice to firms who are engaged on this work, which would inevitably lead to widespread trouble. If the claims for bonuses for coarse work are persisted in steps will be taken for dealing with the same.

2. If the claims are made on the grounds that these two firms are working on direct War Office contracts and, as firms, are making more than normal profits as a result of such contracts we are prepared, if these points can be proved, to very favourably consider the claims and if possible arrange the payment of a bonus during the continuance of such contracts, but claims made on any other grounds will be viewed as a sectional attack upon our members, and as such will be unitedly resisted.

3. The Committee wish to point out that after the war commenced very many firms continued running their mills simply for the purpose of finding the workpeople employment, when, if they had considered the question from a business point of view only, they would have closed their mills. Very many firms took orders at unprofitable prices in order to provide employment, and at the present time, taking the trade as a whole, financial sacrifices are being made by employers in order to keep their mills running. If, notwithstanding these facts and the existence of lists and agreements, the Cardroom Amalgamation persist in attacking the trade sectionally, then the trade as a whole will be forced to deal with the situation.

Fruitless Joint Meeting.

A special sub-committee of the Federation was also appointed to meet the Cardroom representatives at a joint meeting yesterday. At this joint meeting no agreement was come to, and the resolutions of the Federation Emergency Committee were communicated to the Cardroom representatives.

The Federation intends to make an investigation into the position of Messrs. the Forge Mill Company, Limited, and Messrs. James Stott, Limited, for the purpose of ascertaining if they come within the terms of the second resolution of the Emergency Committee.

It was also decided to issue on Monday next the following circular to the Federation members:—

"Dear sir or sirs,—I am instructed to inform you that in some districts of the Federation the local Cardroom Association has made claims for a 10 per cent bonus on wages notwithstanding the refusal by the Federation on March 30 to grant such bonus. Arising out of claims made on two firms in the Oldham district (Messrs. James Stott, Limited, and Messrs. the Forge Mill Company, Limited) the matter has engaged the attention of the Emergency Committee of the Federation. The claims on these two firms are made on the ground that the firms are spinning coarse counts, and similar claims are being made on firms spinning 36's counts and below.

"The Federation Emergency Committee take a very serious view of these claims, as it is obvious that if concessions were agreed to by the Federation at these two firms solely on the grounds that they were spinning coarse counts the same concessions must apply to all other firms in the Federation engaged on similar work, quite irrespective of lists, agreements, or whether the firms are profitably engaged or not, and the claims would undoubtedly extend to and affect firms spinning finer counts. In effect such claims constitute a sectional attack on the Federation members, which your Emergency Committee feel should be strongly resisted. After full consideration your Committee has unanimously adopted the resolutions printed on fly-leaf hereof. These resolutions have been communicated to the representatives of the Cardroom Amalgamation at a joint meeting held on Friday.

"In pursuance of these resolutions all members are advised and warned not to make any private arrangements with the Cardroom organisation, but to refer any claims made upon them to the local employers' secretary. If the claims for a bonus for coarse counts are persisted in and any mill is put on strike for non-compliance with such claim the Federation will issue a recommendation on the action to be taken by the members, and it is confidently hoped and expected that your firm will loyally carry out such recommendation."

Manchester Eve. Chronicle, May 7th. 1915:

COTTON TRADE BONUS.

Workers Persist in Demand.

CRITICAL SITUATION.

Important Conference Held To-day.

The position in the Lancashire cotton trade, caused by the threat of the Master Cotton Spinners' Federation to lock out the whole trade if any strikes were declared on the war bonus question, has been made acute by the fact that notices have and will be served at a number of cotton mills in Oldham and the Manchester district.

The cardroom operatives, from whom the claim originated, now point to the fact that the recent returns show spinning mill profits to be well up to the average, and they contend that a bonus can be easily paid.

The amalgamation, it is officially stated, intend to pursue the policy they had adopted unless the employers are prepared to become amenable to reason.

The position to-day is that the federation has threatened to take drastic action if any mill was stopped. The Cardroom Amalgamation has replied by serving notices which expire a week hence. At the end of that time unless there is intervention there will be grave trouble in the cotton trade.

Notice has been handed in at three mills, one in Oldham, where the Federation Committee had refused the bonus, and two in Rochdale.

The monthly meeting of the federation was held this afternoon, and, in view of the decision of the Emergency Committee that the united forces of the federation would be employed to prevent any firm being harassed by such applications, it is expected that the whole federation would agree to pursue the attitude taken up by the committee. The Oldham Master Spinners' Association meet this evening to discuss the matter, and in view of the attitude of the federation the decision of the association is a foregone conclusion.

The question as to whether firms against whom claims have been made are engaged, partially or wholly, on Government work has had close investigation, and it has been found difficult to estimate the probable amount of work being carried out. But it is a curious coincidence that the demand is being made at mills spinning coarse counts.

BOTH SIDES FIRM.

In the Oldham district developments are awaited with anxiety, and as both employers and operatives are showing the utmost firmness, the situation is extremely grave. There is hope, however, that some compromise will be effected which will prevent a general strike or lock out, now threatened.

To-night additional claims for a war bonus for the cardroom operatives of two Royton mills will be presented to the local Employers' Association, but the application will be only a formal matter in view of the general attitude of the Employers' Federation.

Mr. James Crinion, president of the Cardroom Amalgamation, in an interview with an Evening Chronicle representative, to-day, said the Amalgamation intended to pursue the policy they had adopted unless the employers were amenable to reason and dealt with cases on their merits. He regretted that up to the present the employers had not shown themselves amenable, and had not even attempted to open up any discussion which would show reason why the claims of the cardroom people should not be persevered with.

He could not understand why there should be differential treatment between male and female employes in federated mills. They could take it from him that the females who did a heavy portion of the work in the cardroom were not likely quickly to allow their male colleagues [illegible] of the same trade union, so long fully. But it is apparent that the controversy need not have reached a final stage. That depends, at the moment, on the wisdom and tact exercised by the Cardroom Association. If the workpeople at the termination of the notices begin a strike, the area of the dispute will at once be made trade wide. If, however (to use a phrase prompted by the times), the beginning of hostilities can be deferred and opportunity given for the claims to be investigated, it may be possible to reach a peaceful settlement of the trouble.

The Master Spinners decline to reopen the question of the payment of a war bonus, and they repeat their statement of the reasons why the trade is unable to bear the charge which a bonus would lay upon it—"After the war commenced many firms continued running their mills simply for the purpose of finding the workpeople employment; many took orders at unprofitable prices; and, at the present time, taking the trade as a whole, financial sacrifices are being made by employers in order to keep their mills running." If it is not a war bonus but a bonus on coarse counts which is wanted the employers point to the lists and agreements which govern such questions. But there is, in the Federation's statement, a suggestion that perhaps it is neither of these things which the workpeople specifically want, and that if it is a case of claiming a share in "more than normal profits" resulting from the fulfilment of War Office contracts the Federation will be prepared "very favourably" to consider the claims. It is on this by no means sure ground that a way out of the difficulty may be found. We understand that the Cardroom Association has not made quite clear what are the grounds upon which the bonus is asked for.

The Masters' Position.

The following is the statement issued by the Master Cotton Spinners' Federation:—

A special meeting of the Emergency Committee of the Federation of Master Cotton Spinners' Associations (which represents all the districts in the Federation) was held on Thursday under the chairmanship of Mr. J. B. Tattersall for the purpose of considering what action should be taken in connection with the claims for a 10 per cent bonus made by the Cardroom Association on Messrs. the Forge Mill Company, Limited, Oldnam, and Messrs. James Stott, Limited, Oldham. Similar claims, it was reported, were being made on three firms spinning 36's counts and below. The ground on which the claims were made on the two firms was that they were spinning coarse counts. The claims nad been dealt with by the Joint Committees in Oldham without any settlement being come to.

The matter was very carefully discussed by the Emergency Committee, and it was the unanimous opinion of that Committee that these and similar claims, if persisted in, should unprofitable prices in order to provide employment, and at the present time, taking the trade as a whole, financial sacrifices are being made by employers in order to keep their mills running. If, notwithstanding these facts and the existence of lists and agreements, the Cardroom Amalgamation persist in attacking the trade sectionally, then the trade as a whole will be forced to deal with the situation.

Fruitless Joint Meeting.

A special sub-committee of the Federation was also appointed to meet the Cardroom representatives at a joint meeting yesterday. At this joint meeting no agreement was come to, and the resolutions of the Federation Emergency Committee were communicated to the Cardroom representatives.

The Federation intends to make an investigation into the position of Messrs. the Forge Mill Company, Limited, and Messrs. James Stott, Limited, for the purpose of ascertaining if they come within the terms of the second resolution of the Emergency Committee.

It was also decided to issue on Monday next the following circular to the Federation members:—

"Dear sir or sirs,—I am instructed to inform you that in some districts of the Federation the local Cardroom Association has made claims for a 10 per cent bonus on wages notwithstanding the refusal by the Federation on March 30 to grant such bonus. Arising out of claims made on two firms in the Oldham district (Messrs. James Stott, Limited, and Messrs. the Forge Mill Company, Limited) the matter has engaged the attention of the Emergency Committee of the Federation. The claims on these two firms are made on the ground that the firms are spinning coarse counts, and similar claims are being made on firms spinning 36's counts and below.

"The Federation Emergency Committee take a very serious view of these claims, as it is obvious that if concessions were agreed to by the Federation at these two firms solely on the grounds that they were spinning coarse counts the same concessions must apply to all other firms in the Federation engaged on similar work, quite irrespective of lists, agreements, or whether the firms are profitably engaged or not, and the claims would undoubtedly extend to and affect firms spinning finer counts. In effect such claims constitute a sectional attack on the Federation members, which your Emergency Committee feel should be strongly resisted. After full consideration your Committee has unanimously adopted the resolutions printed on fly-leaf hereof. These resolutions have been communicated to the representatives of the Cardroom Amalgamation at a joint meeting held on Friday.

"In pursuance of these resolutions all members are advised and warned not to make any private arrangements with the Cardroom organisation, but to refer any claims made upon them to the local employers' secretary. If the claims for a bonus for coarse counts are persisted in and any mill is put on strike for non-compliance with such claim the Federation will issue a recommendation on the action to be taken by the members, and it is confidently hoped and expected that your firm will loyally carry out such recommendation."

has been made acute by the fact that notices have and will be served at a number of cotton mills in Oldham and the Manchester district.

The cardroom operatives, from whom the claim originated, now point to the fact that the recent returns show spinning mill profits to be well up to the average, and they contend that a bonus can be easily paid.

The amalgamation, it is officially stated, intend to pursue the policy they had adopted unless the employers are prepared to become amenable to reason.

The position to-day is that the federation has threatened to take drastic action if any mill was stopped. The Cardroom Amalgamation has replied by serving notices which expire a week hence. At the end of that time unless there is intervention there will be grave trouble in the cotton trade.

Notice has been handed in at three mills, one in Oldham, where the Federation Committee had refused the bonus, and two in Rochdale.

The monthly meeting of the federation was held this afternoon, and, in view of the decision of the Emergency Committee that the united forces of the federation would be employed to prevent any firm being harassed by such applications, it is expected that the whole federation would agree to pursue the attitude taken up by the committee. The Oldham Master Spinners' Association meet this evening to discuss the matter, and in view of the attitude of the federation the decision of the association is a foregone conclusion.

The question as to whether firms against whom claims have been made are engaged, partially or wholly, on Government work has had close investigation, and it has been found difficult to estimate the probable amount of work being carried out. But it is a curious coincidence that the demand is being made at mills spinning coarse counts.

BOTH SIDES FIRM.

In the Oldham district developments are awaited with anxiety, and as both employers and operatives are showing the utmost firmness, the situation is extremely grave. There is hope, however, that some compromise will be effected which will prevent a general strike or lock out, now threatened.

To-night additional claims for a war bonus for the cardroom operatives of two Royton mills will be presented to the local Employers' Association, but the application will be only a formal matter in view of the general attitude of the Employers' Federation.

Mr. James Crinion, president of the Cardroom Amalgamation, in an interview with an Evening Chronicle representative, to-day, said the Amalgamation intended to pursue the policy they had adopted unless the employers were amenable to reason and dealt with cases on their merits. He regretted that up to the present the employers had not shown themselves amenable, and had not even attempted to open up any discussion which would show reason why the claims of the cardroom people should not be persevered with.

He could not understand why there should be differential treatment between male and female employes in federated mills. They could take it from him that the females who did a heavy portion of the work in the cardroom were not likely quietly to allow their male colleagues, members of the same trade union, to have a bonus when they themselves were denied.

"EXTREMELY BUSY."

One large spinning concern in the federation had paid extra for that kind of work now in question, ever since they got the order for that work, and if one firm could do it why could not other firms engaged on the same class of work?

An important point was that the organ of the employers admitted that "firms engaged on coarse numbers are known to be extremely busy, and are engaged on profitable yarns." The Cardroom Amalgamation were only asking such firms to pay the bonus. There were firms in the Oldham district, who were declaring from time to time dividends up to 20 per cent.

The Cardroom Amalgamation this afternoon made an application to the hard cotton waste trade for a ten per cent. war bonus.

Manchester Evg Chronicle,
May 7th. 1915.

THREATENED LOCK-OUT.

Cotton Spinners' Firm Stand.

WORKERS' DEMANDS.

Masters Adhere to Policy of Resistance.

The Lancashire Cotton Spinners' Federation this afternoon decided unanimously to support the Emergency Committee in its threat to lock out all card-room workers if any mills were to be on strike through non-payment of war bonus.

The meeting passed the following resolutions:—

(1) That a special sub-committee, consisting of Messrs. Tattersall, P. Ashworth, W. Hamer, J. M. Thomas, R. Worswick, J. M' Connell, H. Cliffe, and F. Holroyd, be and is hereby appointed with plenary powers, to take all steps for resisting the Cardroom Amalagamation demands for a 10 per cent. bonus on 36 counts and below.

(2) That in the event of the Forge Mill Company, Limited, being put on strike, the meeting pledges itself loyally to carry out any recommendation the above-mentioned committee may make to the members of the Federation.

It was also decided to issue a circular to members convening a meeting to be held in the Coal Exchange, Market-place, Manchester, on Friday next, the 14th inst., at which the above two resolutions will be submitted for approval or otherwise.

The General Committee endorsed the view that all claims made on firms, on the grounds that they were spinning coarse counts from 36's downwards should be resisted, and that if any claims made on individual firms on the grounds that they were, on War Office contracts, making more than normal profits, that all such claims should be dealt with on their merits.

It was recognised that the Cardroom Amalgamation might find it difficult, and even impossible, of themselves to prove those two points, but the Federation never intended to leave the question of proof to the Cardroom Amalgamation alone, but will jointly assist in any investigation in order to ascertain what were the actual facts of the particular case where a claim on this ground had been made.

Manchester Courier,
May 8th. 1915.

TROUBLE IN COTTON TRADE.

MASTERS TO RESIST A STRIKE.

GENERAL ACTION PLEDGED

An important meeting was held in Manchester yesterday of the Committee of the Lancashire Cotton Spinners and Manufacturers' Federation, Mr. J. B. Tattersall presiding, when a report was discussed of the Emergency Committee on the question of the Cardroom Amalgamation's claim for a 10 per cent bonus on 36 counts and below. It was reported that two cases had been dealt with—Messrs. Stott Ltd. and the Forge Mill Company Ltd. In the case of the former, investigation showed that the firm came within the terms of the Emergency Committee's resolution dealing with War Office contracts and profits, and the 10 per cent bonus will be paid. In the case of the Forge Mill Company, the conditions were different and did not warrant the payment of any bonus. The bonus at this firm was, therefore, declined, and the operatives on Wednesday tendered notices to cease work, and these terminate on Wednesday next.

In view of this fact the committee considered what steps should be taken for dealing with the situation that would arise if the Forge Mill Company be put on strike, and the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:

1. That a special sub-committee, consisting of Messrs. Tattersall, P. Ashworth, W. Hamer, J. M. Thomas, R. Worswick, W. McConnel, H. Clift, and L. Holroyd, be and is hereby appointed with plenary powers to take all steps for resisting the Cardroom Amalgamation demands for a 10 per cent bonus on 36 counts and below.
2. That in the event of the Forge Mill Company Limited being put on strike, the meeting pledges itself loyally to carry out any recommendation the above-mentioned committee may make to the members of the Federation.

It was decided to issue a circular to members convening a meeting to be held in the Coal Exchange, Market-place, Manchester, on Friday next, the 14th inst., at which the above two resolutions will be submitted for approval or otherwise.

The General Committee endorsed the view that all claims made on firms on the grounds that they were spinning coarse counts from 36's downwards should be unitedly resisted, but if any claims were made on individual firms on the grounds that they were on War Office contracts, making more than normal profits, that all such claims should be dealt with on their merits.

It was recognised that the Cardroom Amalgamation might find it difficult, and even impossible, of themselves to prove those two points, but the Federation never intended to leave the question of proof to the Cardroom Amalgamation alone, but will jointly assist in any investigation in order to ascertain what were the actual facts of the particular case where a claim on this ground had been made.

NO WAR BONUS.

EMPLOYERS' REPLY TO THE WASTE SPINNERS.

A joint meeting was held in Manchester yesterday between representatives of the Cotton Waste Spinners' and Manufacturers' Association and the Amalgamated Association of Card and Blowing Room Operatives to discuss an applica-

662a/10 662a

Manchester Guardian,
May 14th. 1915.

SALFORD TRAMWAYS

ARBITRATION ON THE WAR BONUS.

The Salford Tramways Committee, at the instance of the Mayor of Salford, agreed yesterday to accept the suggestion of the men that the subject of an advance in wages to meet the increased cost of living due to the war should be referred to arbitration. They express regret at the attitude the men have taken up at this time, and make it clear that their action is without prejudice to any similar claims that may be made in the future. This decision changes the entire aspect of the dispute between the Tramways Committee and the men.

The dispute had reached an acute stage yesterday. The original demand of the men was for a 15 per cent rise in wages. By a resolution of the Salford Council the Tramways Committee, in common with other Committees of the Council, was empowered to decide what war bonus it should pay its employees, and it offered a bonus of 2s. a week on wages less than 28s. The men argued that this form of bonus would have the effect of bringing the wages of newly engaged employees, working overtime, up to, if not beyond the level of wages paid to men of senior service. They threatened to strike if this inequality remained unadjusted, but they were persuaded by the leaders of the Tramway and Vehicle Workers' Union to suggest to the Tramways Committee that the matter should be referred to arbitration. The Tramways Committee held that this course was not justified since the Salford men represented only one-quarter of those employed on tramway work in the area of Manchester and Salford. They felt that any arbitration entered upon should apply to the whole area of Manchester and Salford. Thereupon a ballot of the men was taken to decide whether or not they should withdraw their labour. The result of the ballot was yesterday submitted to the monthly meeting of the Executive Committee of the Tramway and Vehicle Workers' Union, and it was stated that it resulted in a large majority being in favour of a strike. The action of the Tramways Committee in submitting the case to arbitration may, however, be taken as nullifying the importance of this somewhat serious attitude of the men.

Women as Tram Guards.

While this dispute has been developing the men have shown resentment against the action of the Tramways Committee in employing women as conductors on the tramcars. This resentment is probably no more than a strong prejudice against the innovation, and there is every likelihood that, if the bonus is satisfactorily settled, the men will accept women as co-workers without making actual trouble. At any rate, sixteen women have been appointed, and some of them are to begin their training on Monday. A uniform is being selected for them. It will probably be of blue serge, the jacket being cut in the "Norfolk" fashion.

be and is hereby appointed with plenary powers, to take all steps for resisting the Cardroom Amalagamation demands for a 10 per cent. bonus on 36 counts and below.

(2) That in the event of the Forge Mill Company, Limited, being put on strike, the meeting pledges itself loyally to carry out any recommendation the above-mentioned committee may make to the members of the Federation.

It was also decided to issue a circular to members convening a meeting to be held in the Coal Exchange, Market-place, Manchester, on Friday next, the 14th inst., at which the above two resolutions will be submitted for approval or otherwise.

The General Committee endorsed the view that all claims made on firms, on the grounds that they were spinning coarse counts from 36's downwards should be resisted, and that if any claims made on individual firms on the grounds that they were, on War Office contracts, making more than normal profits, that all such claims should be dealt with on their merits.

It was recognised that the Cardroom Amalgamation might find it difficult, and even impossible, of themselves to prove those two points, but the Federation never intended to leave the question of proof to the Cardroom Amalgamation alone, but will jointly assist in any investigation in order to ascertain what were the actual facts of the particular case where a claim on this ground had been made.

was reported that two cases had been dealt with—Messrs. Stott Ltd. and the Forge Mill Company Ltd. In the case of the former, investigation showed that the firm came within the terms of the Emergency Committee's resolution dealing with War Office contracts and profits, and the 10 per cent bonus will be paid. In the case of the Forge Mill Company, the conditions were different and did not warrant the payment of any bonus. The bonus at this firm was, therefore, declined, and the operatives on Wednesday tendered notices to cease work, and these terminate on Wednesday next.

In view of this fact the committee considered what steps should be taken for dealing with the situation that would arise if the Forge Mill Company be put on strike, and the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:

1. That a special sub-committee, consisting of Messrs. Tattersall, P. Ashworth, W. Hamer, J. M. Thomas, R. Worswick, W. McConnel, H. Clift, and L. Holroyd, be and is hereby appointed with plenary powers to take all steps for resisting the Cardroom Amalgamation demands for a 10 per cent bonus on 36 counts and below.
2. That in the event of the Forge Mill Company Limited being put on strike, the meeting pledges itself loyally to carry out any recommendation the above-mentioned committee may make to the members of the Federation.

It was decided to issue a circular to members convening a meeting to be held in the Coal Exchange, Market-place, Manchester, on Friday next, the 14th inst., at which the above two resolutions will be submitted for approval or otherwise.

The General Committee endorsed the view that all claims made on firms on the grounds that they were spinning coarse counts from 36's downwards should be unitedly resisted, but if any claims were made on individual firms on the grounds that they were on War Office contracts, making more than normal profits, that all such claims should be dealt with on their merits.

It was recognised that the Cardroom Amalgamation might find it difficult, and even impossible, of themselves to prove those two points, but the Federation never intended to leave the question of proof to the Cardroom Amalgamation alone, but will jointly assist in any investigation in order to ascertain what were the actual facts of the particular case where a claim on this ground had been made.

NO WAR BONUS.

EMPLOYERS' REPLY TO THE WASTE SPINNERS.

A joint meeting was held in Manchester yesterday between representatives of the Cotton Waste Spinners' and Manufacturers' Association and the Amalgamated Association of Card and Blowing Room Operatives to discuss an application for a bonus of 10 per cent on the wages of card and blowing room operatives for the period of the war.

At the close a representative of the "Courier" was informed that the employers had made the following reply to the application: "While the employers have every sympathy with the workpeople in the hardships which they have had and are still having to face in consequence of the increased cost of living, they desire to point out that many of the firms engaged in the hard-waste trade continue running their mills with the object of keeping their workpeople engaged, and have taken orders at unprofitable prices in order to provide such employment. Employers themselves have suffered very severely from the extra cost of working their mills, and at the present time financial sacrifices are being made by the employers in order to keep the mills running. The employers, therefore, regret that it is impossible for them to accede to the application for a war bonus to the card and blowing room operatives."

the Council, was empowered to decide what war bonus it should pay its employees, and it offered a bonus of 2s. a week on wages less than 28s. The men argued that this form of bonus would have the effect of bringing the wages of newly engaged employees, working overtime, up to, if not beyond the level of wages paid to men of senior service. They threatened to strike if this inequality remained unadjusted, but they were persuaded by the leaders of the Tramway and Vehicle Workers' Union to suggest to the Tramways Committee that the matter should be referred to arbitration. The Tramways Committee held that this course was not justified since the Salford men represented only one-quarter of those employed on tramway work in the area of Manchester and Salford. They felt that any arbitration entered upon should apply to the whole area of Manchester and Salford. Thereupon a ballot of the men was taken to decide whether or not they should withdraw their labour. The result of the ballot was yesterday submitted to the monthly meeting of the Executive Committee of the Tramway and Vehicle Workers' Union, and it was stated that it resulted in a large majority being in favour of a strike. The action of the Tramways Committee in submitting the case to arbitration may, however, be taken as nullifying the importance of this somewhat serious attitude of the men.

Women as Tram Guards.

While this dispute has been developing the men have shown resentment against the action of the TramwaysCommittee in employing women as conductors on the tramcars. This resentment is probably no more than a strong prejudice against the innovation, and there is every likelihood that, if the bonus is satisfactorily settled, the men will accept women as co-workers without making actual trouble. At any rate, sixteen women have been appointed, and some of them are to begin their training on Monday. A uniform is being selected for them. It will probably be of blue serge, the jacket being cut in the "Norfolk" fashion.

The Textile Mercury
12/6/15

662a

662a/11

£73,713 per week being awarded to 446,257 workpeople. The engineering and shipbuilding industries accounted for £48,297 of this, those of transport for £4,982, and the textile industries for £4,876. During the three months ending March 31st changes in wages affected 792,003 workers, who received in the aggregate a net weekly increase of £108,809. These figures are high compared with the changes effected during the first three months of 1914, when 129,854 workpeople were concerned, and the net aggregate increase of wages amounted to £1,910 per week.

The advances were continued in April, in which month 192,655 workers benefited to the extent of £12,894 per week. In the first four months of the present year nearly a million working men and women (982,740 to be exact) received increases amounting in the aggregate to £133,537 per week—the equivalent of nearly £7,000,000 a year; and no doubt the record for May will shew further increases. During the first four months of 1914, changes in wages affected 342,046 workers, who suffered a net aggregate decrease in wages amounting to £6,126 per week. This year, despite the enormous cost of the war, wages will shew a net increase quite outdistancing that of any ordinary year; and it may be affirmed with confidence that this has been obtained mainly as the result of Government contracts, and has come out of the cash-boxes of the Treasury at a time when economy and personal sacrifice were called for in the interests of the country.

In view of the present dispute in the Lancashire cotton industry, it may be interesting to trace the increases and war bonuses that have been granted in the textile trades. According to the latest Board of Trade returns, 5,138 card and blowing room workers, frame tenters, and spinners (ring spinners, no doubt) in Oldham and district, obtained a ten per cent. war bonus from certain firms in Oldham and district, on the 21st and 28th of April. Changes of wages in other textile trades have been as follow:—

March 5: 1,400 warehousemen in Bradford district, 2s. per week increase; 1,650 linen and jute preparers, spinners, winders, weavers, etc., in Arbroath, increase of 5 per cent.

March 13: 250 willeyers and fettlers in Leeds district, increase of ½d. per hour; 10,000 bleachers in Lancashire, Cheshire, and Scotland, war bonus of 1s. per week to women and girls, and youths under 21 years of age, 3s. to men earning less than 20s., and 2s. to men earning 20s. and less than 40s. per week.

March 19: 36,000 linen and jute preparers, spinners, reelers, winders, and weavers in Dundee district, war bonus of 2s. per week.

April, 1st Pay Day: 50,000 woollen and worsted operatives in Huddersfield, Morley, the Heavy Woollen District, and the mungo and shoddy district, war bonus of 6d. per week to persons earning 10s. and under; 1s. to those earning over 10s. and up to 20s.; 2s. 6d. to those over 20s. and up to 30s.; 2s. to those over 30s. and up to 40s.; all women workers earning over 10s. to receive 1s.

April: 5,000 woollen and worsted operatives in Yeadon district, war bonus of 1s. per week to women and youths; 2s. to men earning up to 23s. per week; and 2s. to those earning over 23s. and up to 40s. per week.

April 5: 3,000 fustian workers in Lancashire, war bonus of one penny on each 1s. earned.

April 7: 3,750 slipper makers in Rossendale, war bonus of 2s. 6d. per week to male operatives of 18 and over earning less than 25s.; 2s. to those earning 25s. and over; 1s. 6d. to females of 18 years of age and over; and 1s. to youths and girls of 16 and under 18 years of age.

April 15: 500 linen and jute workers in Blairgowrie, war bonus of 1s. per week.

It will be seen from the foregoing details that each trade has had to adapt its war bonus to its own peculiar conditions. The net increases in the textile industries for the first four months of the present year amounted to £12,925 per week, most of which consisted of temporary "war bonuses."

The Yorkshire Observer
14/5/15

A WAR BONUS FOR HUDDERSFIELD CLOTHING OPERATIVES.

At a meeting of the Amalgamated Union of Clothiers' Operatives at Huddersfield last night the offer of a war bonus made by the Huddersfield Wholesale Clothiers' Association was accepted. The employers offered a war bonus of 2s. extra per week (or ½d. per hour) to men earning 30s. and under 50s. per week, time less than forty-eight hours to be deducted at the rate of ½d. per hour, and time worked more than forty-nine and a-half hours to be paid for at the rate of time and a-quarter; married men under 24 years of age to receive the 2s. bonus on the same conditions, and unmarried men under 24 to receive a bonus of 1s. per week, with a reduction of ¼d. per hour for broken time and overtime rates; youths under 18 to receive 6d. per week bonus, with pro rata reduction for broken time and overtime rates. There was no offer for women workers. The present arrangement is to remain in force until the end of the war, or until some other decision is arrived at between representatives of the employers and employed. The operatives had asked for advances ranging from ¾d. to 1¼d. per hour, overtime at time and a-quarter, tea money unless notice of overtime working was given, and 10 per cent advance for women.

Manchester Courier,
May 20th. 1915.

COTTON TRADE CRISIS

CARDROOM PRESS CLAIM FOR WAR BONUS

DANGEROUS SITUATION.

That this representative meeting, having heard the report of the Executive Council, desires to express its appreciation of the work done by them in their efforts made to obtain an advance of 10 per cent of wages as a war bonus for members working on 36 counts and below, and instructs them to press the claim made, and we promise our heartiest support whatever be the result.

In these terms the Cardroom Amalgamation can be said to have thrown down the gauntlet to the Federation of Master Cotton Spinners on the war bonus question. The crisis in the Lancashire cotton trade thereby reaches an extremely acute and certainly grave stage. The unanimity with which the foregoing resolution was approved at a fully representative meeting of the Amalgamation held in the conference room of the British Cotton Growing Association offices last night causes a deadlock that can only apparently be got over by two methods; either one or the other of the contending parties must climb down, or, alternatively, there must be Government intervention. The latter contingency is decidedly the more probable, as it is unlikely that the Government will permit such a catastrophe as a strike or a lock-out in the cotton industry at a critical time like the present.

The Federation of Master Cotton Spinners have met several times, and have made offers for a settlement of the difficulties, none of which have been entertained by the Executive Council of the Amalgamation of Cardroom Workers. Not only so, but recently a mass meeting of cotton employers was held in the Coal Exchange, and they unanimously instructed the Emergency Committee of the Federation to resist the claims for a 10 per cent bonus on firms working 36 counts on Government contracts, and they pledged themselves to act loyally to the Federation in whatever action they may take.

In face of this attitude the foregoing resolution points to a definite rupture, for which a solution seems difficult. A fortnight ago notices were handed in at the Forge Mill, Oldham, but twice, in view of possible settlements, they have been post-dated, the last time yesterday, for one week. This means that they will expire on Wednesday next week. Exactly what course will be taken on this matter will probably be decided to-day, when the Advisory Committee of the Cardroom Amalgamation are to meet.

THE THREAT OF A LOCK-OUT.

If the Advisory Committee allow the notices to take effect and put the Forge Mill on strike, as now seems probable, then the next move will no doubt come from the Master Spinners' Federation, who have not cloaked their intention of meeting a strike at any one mill in the Federation with a general lock-out, with its consequent stoppage of the industry.

The cardroom workers have so far only based their claim for a bonus on the grounds that the firms were earning above normal profits as a result of war contracts. This principle the masters do not apparently dispute, but they do dispute that all such firms as are working 36 counts or under are earning abnormal profits. They showed at a recent conference between the two parties that they were agreeable to consider individual claims on firms in the Federation, and to give [illegible]

Leicester Mail,
May 21st. 1915.

HOSIERY WORKERS' NEW DEMANDS.

Ultimatum by the Union.

WAGES TO BE INCREASED OR WEEK'S NOTICE GIVEN.

Trouble looms ahead in the Leicester hosiery trade.

The Hosiery Union recently asked the Manufacturers' Association to grant a 15 per cent. war bonus, but the Association could not see its way to countenance this request, and the Union was obliged to negotiate with individual firms. A number of the latter suggested a war bonus of from 5 per cent. to 10 per cent.

The whole position was laid before a meeting of the Hosiery Union members held last night at the Corn Exchange. Considerable discussion ensued, and it was ultimately decided to withdraw the demand for a 15 per cent. war bonus. Instead, a resolution was unanimously passed calling upon the employers to give a penny in the shilling increase on all male operatives' wages up to £2 8s. per week, female operatives' wages up to 30s. per week, and also on helpers' wages, with a minimum increase of one shilling per week for all workers.

The Union also decided to request the first payment of the increase on May 28th or 29th, and should the increase not be granted a week's notice will be given either to-day or to-morrow.

We understand that the Manufacturers' Association is to meet this afternoon to consider the position.

Manchester Courier
May 24th. 1915.

WAR BONUS PROBLEM

MR. CRINION AND THE WORKERS' CLAIM.

THE OPERATIVES' ATTITUDE DEFENDED.

The new headquarters in Dickinson-street, Manchester, to house the staff employed under the Insurance Act in connection with the Amalgamated Association of Card, Blowing and Ring Room Operatives, were formally opened on Saturday by Mr. James Crinion.

Mr. W. H. Carr, who presided, referred to the progress of the insurance section of the association and appealed to the sick visitors to carry out their duties as fairly as possible. They were not only appointed for the purpose of "knocking off" members. It was their duty to present a fair report to the Board as to whether, in their opinion, a member was malingering or not.

Mr. Crinion, who was presented with a gold key by Mr. S. Lenegan, the contractor, alluded to the increase in the membership of the approved society. At the present time they had 31,000 members, of which 26,000 were females, and it was agreed that the difficulties in an approved society composed chiefly of women were far greater than in a society consisting of males. It was a huge undertaking to accept all members. They had paid to the men in sickness benefit £6,810, maternity benefit £1,836, women's sick benefit £28,400, maternity £3,326, making a total of £31,726, or over £40,000 in two years and four months, or about £17,000 per annum. Seventy members were receiving a disabled benefit of 5s. per week.

Mr. W. Schofield complained of the attitude adopted by the doctors in regard to certificates, many of which they could not read, and it would be of great assistance to the approved societies if they would carry out their work in a more satisfactory manner.

MR. CRINION'S HOPE.

After the opening ceremony the delegates adjourned to the Star Hotel, where dinner was served. Mr. W. Schofield, who presided, declared that the insurance section was making great progress, and he hoped the officials would still continue to do their duty in regard to the question of membership. They did not want to deprive other trade union societies of members, but it was the desire of the association that all employees in the cardroom should become identified with their own approved society. He hoped that ere long they would receive an advance in wages in order that they could live more comfortably in view of the increased cost of living.

In reference to the war bonus question Mr. Crinion declared that in the trade union movement they had to be prepared to receive hard knocks. At the present time there was in the air a threatened lock-out of cotton operatives. He hoped, however, that such a state of affairs would not occur, and that there would not be a dislocation of the cotton industry. At the same time he was not one who believed that they should not take part in what was a general demand for an increase in wages to enable them to cope with the increase in the price of commodities.

He knew of few trades where employees had not received advances varying from 5 to 20 per cent, and why the cotton trade should not be included was beyond his compresension. In his opinion employers were never willing to yield when it was a case of money—(hear, hear)—and it was only by the strength and power of the purse that the workers possessed that they could ever hope to get any help from the employing class.

In regard to the recent application for an advance in wages, the employers had stated that an agreement was signed which was to remain in operation for five years. That agreement, he declared, expired in August, but when it was signed they never anticipated that they would be faced with a war like the present. They had never on a single occasion attempted to depart from the agreement, and he would never encourage anyone to do such a thing. And they had not departed from it to-day.

NOT A NEW QUESTION.

The question of a bonus was not a new one. The employers also told them that they were prepared to consider the application if it could be shown that they were making over or above normal profits. This was a difficult matter to prove, and would involve the examination of books and accounts. Professional accountants would have to be appointed, and it was not altogether possible for this class of men to know the whole of the dealings of an employer. They did not know whether correct results would be declared, because if a higher profit was shown the shareholders would demand a higher percentage. As workers, they held the view that the question of profit should not be too seriously considered, but if employers were holding their own in the trade they were not bearing their proportionate share of the burden as compared with the operative.

Owing to the increased cost of living the members were 25 per cent worse off than before the war, and if they received the 10 per cent bonus they would still have to bear a burden of 15 per cent. In view of this they were entitled to some consideration. They considered that their demand was a reasonable one, and their attitude was justified. He would deplore any rupture at a time like the present, because they did not want to handicap or hinder in any way the Government or those who were fighting at the front, but seeing that the scavengers, the coal miners, and the allied trades had been given a bonus, they could not for a moment understand why they should be asked to stand down. He hoped that some satisfactory decision would be arrived at, because they felt they had a just cause, and when the public knew the facts they could not quarrel with them. (Applause.)

662a.

662a/12

In these terms the Cardroom Amalgamation can be said to have thrown down the gauntlet to the Federation of Master Cotton Spinners on the war bonus question. The crisis in the Lancashire cotton trade thereby reaches an extremely acute and certainly grave stage. The unanimity with which the foregoing resolution was approved at a fully representative meeting of the Amalgamation held in the conference room of the British Cotton Growing Association offices last night causes a deadlock that can only apparently be got over by two methods; either one or the other of the contending parties must climb down, or, alternatively, there must be Government intervention. The latter contingency is decidedly the more probable, as it is unlikely that the Government will permit such a catastrophe as a strike or a lock-out in the cotton industry at a critical time like the present.

The Federation of Master Cotton Spinners have met several times, and have made offers for a settlement of the difficulties, none of which have been entertained by the Executive Council of the Amalgamation of Cardroom Workers. Not only so, but recently a mass meeting of cotton employers was held in the Coal Exchange, and they unanimously instructed the Emergency Committee of the Federation to resist the claims for a 10 per cent bonus on firms working 36 counts on Government contracts, and they pledged themselves to act loyally to the Federation in whatever action they may take.

In face of this attitude the foregoing resolution points to a definite rupture, for which a solution seems difficult. A fortnight ago notices were handed in at the Forge Mill, Oldham, but twice, in view of possible settlements, they have been post-dated, the last time yesterday, for one week. This means that they will expire on Wednesday next week. Exactly what course will be taken on this matter will probably be decided to-day, when the Advisory Committee of the Cardroom Amalgamation are to meet.

THE THREAT OF A LOCK-OUT.

If the Advisory Committee allow the notices to take effect and put the Forge Mill on strike, as now seems probable, then the next move will no doubt come from the Master Spinners' Federation, who have not cloaked their intention of meeting a strike at any one mill in the Federation with a general lock-out, with its consequent stoppage of the industry.

The cardroom workers have so far only based their claim for a bonus on the grounds that the firms were earning above normal profits as a result of war contracts. This principle the masters do not apparently dispute, but they do dispute that all such firms as are working 36 counts or under are earning abnormal profits. They showed at a recent conference between the two parties that they were agreeable to consider individual claims on firms in the Federation, and to give every assistance in the appointment of fully qualified accountants—one to represent the Federation and the other the Amalgamation—so that the books of firms on which claims are made can be thoroughly examined and the profits earned arrived at. They then offer to meet the Cardroom Amalgamation to decide whether those profits justify the payment of a war bonus.

This offer the workers declined to consider, and the Federation left the matter at that.

The whole position is one, therefore, to give anxiety. The Cardroom Workers' Union have been successful in getting a war bonus from firms not in the Federation, and, indeed, with the sanction of the Federation, obtained a 10 per cent bonus from Messrs. J. Stott and Co., Oldham, whom, the Federation agreed, were earning such profits as to justify its payment. It was because they declined the payment of the increase on May 28th or 29th, and should the increase not be granted a week's notice will be given either to-day or to-morrow.

We understand that the Manufacturers' Association is to meet this afternoon to consider the position.

Manchester Courier
May 24 th. 1915.

WAR BONUS PROBLEM

MR. CRINION AND THE WORKERS' CLAIM.

THE OPERATIVES' ATTITUDE DEFENDED.

The new headquarters in Dickinson-street, Manchester, to house the staff employed under the Insurance Act in connection with the Amalgamated Association of Card, Blowing and Ring Room Operatives, were formally opened on Saturday by Mr. James Crinion.

Mr. W. H. Carr, who presided, referred to the progress of the insurance section of the association and appealed to the sick visitors to carry out their duties as fairly as possible. They were not only appointed for the purpose of "knocking off" members. It was their duty to present a fair report to the Board as to whether, in their opinion, a member was malingering or not.

Mr. Crinion, who was presented with a gold key by Mr. S. Lenegan, the contractor, alluded to the increase in the membership of the approved society. At the present time they had 31,000 members, of which 26,000 were females, and it was agreed that the difficulties in an approved society composed chiefly of women were far greater than in a society consisting of males. It was a huge undertaking to accept all members. They had paid to the men in sickness benefit £6,810, maternity benefit £1,836, women's sick benefit £28,400, maternity £3,326, making a total of £31,725, or over £40,000 in two years and four months, or about £17,000 per knocks. At the present time there was in the air a threatened lock-out of cotton operatives. He hoped, however, that such a state of affairs would not occur, and that there would not be a dislocation of the cotton industry. At the same time he was not one who believed that they should not take part in what was a general demand for an increase in wages to enable them to cope with the increase in the price of commodities.

He know of few trades where employees had not received advances varying from 5 to 20 per cent., and why the cotton trade should not be included was beyond his comprehension. In his opinion employers were never willing to yield when it was a case of money—(hear, hear)—and it was only by the strength and power of the purse that the workers possessed that they could ever hope to get any help from the employing class.

In regard to the recent application for an advance in wages, the employers had stated that an agreement was signed which was to remain in operation for five years. That agreement, he declared, expired in August, but when it was signed they never anticipated that they would be faced with a war like the present. They had never on a single occasion attempted to depart from the agreement, and he would never encourage anyone to do such a thing. And they had not departed from it to-day.

NOT A NEW QUESTION.

The question of a bonus was not a new one. The employers also told them that they were prepared to consider the application if it could be shown that they were making over or above normal profits. This was a difficult matter to prove, and would involve the examination of books and accounts. Professional accountants would have to be appointed, and it was not altogether possible for this class of men to know the whole of the dealings of an employer. They did not know whether correct results would be declared, because if a higher profit was shown the shareholders would demand a higher percentage. As workers, they held the view that the question of profit should not be too seriously considered, but if employers were holding their own in the trade they were not bearing their proportionate share of the burden as compared with the operative.

Owing to the increased cost of living the members were 25 per cent worse off than before the war, and if they received the 10 per cent bonus they would still have to bear a burden of 15 per cent. In view of this they were entitled to some consideration. They considered that their demand was a reasonable one, and their attitude was justified. He would deplore any rupture at a time like the present, because they did not want to handicap or hinder in any way the Government or those who were fighting at the front, but seeing that the scavengers, the coal miners, and the allied trades had been given a bonus, they could not for a moment understand why they should be asked to stand down. He hoped that some satisfactory decision would be arrived at, because they felt they had a just cause, and when the public knew the facts they could not quarrel with them. (Applause.)

The Manchester Eve. Chronicle,
May 27th. 1915.

COTTON LOCKOUT

Spinners Demand an Advance.

REPLY TO MASTERS.

Breach of Five Years' Agreement?

THE LEGAL POSITION.

Something in the nature of a sensation was caused in cotton circles to-day when it became known that the spinners had practically joined hands with the Cardroom Amalgamation on the question of the payment of a war bonus.

The threatened lock-out placed the operative spinners in a peculiar position, in view of the five years' agreement, and a claim has been made for a general advance of 10 per cent. on the present wages.

The demand, we understand, has been sent to the employers' offices which, however, are closed this afternoon, and no action on the matter can be taken at present.

The members of the Employers' Federation have each received a circular giving an instruction to declare a lock-out. This circular instructs the members to put up notices in their mills on the making up day in the week commencing Monday June 7, and states that:

On the termination of such notices the mills will be closed until the operatives at the Forge Mill, Oldham, who went out on strike yesterday, and the operatives of any other mill who in the meantime may have been put on strike, have returned to work.

The men on strike at the Forge Mill are the cardroom workers, and their discontent is the firm's refusal to pay a 10 per cent war bonus on 36's counts and below.

The Forge Mill closed down yesterday at noon, when the strike notices expired. About 200 people are employed at the mill. Should the threatened lock-out occur 48,000,000 spindles and 140,000 workpeople will be affected.

It will be remembered that the employers, some days ago, took the view that a strike at any individual mill would be a breach of the existing understanding, and would be met by a general lock-out.

SPINNERS TO TAKE ACTION.

Mr. J. Mullin, J.P., the general secretary of the Cardroom Workers, stated at noon to-day that there was no new development and no change in the position.

The Spinners' Amalgamation take the view that a general lock-out would be a breach of the five years' agreement now in existence, and declare that it would be met by a demand for a 10 per cent. advance in wages to cover the cost of living at the present time.

Without entering into the merits of the policy of either side the general view of businessmen seems to be that a great cotton strike or lock-out at the present time would be nothing short of a disaster, and a disgrace to all parties, no matter who might be concerned with it.

There is, indeed, a general feeling that the Government should deal promptly and in drastic manner with any such possibility as is threatened.

SPINNERS' POSITION.

The Legality of a Lock-Out May be Raised.

Manchester Guardian,
May 28th. 1915.

The Cotton Trade Dispute.

WE are heading for a general stoppage in the Lancashire cotton industry, but it cannot come about for two or three weeks, during which period we may decide to settle our own affairs instead of asking the Board of Trade to do it for us. If the Cardroom Amalgamation persists in its policy of encouraging its members to strike at particular mills—and its president has announced that it will persist,—the Masters' Federation will lock out the cardroom operatives at all the mills it controls. A necessary consequence would be that the spinning operatives would have to stop work too, and when the spindles stop the looms cannot go on very long; they would not all stop at once, but gradually, as the stocks of yarn became exhausted. This is looking some distance ahead, and most people believe that we shall never get so far; yet it is an anxious question how far we are to go. Both sides appear to be determined, but perhaps there would be less appearance of determination were it not for this general belief that the Government would bring strong pressure to prevent any general stoppage. And granting that one side is right and the other wrong, it is to be feared that if, through any lack of conciliatory effort or even of possible concession, the stoppage came, both sides would be involved in something like general execration. One probable result of a lock-out or strike in Lancashire would be large additions to the recruits, and so some little good might come out of the evil; but the Lancashire industry now has a double function, for besides its constant and necessary contribution to the requirements of the nation it is engaged to a considerable extent on supplies for the army. We simply cannot afford to let it suffer the mighty dislocation of a long stoppage.

The operatives' case is a fairly simple one. They want a war bonus such as those in other trades have been getting, and as they know that some sections of the cotton trade are doing badly they confine their demands to that engaged on the coarse counts, which are used largely in the cloths bought by the various Governments. Mr. CRINION, the president of the Cardroom, is sometimes regarded as the villain of the piece, but we may have some sympathy with his position. "Those who "employ the trade union leaders and pay "them their wages," he said the other day, "expect full value for what they pay"; it is one of the chief duties of the union leaders to press for advances of wages whenever there is a chance, and if they neglected to do this they would soon have to give way to others. Mr. CRINION, we are sure, is doing what he conceives to be his duty, but one of the remarkable points about the dispute is the complete separation in policy between the two sections of the operatives. It is reasonable to suppose that the spinners would be just as glad to have a bonus as the cardroom workers, but they have not made any application for it. The "Cotton Factory Times," which is commonly regarded as their organ, said a week or two ago that "in view of the "nearness of the expiration of the five years' "truce re general advances and reductions of "wages, which takes place in August next, "the spinners have evidently not thought it "worth while to make any move at present." It was objected, too, that a claim for advanced wages in cases of abnormal profits would prejudice the claim for a general advance when the agreement terminated. To this Mr. CRINION has replied that a general advance in war-time is impossible; he wants to do the best for those he represents, and the only chance of doing anything, he be-

662a/13 662a

Manchester Guardian,
May 28th 1915.

THE COTTON TROUBLE.

DRIFTING TOWARDS A LOCK-OUT.

NEED FOR INTERVENTION.

It is not likely that any further move will be made in the cotton dispute until next week. The lock-out notices are not to be posted until eleven days hence, and in the meantime there will be opportunity for a renewal of negotiations or for intervention by the Government. It is inconceivable that matters can be allowed to drift to the point of a general stoppage of work, and judging by the temper of both employers and men at the moment the sooner the Government department takes the question in hand the better.

The Cardroom Amalgamation knew what the reply of the employers would be when they allowed the Forge Mill notices to take effect and presumably their policy in insisting on the 10 per cent war bonus in mills spinning 36's counts and below is fixed. The decision of the Employers' Special Committee to issue instructions to members of their Federation to post lock-out notices has now brought the Operative Spinners' Amalgamation definitely into the field (as was pointed out in these columns yesterday) with demands which increase the gravity of the position. Their five years' agreement with the Master Cotton Spinners' Federation does not expire until July 15, and no request for increased wages was contemplated before that date. When the lock-out threat was made the Executive of the Spinners' Amalgamation revised their policy and informed the employers that in their view a lock-out arising out of the dispute with the cardroom operatives would be a breach of the agreement.

Mr. W. Marsland, the general secretary of the Operative Spinners' Amalgamation, was in London yesterday, and in an interview he stated that the operative spinners were now being instructed to make an application immediately for a general advance of 10 per cent in wages. "We feel that we are no longer bound by the agreement," he said. Mr. Marsland strongly criticised the action of the employers. "Our Association," he said, "resent strongly the attitude taken up by the employers in recent years of declaring a general lock-out on every kind of pretext. Such methods make agreements between men and masters of no avail—in fact, the employers would make them mere 'scraps of paper.'"

There was no activity on the employers' side yesterday, and several of the leading members of the Federation were away on holiday. It was said on behalf of the employers generally that an all-round wages advance of 10 per cent could not possibly be paid, having regard to increases in the price of coal and cost of production.

Mr. W. Mullin, the general secretary of the Cardroom Amalgamation, stated yesterday that no further development had taken place so far as the cardroom operatives are concerned. He said that he was not surprised at the action taken by the operative spinners. "The employers are all too ready when we make a move," he added, "to reply, 'Very well, a general lock-out.'"

In the Oldham district holidays began last night, and the operatives did not appear to be much perturbed at the prospect of a lock-out.

The general opinion is that Government intervention must come. At present there is no prospect of agreement between the parties; in fact, the demand of the spinners almost precludes the possibility of a settlement by mutual consent. The action of the Government in connection with the recent coal-mining dispute is at once a precedent and a good augury for ending the cotton dispute without a general stoppage of work.

NOTICES SERVED AT A HEYWOOD MILL.

A week's notice to cease work has been served by the cardroom operatives employed at the Heywood Spinning Company's mill, Heywood, in connection with the agitation for a war bonus of 10 per cent. The application for a bonus question of a special tax on profits made during the war. Profits, no matter whether made or caused by the war, should have a good big proportion taken by the State towards the cost. Anyone doing well at a time like this can afford to pay. Let each year stand alone for the special tax, and make it a penal offence to falsify returns or bookkeeping. We should hear less of the labour unrest if labour knew that an extra 5s. in the pound on profits, on the top of the 2s. 6d. income tax, was going back to the State. We are no doubt fighting for the good of posterity, but our descendants can with justice say we got into the trouble and we had no right to leave too much of the burden to be carried by them.

Cloth made from counts of yarn round about 36's is not only not good and profitable to sell at the present moment, but is really bad.—Yours, &c.,

F. ARROWSMITH.

Astley, May 27.

the Government should deal promptly ... in drastic manner with any such possibility as is threatened.

SPINNERS' POSITION.

The Legality of a Lock-Out May be Raised.

Our Oldham representative states that no further developments are expected until the Whitsuntide holidays, which begin to-night, are over. There are other mills in the district where the cardroom operatives propose tendering strike notices, but these will not be delivered till the making-up days next week.

Mr. James Crinion, president of the Amalgamation, is at present in London on other trade union business, and is not expected to return until early next week.

The crisis is not likely to affect the spirit of the operatives who go on holiday to-night. Although the outlook is depressing the feeling is strong that the threatened general lock-out will not be allowed to be put into execution.

Such a disastrous step as a wholesale stoppage under present circumstances is inconceivable to the average person, and, if necessary, some outside intervention must be obtained if the employers and operatives are unable to come to an agreement.

The Operative Spinners' Amalgamation, though taking no part in the dispute, have considered their position in view of the threat of the employers to call a general lock-out.

The Amalgamation, adds our representative, strongly resent the drastic action of the employers, and if a general lock-out takes effect there is a suggestion that the legality of the matter shall be questioned. The dispute is on a matter of wages, and there is a wages agreement, signed by both employers and operatives, which is in force till August next.

The spinners have abided by this agreement, have made no application for a war bonus, and they contend that the employers have no right to lock their members out on a wages dispute when it cannot be said that the spinners have in any way violated the wages agreement in force.

ROCHDALE DISPUTE.

Notices Tendered at Two Mills.

Last night the officials of the Rochdale Cardroom Association served a week's notice on two large firms in the town. The notices will expire at noon on Wednesday next.

The notices have been served after a refusal on the part of the concerns to pay the operatives a war bonus of 10 per cent. A fortnight ago two other Rochdale firms were served with similar notices, and at the last moment the concession was granted.

The whole of the four firms concerned are engaged on Government contracts, and it is presumed that the margin of profit is sufficiently wide to allow the bonus to be paid.

The firms on which notices were served yesterday are the Era Mill and Messrs. John Pilling, Ltd. The latter firm employ between 600 and 700 operatives, and on behalf of the firm Alderman W. Pilling states definitely that they will refuse to pay the bonus, and at the end of the week's notice unless the notices are withdrawn in the meantime, they will close the mills.

The Cardroom Association officials propose to take a further step unless the war bonus is paid. At present their members are allowed to work overtime in order to keep other sections of the mill at work.

After the Whitsuntide holidays, at the end of this week, the whole of their members will refuse to work overtime unless the payment of the bonus is made. This is likely to have a serious effect upon the restriction of the output.

"worth while to make any move at present." It was objected, too, that a claim for advanced wages in cases of abnormal profits would prejudice the claim for a general advance when the agreement terminated. To this Mr. Crinion has replied that a general advance in war-time is impossible; he wants to do the best for those he represents, and the only chance of doing anything, he believes, is to press for a war bonus on the coarse counts that are now profitable. The leaders of the Spinners' Amalgamation do not agree with him, and they have had to consider what their policy is to be if they are locked out through no fault of their own. They have told the employers that if they are locked out this must be considered to break the five years agreement, which has still nearly two months to run, and that they will immediately claim a 10 per cent advance for the whole of their members.

The employers' position is a difficult one, and they have not simply advanced the wages agreement as forbidding any advances while it exists. It is natural that they should not take very kindly to the idea of a bonus, but they have recognised the exceptional circumstances of a war that has greatly advanced the cost of living, and they have made a concession. They would not grant the bonus on the ground that profits were good, or even abnormally good, because this would be throwing over the wages agreement. They were willing, however—following, we suppose, the indications given by the Government with regard to claims for higher wages in other trades,—to consider favourably the claims made for bonuses where firms were making more than normal profits as a result of "working on direct War Office contracts." As a matter of fact, the spinners can hardly be said to work on these contracts at all, because the War Office does not buy yarn, but only cloth, and one objection of the operatives to restricting the bonus is the difficulty of determining what yarn is to be used for the Government contracts. But there is something in the contention of the operatives that whether the particular coarse counts of yarn are used for the Government contracts or not their market price is determined by this Government demand, or rather by that from several Governments. We should suppose that the operatives cannot, on any account, sustain their claim for a bonus on counts as high as 36's, which do not come within the usual category of coarse counts at all, but perhaps it would help to a settlement if the employers determined that a logical consequence of the concession they have already made would be to pay the bonus on the counts earning abnormal profits, whether directly from Government contracts or not. If they were able to do this, would it be possible for the Cardroom to remove a most formidable source of danger to the trade by abandoning their policy of striking piecemeal? It is natural that the employers should object most strongly to this, for it aims indirectly at the principle of collective bargaining, which neither party should wish to endanger. The strike against a mill at a time is a most insidious form of attack, and now it would be particularly efficacious, because in the present shortage of labour operatives out of work would be snapped up eagerly by firms which have no use for a self-denying ordinance. It is not surprising that the Federation should contemplate even a general lock-out rather than the disorganisation that would follow upon piecemeal concessions to the attack on single mills. But is there no possible compromise or arrangement that may save us from the humiliation of Government interference at such a time? It is easy for us, outside the stress of the dispute, to suggest that here is the opportunity for magnanimity, and magnanimity is a doubtful virtue on the part of those who are in the position of trustees. Yet we cannot believe that the difficulties are insuperable and the differences irreconcilable; a settlement has to be made, and it is only a question of who is to make it.

is at once a precedent and a good augury for ending the cotton dispute without a general stoppage of work.

NOTICES SERVED AT A HEYWOOD MILL.

A week's notice to cease work has been served by the cardroom operatives employed at the Heywood Spinning Company's mill, Heywood, in connection with the agitation for a war bonus of 10 per cent. The application for a bonus was made some weeks ago, and was refused. About 100 operatives are employed in the cardroom department, and altogether over 200 employees are engaged in the mill.

BURNLEY HOLIDAY EXTENDED.

Several of the Burnley weaving sheds did not resume operations after the Whitsuntide holiday until yesterday morning, and others will remain closed the whole of the week. In normal times the stoppage would have been for Whit-Monday only, but owing to the serious condition of the cotton manufacturing industry fully half the operatives in the town have had an extended holiday, varying from two days to a week. Some of the weaving sheds have been closed for two or three months.

OPERATIVES' POLICY CRITICISED.

To the Editor of the Manchester Guardian.

Sir,—The regrettable position which is arising in the cotton trade must raise widespread interest not only in Lancashire but in the whole country. Our men at the front, as shown by letters from them in the papers and some which I have received, are disgusted at the talk of strikes and actual strikes which are taking place, and so are many more of us. Now that we in the cotton trade are in it, it is necessary carefully to examine and make clear our position. In the first place, at the crowded meeting at the Coal Exchange, we appointed an Executive Committee and unanimously agreed to carry out their instructions. There is no doubt that this will loyally be done; and the reason is that, even if the employees are prepared, as they have done in this case, to start tackling one mill at a time, we are not going to have it. Personally I consider they are extremely foolish to start this policy. It would undermine the whole system of collective bargaining and settling which has been so satisfactory in the cotton trade. It starts a system which the trade union leaders have been exceedingly keen (and rightly) to condemn in employers,—viz., the taking away and whittling down of privileges, comforts, or wages at any one mill.

The demand for a war bonus on 30's and below is either right or wrong. If it is right and worth fighting for, then it should be fought for in the proper clean, straightforward way, not by a notice at any one mill. The whole matter is very plain and easy to see through. The cardroom officials knew, and still know perfectly well, that the employers would not agree to this hole-and-corner work, deliberately forcing them to take on the odium of declaring a lock-out, sincerely believing, as has immediately been suggested by the press, that the Government will step in and arbitrate on the matter, believing, as has so often been done, that if they ask enough they will get some part of their request. It is a policy of opportunism which is little to the credit of the responsible leaders, and one which I do not for a moment think will succeed.

Sympathy and help must be felt and given to the smaller wage-earners in the present high cost of living, but all classes in the present great struggle must be considered, and among the others the shareholders. Many of these people, though not spending all they got in their younger days (thus foregoing certain pleasures and luxuries), have invested their money in cotton mills and retired, relying on the return on their investments to keep them. My own point of view is that the shareholder is entitled to a fair return on his money, and that after that fair return any greater profits both workpeople and shareholders should profit by.

It is about time the Government tackled the Trans Weavers

N. 9.15

Woollen Workers' Demands.

The woollen workers in the Mossley and Saddleworth valley are agitating for a war bonus of 2s. 6d. a week for men and 2s. for women. The application was made some weeks ago, and some firms made offers which were not accepted by the operatives. The Northern Weavers' Association, with which the local association is affiliated, has now given them power to take action with a view to forcing their demands. About 2,000 operatives are affected.

Daily News. 27.5.16.

BIGGER WAR BONUS.

The Amounts Nearly Doubled

Good News for Heavy Woollen District Textile Workers.

The question of increased war bonuses was the subject of a conference at Dewsbury Town Hall on Tuesday between the Heavy Woollen District Manufacturers' Association and the Heavy Woollen District Section of the General Union of Textile Workers.

Sir Mark Oldroyd (President of the former) was chairman, and the Labour representatives included Councillor Ben Turner (secretary of the workers' organisation).

Discussion ensued on the Huddersfield dispute regarding war bonuses (settled by the recent award of Sir Geo. Askwith); and the conference, which lasted nearly two hours, resulted in an agreement. The scale of allowances will be as follows:—

To wages of 10s. a week or under will be added a bonus of 2s. instead of 1s., irrespective of the sex of the worker;

To males who earn over 10s. and not over 20s., a bonus of 3s. instead of 1s. 6d.;

To males with 20s. and not more than 30s., a bonus of 5s. instead of 3s.;

To males with over 30s., a bonus of 4s. 6d. instead of 2s. 6d.

By this agreement the restriction by which men in receipt of more than 40s. were not entitled to war bonus is removed.

The increased allowances are in recognition of the rise in cost of living, and will come into operation on pay-day next week. The agreement is to remain in force until the expiration of three months after the declaration of peace, and at the end of that period it is expressly agreed that the original rates of wages shall be reverted to.

Earnings are to be calculated upon the nominal rates of wages paid per week of 55½ hours, overtime being excluded from the calculation.

The terms differ somewhat from those decided upon for Huddersfield area, the differences being in favour of the latter as regards males with 10s. and 20s., and in favour of the Heavy Woollen District as regards males with more than 20s. a week.

A CHAT WITH WOMEN WORKERS.

The terms of the agreement were explained on Wednesday night to a meeting of women workers in Dewsbury Town Hall, by Councillor Ben Turner. In March, 1915 (he said) the Union of Textile Workers approached the Employers' Association, and asked them, in view of the increased cost of living, to consider the claim of the workers either to an advance in wages or to a war bonus. As a result they secured 1s. for women, and 2s. 6d. for men.

They then reckoned up to whom it applied. Only one in ten of the women workers were members of the Association. Since then many of them, especially the weavers, felt they ought to support the organisation, and when the second bonus was obtained in January, two out of nine were members. Since then many more had enrolled, and at the recent conference the Union could speak for a much greater proportion than before. But if there were two-thirds in the Union instead of two-thirds outside still more satisfactory terms could be got.

The Conference on Tuesday was the final act in the negotiations, for they had previously arrived at terms in Morley, Huddersfield and the Colne Valley. In the latter case the bonus applied only to members of the Union. But considering that it was war-time they could not pursue the narrow policy of working only for members, although he was sure that that policy would be reverted to after the war.

FOODSTUFFS 52 PER CENT. DEARER.

When they met the employers and Sir Geo. Askwith they had to give reasons for an increase of war bonus. They did so, and proved their case conclusively, on the score of the rise in cost of foodstuffs. They showed by the Board of Trade returns that the general rise was not less than 52 per cent. Then they took the prices at local shops and proved that flour had risen 65 per cent., sugar over 100 per cent., cheese 50 per cent., treacle 55 per cent., onions 200 per cent., butter 48 per cent., milk 45 per cent., coal 30 per cent., lentils 55 per cent., tea 32 per cent., and other articles from 20 to 120 per cent.

They also showed that the state of trade continued fairly good. The export trade was well maintained, there was a continued demand for blankets and military and naval cloth, and the home trade was good. That there was middling prosperity in trade at home was shown by the new mill extensions at Savile Town, Dewsbury, Batley Carr and elsewhere in the district. Everywhere there were signs of prosperity from the employers' point of view. They also produced the balance sheets of firms in the locality and throughout Yorkshire, indicating progress in profits.

[illegible] per cent.

blankets and military and naval cloth, and the home trade was good. That there was middling prosperity in trade at home was shown by the new mill extensions at Savile Town, Dewsbury, Batley Carr and elsewhere in the district. Everywhere there were signs of prosperity from the employers' point-of view. They also produced the balance sheets of firms in the locality and throughout Yorkshire, indicating progress in profits.

They asked, therefore, for a 25 per cent. bonus in place of the old one. The offer of Tuesday night meant a bonus for women earning up to 10s. a week of 2s. instead of 1s., and for those earning 10s. a bonus of 3s. instead of 1s. 6d. This meant 3s. for "now't" for non-members, and in fairness they ought to join and defend this 3s.

There were a few firms who were not members of the Employers' Association. One of these, on knowing of these offers, had put up a notice at the mill indicating that they would pay their weavers 2d. in the 1s. as against 1d. paid before, which was about the same average as the terms agreed to by the Association.

WEAVERS' WAGES "SCANDALOUSLY LOW" IN SOME MILLS.

When they secured in 1913 a wages advance for women there was a clause in the agreement applying to weavers to the effect that during the next two years an effort should be made to establish a uniform tariff for weavers. He found that with four first-class firms who could not be classed as either poor or mean there was a difference of 12½ per cent. between the highest and the lowest. It was up to the Association to secure a uniform price, as had been done in the Lancashire weaving towns. It was possible here, but only if the workers showed they wanted it.

He found some weaving shops where the prices were scandalously low. No one ought to go home at the week-end with less than £1, but lots were going with 15s. and some with even less. That was not good enough.

FEMALE WORKERS FROM THE SEASIDE.

In the Huddersfield district there was an arrangement for importing women from the seaside and country places as piecers, condenser minders, and feeders. The bargain as to these inexperienced girls was that they should have not less than 18s. 6d. and bonus, after six weeks working, and not less than 14s. 6d. to start with. If they could afford to pay this to women from Bridlington and other places who had never seen a mule gate, they ought to pay adequate wages to women of the district.

Besides the war bonus there was a war question which affected the women of Yorkshire. There was an agreement in the county for the dilution of labour and the introduction of women into men's jobs. When the soldiers came back they ought to be entitled to resume their work at the places where they were formerly employed, and to be paid the standard rate of wages. The agreement of February 24th, made between the various associations, provided for this, but how did it apply to women?

The agreement was that the women should be paid at the same rate as the men for piece work, if they were members of the association. As to time rates, they had made a bargain which he was told was the best made in all England. Women replacing men were to be paid the same rate for an equivalent amount of work. Thus if it took 13 women to do the work of 10 men, it was provided that the women were to have not less than four-fifths of what the men had.

But there was a danger that non-members might injure the position of members. Some women working at rag-grinding were being paid 45 per cent. less than the men. Under the rules of Munition Works the minimum for women was £1.

That was Empire Day. People differed in their views as to Empire, but his ideal was an Empire made up of happy men, women and children, well fed, well clothed and well housed. Otherwise it was not a successful Empire. It was a patriotic duty to remove causes of discontent. It was now a time for wise spending and wise saving, and he hoped one of the ways of wise spending would be to ensure protection of wages, and to aim at a minimum rate of wages for women—similar to the 25s. a week which had been secured in Lancashire. (Applause.)

After a few questions had been put and answered, the meeting closed

Leister Mail

5. 6. 15.

HOSIERY TRADE WAR BONUS.

Satisfactory Result of the Conference.

TERMS OF AGREEMENT.

The representatives of the Hosiery Manufacturers' Association and the Hosiery Union, resumed their conference at the Town Hall, Leicester, yesterday afternoon. The following agreement was arrived at after three and a half hours' sitting:—

It is hereby mutually agreed that a special bonus be paid to all male operatives of one penny in each shilling on wages earned in any one week up to a maximum of 40s.; no bonus to be paid on wages earned above 40s. in any one week.

To female operatives of one penny in the shilling on wages earned in any one week up to a maximum of 20s., no bonus to be paid on wages above 20s.

To helpers (male or female one penny in each shilling on each helper's weekly wage.

The said bonus to be paid to all operatives as on and from the date of this agreement (June 4th).

This special bonus shall cease to be paid at the end of the present war, but shall be competent for either side to give a month's notice to the other side for a re-consideration of the question, having regard to the conditions prevailing at the termination of the war.

The signatures of Mr. H. Howe, Messrs. W. Raven and Co., Ltd., and Mr. J. H. Quilter (secretary) were attached to the agreement on behalf of the Manufacturers' Association, and those of Mr. J. Capenerhurst, Mr. G. Bailey, and Alderman J. Chaplin on behalf of the Hosiery Union. Alderman T. Smith counter-signed on behalf of the Board of Trade as independent chairman.

An expression of thanks was passed to Alderman Smith at the close of the conference, on the proposition of Mr. Howe, seconded by Mr. Capenerhurst.

Southwalk Recorder 5. 6. 15.

War Bonus for Women Workers.

The hard-worked women at Southwark Infirmary are to have a war bonus of 2s. a week each, providing they work a full week. Whilst one cannot help approving of the action of the Guadians in granting to the scrubbers, washers and laundry women this war bonus, the restriction that only those working a full week shall receive it is laying down a hard and fast rule that may work injuriously to the women, and the Guardians, who have hitherto acted in a humane manner towards their employees, cannot desire that. As a general rule these women are widows with children, and it is this class of people who are feeling the high prices of food more than any other. If a woman is away ill for a day under this regulation of the Board she loses her extra 2s., thus punishing her children for something which their mother cannot help. A modification of the law as laid down by the Guardians would meet the circumstances in such a case as this, but as it stands at present the infirmary steward is bound to withhold the war bonus from the woman who has had a day's illness in the week, which means that she is doubly punished for presuming to be ill.

* * * * *

The Leicester Mercury
5/6/15

further conference between representatives of employers and employed in the local hosiery trade yesterday resulted in an agreement that a special bonus of a penny in the shilling be paid to all male operatives on wages earned in any one week up to a maximum of 40s.; also to female operatives up to 20s. a week, and to helpers male or female. This means that the lowest paid workers, who feel the pressure of high prices most, will get the help they need. It seems to be a fair arrangement, and the agreement was a mutual one. The question did not go to arbitration.

The recent claim of the scourers and kindred workers for a 20 per cent. permanent advance in wages did go to an arbitrator, and Ald. Smith has decided that the demand for a permanent increase has not been established. His decision is that the terms and general conditions of the agreement in relation to increased wages or war bonus mutually arrived at between the Master Dyers' Associations of Leicester and Loughborough, and the Trimmers' Association and other organisations, be applied to the Leicester Auxiliary Workers' Association of Bleachers, etc., as from May 22.

At Hinckley the boot and shoe operatives, in common with their fellows in Leicester, have obtained a war bonus, females and youths up to 21 years of age a shilling a week; male operatives of 21 years of age and over, earning under 35s. a week, 3s. per week; between 35s. and under 45s. a week, 2s. 6d.; and 45s. and upwards 2s. per week. Here again the greater amount is paid to the workers in receipt of the smallest wages, and a distinction is very properly drawn between youths and adults. It would be absurd, of course, to give boys and girls the same increase as men and women with larger responsibilities. It is also justly stipulated that operatives who deliberately abstain from working full time in any week will have to forfeit the bonus for that week.

6 62 a.

The Manchester Guardian 12/6/15

91/28/16

NO COTTON TRADE STOPPAGE.

INTERVENTION OF THE GOVERNMENT.

SCHEME FOR SETTLEMENT.

PROGRESS AT THE JOINT CONFERENCE.

There will be no stoppage in the Lancashire cotton trade on the question of a war bonus. This fact, it is understood, has been made clear by the Board of Trade, which last night announced a scheme for settlement. Apart from the intervention of the Board of Trade the opinion was strongly held on the Manchester Royal Exchange yesterday that a settlement is in sight, and although nothing was divulged as to the nature of the deliberations at the joint conference of master and operative spinners it is believed that satisfactory progress was made towards a solution of the dispute.

The following is the statement issued by the Board of Trade last night:

The Board of Trade have under consideration the position which has arisen in the cotton trade, and the President, Mr. Runciman, has to-day communicated with the Master Cotton Spinners' Federation, the Cotton Spinners and Manufacturers' Association, the Cotton Waste Spinners and Manufacturers' Association, the Amalgamated Association of Card and Blowing Room Operatives, and the Operative Cotton Spinners' Association requesting them to accept the following suggestions for a settlement of the matter, viz.:

That it be referred to the Committee on Production to decide whether any, and, if so, what alteration should be made in the spinners' wages, and in the wages of the classes of operatives covered by the Card and Blowing Room Operatives' Association.

Any alteration made by the award to come into force as from the first settling day following the acceptance of this reference, and to continue for such period as the Committee on Production shall determine.

It is understood that the acceptance of the reference would be accompanied by a resumption of work at the mills where a stoppage has already taken place and the withdrawal of notices on both sides.

THE JOINT CONFERENCE.

It was hoped as a result of the joint conference in Manchester yesterday between the Master Cotton Spinners' Federation and the Operative Spinners' Amalgamation that some definite statement would be made as to the prospects of an early termination of the trouble. The conference was attended by the Emergency Committee of the Federation and the Executive Council of the Association, and was held at the offices of the Federation in Cross-street.

The proceedings lasted about an hour, but at the close a representative of the "Manchester Courier" was informed that there was no communication to be made to the Press. It is understood, however, that a resolution was the executive council of the Association, and was held at the offices of the Federation in Cross-street.

The proceedings lasted about an hour, but at the close a representative of the "Manchester Courier" was informed that there was no communication to be made to the Press. It is understood, however, that a resolution was passed, the nature of which was not divulged, and, as previously stated, that great progress has been made towards a satisfactory solution of the wages problem of the spinners. Representatives on both sides were pledged to secrecy.

A critical stage in the dispute has been reached. In fact general notices have been posted in nearly all the Federated mills to close down, and unless some arrangement is decided upon by Wednesday next thousands of mill operatives will be out of employment. It is, however, possible for a number of Federated firms who spin their own yarn to run for 27½ hours per week even if a lock-out occurs, a rule to this effect having been formulated by the Federation. Manufacturers in this position, especially those engaged on Government work, will no doubt take advanage of this rule, but it has been openly declared by many Lancashire manufacturers that they were running their mills at a loss at the present time.

TRADE MUST NOT STOP.

There is an opinion in some circles that a compromise will be reached, and a "Courier" representative learned yesterday that leaders of the various associations had been called together by the Board of Trade, and that they have been definitely instructed that under no circumstances must the cotton trade be allowed to be stopped. It will not be the first occasion that an eleventh hour settlement has been reached in the cotton trade, and at a time when the Govrnment requires the united support of all industries it is to be hoped a dislocation of the trade will be avoided. It is suggested that a compromise will result in the operatives working on 36's counts and below being offered a bonus of 5 per cent.

Mr. Marsland, secretary of the Operative Spinners' Association, returned from London yesterday, but when asked for his views on the situation he declined to make any statement.

The spinners' ballot is practically complete on the question of ceasing work to press forward the demand for a 10 per cent increase, and the figures are likely to be made known this weekend.

A meeting was held in Manchester yesterday between the representatives of the Weavers' Amalgamation and the Lancashire Manufacturers and Spinners' Association to consider the question of war bonuses at a number of firms reported to be engaged on war contracts, but nothing was made known regarding the deliberations.

Labour News,
June 6th. 1918.

Girls Demand War Bonus.—Government intervention has been decided on in the dispute at Messrs. McCorquodale's printing works, Wolverton (Bucks), where the girls are on strike owing to the refusal of the firm to consider an application for a war bonus. After twice making unsuccessful attempts to open negotiations with the management, Mr. Fred Roberts, of the National Executive of the Typographical Association, and Mr. Albert Evans, organizing secretary of the Printers' Warehousemen and Cutters' Union, who is conducting the strike, wired the Treasury pointing out that the workers were engaged in Government work, and explaining the firm's stubbornness. They received a reply two hours afterwards saying that the matter would be dealt with by Sir George Askwith, who asked for the fullest particulars. Meanwhile the strikers are holding enthusiastic meetings, and the local lecture hall has been lent to them by Councillor George Barker, a prominent Potteries Labour leader. The strikers have been assured of moral support from printers' chapels at London houses, who resolutely refuse to touch work from Wolverton, and the workers at Crewe factory are all joining the Union; and, if need be, they are prepared to strike in support of the Wolverton girls' demands.

The Manchester Guardian 9.6.15 662a/18 662 a.

COTTON TRADE CRISIS.

THE LOCK-OUT: SPINNERS' RETALIATION.

HARD WASTE TRADE INVOLVED.

The general outlook in the cotton trade of Lancashire becomes graver every day, and the need for intervention by the Government could hardly be more urgent. The issues have widened and increased considerably in the last few days. In addition to a war bonus of 10 per cent required by the limited number of cardroom operatives working on 36's counts and below, a general advance of 10 per cent in wages is now demanded by some 70,000 operative spinners in retaliation on the lock-out notices which are being posted up in the mills of the Master Spinners' Federation.

Strikes at four mills in Haslingden and Bury drove the hard-waste spinners and manufacturers to the decision to post up notices yesterday, which in ten days will have thrown 10,000 workpeople out of employment.

The expiration of post-dated strike notices at a Rochdale mill connected with the Cotton Spinners' and Manufacturers' Association may involve some 200,000 weavers, chiefly in North and North-east Lancashire, sooner than they would have been affected by the running out of stocks of yarn naturally consequent on a stoppage of spindles.

In making their demand for increased wages the Operative Spinners' Amalgamation are taking a ballot of all their members as to whether they are in favour of pressing it, if necessary, by ceasing work. The ballot papers are expected to be returned by Friday. In a circular which has been issued to district and provincial officials, Mr. William Marsland, the general secretary, writes:—"Under ordinary circumstances the application would not have been made until after the expiry of our five years' agreement with the employers on July 15, 1915. But at present the employers are threatening a general lock-out in the spinning trade, and the Executive Council take the view that if the employers attempt to put the lock-out into operation they will have broken the spirit of the five years' agreement, and we shall be entitled to make immediate application for an advance. You are, therefore, requested to be prepared to take action in your district or province in the event of circumstances making it necessary. When once the notices have been given, their withdrawal must on no account be agreed to locally, but the matter left entirely in the hands of the Executive Council of the Amalgamation."

In an interview yesterday, Mr. Marsland admitted it was deplorable that this dispute should have arisen during the war, but added: "We should have been sadly wanting in our duty tamely to accept a general closing of 48 million spindles and expend our funds for six weeks before applying for an increase of wages." The Amalgamation had clearly intimated that they would apply for an advance of wages at the end of the five years. Their members had suffered keenly through the increased cost of living, but would have loyally held to the five years' truce if the Federation had not declared a lock-out. Mr. Marsland also expressed his fear that one result of the struggle would be that if agreements could be set aside just when it pleased anyone to do so, they would not be looked upon favourably in future.

The Waste Trade.

The following official statement was issued yesterday by Mr. F. A. Hargreaves, secretary of the Cotton Waste Spinners' and Manufacturers' Association:—"A largely attended meeting of the members of the Cotton Waste Spinners' and Manufacturers' Association was held in Manchester on Tuesday, June 1, to consider the application for a bonus of 10 per cent on the wages of card and blowing room operatives for the period of the war, and to determine what action should be taken in connection with the notices tendered by the card and blowing room operatives at Messrs. William Robinson and Co. (Haslingden), Limited, Union and Victoria Mills, Haslingden, and at Messrs. Samuel Renshaw and Sons, Limited, Britannia and York Street Mills, Bury. The members considered that the action of the Card and Blowing Room Operatives' Association, in tendering notices at the mills of the chairman and vice chairman of the Employers' Association on a question affecting the whole trade, was most unwarranted, and after a long discussion the following resolution was passed:—

"That the application of the Amalgamated Association of Card and Blowing Room Operatives for a war bons of 10 per cent to their members be not acceded to, and if the notices tendered at Messrs. William Robinson and Co. (Haslingden), Limited, Union and Victoria Mills, Haslingden, and at Messrs. Samuel Renshaw and Sons, Limited, Britannia and York Street Mills, Bury, which expire on Saturday next, June 5, are not withdrawn in the meantime, but are allowed to take effect, the whole of the members of this Association be recommended to post up notices on Wednesday, June 9, of their intention to close their mills at the expiration of the period required to terminate their respective contracts of employment with their workpeople; and the members present pledge themselves to adopt this course if called upon to do so."

"At the joint meeting at which the application for a war bonus of 10 per cent was previously considered the employers, after having given careful consideration to the application, stated that, whilst they had every sympathy with the workpeople in the hardships which they have had to face and are still having to face in consequence of the increased cost of living, they desired to point out that many of the firms engaged in the hard waste trade continued running their mills with the object of keeping the workpeople employed, and took orders at unprofitable prices in order to provide such employment. The employers themselves had suffered very severely through the extra cost of working their mills, and at the present time financial sacrifices were being made by employers in order to keep the mills running, and they therefore regretted that it was impossible for them to accede to the application for a war bonus of 10 per cent.

"Since the members' meeting on June 1 efforts have been made to arrange for the further post-dating of the notices, but without success. The notices took effect on Saturday last, and the above four mills are now stopped.

Lock-Out Notices To-day.

"In consequence of this action and in pursuance of the above resolution all the other members of the Cotton Waste Spinners' and Manufacturers' Association will post up notices to-morrow (Wednesday) of their intention to close their mills at the expiration of the period required to terminate their contracts of employment with their workpeople.

"A joint meeting was held in Manchester on Friday last between the Committee of the Cotton Waste Spinners' and Manufacturers' Association and the representatives of the Northern Counties Textile Trades Federation—which Federation embraces weavers, winders, beamers, twisters and drawers, overlookers, and cloth-lookers,—when the employers explained their intended course of action and the reasons which led them to recommend a lock-out at the mills of the members of the Association. After some discussion the following statement was made by the operatives' representatives:—

"'We protest against the proposed action of the employers, which is calculated to punish workers with whom there is no quarrel, and we shall regard a lock-out as a hostile act which will justify us in taking any steps we may determine upon in the interests of our members. We shall further consider all joint arrangements at an end if lock-out notices are tendered.'

"A joint meeting was also held in Manchester yesterday between the Committee of the Cotton Waste Spinners' and Manufacturers' Association and the Amalgamated Association of Operative Cotton Spinners, when the employers explained their intended course of action and the reasons which had led them to recommend a lock-out."

Danger from the Weavers.

Mr. Hargreaves added that as there had been some misunderstanding he wished to point out that the Cotton Waste Spinners' and Manufacturers' Association has no connection with either the Federation of Master Cotton Spinners' Associations or the Cotton Spinners' and Manufacturers' Association, which was formerly known as the North and North-east Lancashire Cotton Spinners' and Manufacturers' Association. The Norwich Street Mills of Messrs. John Pilling, Limited, Rochdale, are connected with the Cotton Spinners' and Manufacturers' Association and not with the Spinners' Federation. At those mills the notices of the cardroom operatives, post-dated a week ago in order to facilitate further negotiations, will expire in the ordinary course to-day if they be not withdrawn. The negotiations have failed, and if the operatives cease work the employers' Association will consider what action they will take in reply. The operatives employed in the weaving sheds of this Association number about 200,000.

At the two Haslingden and two Bury mills the stoppage has involved about 1,000 workpeople. The threatened lock-out by the hard-waste employers will increase that figure to about 10,000.

Reynolds Newspaper.
8.8.15.

LABOUR TOPICS.

THE CONCESSIONS TO L.C.C. TRAM EMPLOYEES.

RESULT OF THE BALLOT.

Woolwich Strike Over: Men Resume Work.

At the request of a number of the tramwaymen in their employ, the London County Council Tramway Department has held a ballot of the men on the concessions offered to them under the award of the Tramway Conciliation Board. The result shows a majority of 980 in favour of accepting the award, and against having Board of Trade arbitrations. The figures were: For the Conciliation Board award, 2,606; against, 1,626.

The award offered the men a war bonus of 3s. a week, or 6d. a day, to men earning 40s. a week or under. The claims of the men for a permanent increase of wages of 1s. a day, overtime at the rate of time and a half, an extra allowance of 2s. 6d. a day to motormen on trailer cars, and a reduction in the number of hours of labour to eight daily; were refused by the Conciliation Board.

— X —

A SECOND STRIKE.

Owing to alleged unfairness on the part of a foreman and the discharge of a section foreman the men employed in building munitions workers' houses near Woolwich struck work. This was the second strike in three months. In May a rise in wages was demanded.

It was stated after negotiations had taken place on Wednesday that Messrs. Leslie were prepared to remove the foreman to another part of the work and to reinstate the section foreman who had been discharged. On these terms the men agreed to resume work.

Woolwich is a difficult place to reach rapidly from London. Therefore the Government undertook a housing scheme, with the result that a little village for war-workers is growing within easy reach of the arsenal.

— X —

STRIKER'S PROTEST IN COURT.

Thirty coppersmiths employed in Fairfield ship yard, Govan, who had struck work over a demarcation dispute with the plumbers, were arraigned before the General Munitions Tribunal for Scotland at Glasgow, and charged with having infringed the provisions of the Munitions of War Act by leaving their employment, and taking part in a strike while engaged on munitions work. Evidence was taken at some length. Mr. Alexander Cleghorn, a director and engineering manager of the Fairfield Company, spoke as to a shortage of labour in the coppersmiths' trade, and also as to correspondence he had had on the question.

Professor Cloag, K.C., who presided over the Tribunal, pointed out that what concerned the Court was whether the men actually struck or not. The Court was adjourned to allow the parties affected to consider the position, and on resumption the general secretary of the Coppersmiths' Society intimated that after consultation with members of other Trade Unions he would undertake strongly to advise the men to return immediately on condition that the Court insisted on the status quo being maintained. It was later intimated that an agreement had been come to which carried with it a recommendation for the resumption of work. As a result the accused were only fined 2s. 6d. each. The Trade Unions paid the men's fines.

While some talk took place regarding the terms of settlement, several strikers interrupted, whereupon the Chairman remarked: "Remember, this country is at war. Does that never occur to you?" One of the strikers rose and said: "I think I am as patriotic as any man in this room. I have seven relatives in the trenches, and one at sea. No man dare tell me I am sacrificing their lives by remaining out. I am standing out for the Trade Union cause—a perfectly legitimate proceeding. The whole fault of this lies with the Fairfield management. I can prove that there is work going out of Fairfield to six or seven different shops, and men are standing idle in the shops."

Loud applause greeted this speech.

— X —

THREATENED STRIKE AT OLDHAM.

A strike, affecting practically all the departments of the Corporation, is threatened in Oldham, as the result of the refusal of the Council to grant a war bonus to their workmen. The original claim was for an advance of 5s. per week on behalf of the members of the Gasworkers' and General Labourers' Union and the Municipal Employees' Association, but the Corporation absolutely refused to concede any advance or to agree to the claim being submitted for arbitration.

At a mass meeting of the men it was unanimously agreed to ask the Town Council to meet representatives of the men with a view to an early settlement of the question or to refer the claim to arbitration, and if the Council again refuse this request the men will tender strike notices on dates to be fixed by the branches.

Mr. J. R. Clynes, M.P., said the Oldham Corporation thought that because there was a war on their workmen should be quiet, and not only quiet but submissive, and indeed servile, to the extent of tolerating conditions which public servants elsewhere had successfully revolted against. The Corporation had sheltered behind the war in order to protect themselves against meeting public duties which had been met in other Lancashire towns, and towns in other parts of the country. This could no longer be tolerated. The Corporation had decided not to reopen the question, and had declined to listen to an appeal to submit the claims for arbitration. If the Corporation were determined to refuse to meet them fairly the Trade Union were equally resolved to back up the men with its fullest resources of money and personal support in forcing forward what they considered was a just claim. There was not another Corporation in that part of the country comparable in size and population to Oldham which had taken up the same position as Oldham had. He said, with a full sense of his responsibility, that the men had been provoked, and in whatever steps they decided to take they would have the full financial and personal support of their Union.

— X —

LABOUR SHORTAGE IN COTTON TRADE.

A Conference between employers and workmen in the cotton trade was held at Manchester to consider the serious situation which has arisen from the shortage of labour in the mills. Little hope was entertained of an increase in the number of women workers, as most of the trained women who care to return to the factories have already responded to the calls which have been addressed to them. The suggestion was made that for the period of the war half-timers should be allowed in the mills at the age of eleven instead of twelve, and full-timers at twelve instead of thirteen.

— X —

HOURS OF WOMEN SHOP HANDS.

In furtherance of their efforts to secure a compulsory closing of shops at an hour not later than eight o'clock on three nights a week, the Board of the Early Closing Association have submitted a statement to Mr. W. Brace, M.P., Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, on the subject of women employees. The document points out that as the result of the Premier's appeal to proprietors of large retail establishments to encourage and assist men still in their employ—no fewer than 350,000 shop assistants having hitherto joined the forces—to enlist, there had been a considerable increase in the number of women employed. Overwork of women in shops is stated to be a serious menace to national health, and attention is drawn to the fact that employment after eight o'clock on three nights of the week is unnecessary, "late shopping being a habit and not a necessity."

The Board have evidence that shop assistants who have joined the forces do not intend returning to their former occupations, and in view of the possible extension of female labour they seek the assistance of the Government to safeguard the health of women in shops and their offspring, and ask for similar protection to that already afforded by the Factory Acts to women employed in workrooms—that is, that the Government should at once prevent women being employed in shops after eight o'clock on three nights, after nine o'clock on Fridays, and after ten o'clock on Saturdays. They believe that no opposition would be offered by members of any party to a measure embodying such reasonable proposals.

Globe
20/11/15

P.O. WAR BONUSES.

Sir,—It is so unlike The Globe to condemn without a hearing that I venture to reply to your remarks on the P.O. war bonus.

The P.O. is not, as a rule, noted for undue generosity compared with other less useful departments which are not revenue earning. Seeing that the Government have practically forced employers to pay a war bonus to thousands of workmen receiving higher wages than many P.O. servants, there seems no reason to grudge it in this case.

The possibility of a small pension if a man lives beyond the age of 60 does not help him to maintain a large family on a small salary when every sovereign is worth only 15s.

Summarised, the war bonus—payable only during the war—is as follows:—3s. increase on wages up to 40s.; 2s. on wages 40s. to 60s. Females half above rates. Small increase to sub-postmasters receiving not more than £169 10s. per annum.

It will not be granted to single men, married men receiving full civil and military pay, or to commissioned officers. It will be withdrawn on enlistment, and will not be considered in calculating Sunday duty, overtime, pensions, or gratuities, and will apply only to those above 18 years of age.—Yours, &c.,

A SYMPATHETIC BOSS.

The Yorkshire Observer.

2.10.15.

WAGES OF WEAVING OVERLOOKERS.

A request was recently made by the weaving overlookers in the Bradford district for a 10 per cent. advance in wages. This application has been considered at a meeting of the Central Board of the Bradford and District Manufacturers' Federations, who passed three resolutions declaring that no advance could be granted other than the 5 per cent. war bonus recommended on March 10, 1915; that all members of the federation who have not already done so are requested to pay their overlookers the 5 per cent. war bonus authorised; and that failing agreement the federation is prepared to submit the matter to the arbitration of the Board of Trade.

Manchester Guardian.
November 4th 1915.

WEAVERS' WAGES.

BONUS OF 5 PER CENT GRANTED.

FINAL SETTLEMENT TO-DAY.

The dispute in the weaving sections of the cotton trade of Lancashire was practically ended yesterday. The employers conceded the much-discussed war bonus of 5 per cent to the operatives connected with the Northern Counties Textile Trades' Federation. It is expected that the dispute will be ended entirely to-day by the Federation of Master Cotton Spinners' Associations making a similar concession to the weavers employed in the sheds of those of their members who have looms as well as spindles.

The bonus will not be payable until the first week in January next, and it will not be given to workers who have already received a war bonus or an increase of wages since the outbreak of the war. It will automatically cease thirteen weeks after peace is signed, and then for twenty-six weeks the existing rates of wages are not to be altered by either side.

The Terms.

After separate meetings earlier in the day representatives of the Cotton Spinners' and Manufacturers' Association and of the various weaving trade unions affiliated with the Northern Counties Textile Trades' Federation met together in the rooms of the Manufacturers' Association in Exchange Street, Manchester, and after less than an hour's consultations, separately and collectively, the following settlement was accepted by all concerned:—

"The employers agree to give a war bonus of 5 per cent on the prices paid for weaving by the Uniform List and the Colne Coloured Goods List, and a similar bonus to those engaged in the weaving of towels, quilts, sheetings, and cotton blankets, and to winders, reelers, and beamers whose wages rise or fall with weavers' wages.

"The employers also agree to give a war bonus of 5 per cent to twisters and drawers, overlookers who are paid standing wages, cloth lookers, warehousemen, and other odd hands employed in the warehouse in the weaving section of the trade.

"Where the wages are paid on the basis of a list the war bonus will be an addition of 5 per cent on such list. Thus, in the case of weavers in the grey trade who are paid by the Uniform List the weaving price (while the bonus is in operation) will be Uniform List plus 10 per cent; and in the case of weavers in the coloured trade who are paid by the Colne Coloured Goods List the weaving price for coloured stripes will be the Colone Coloured Goods List plus 12½ per cent, and the weaving price for coloured checks will be Colne Coloured Goods List plus 7½ per cent while the bonus is in operation.

"It is agreed that the bonus now granted shall not apply to weavers paid by the Bury Fustian List nor to any other employees in any of the above occupations who are already receiving a war bonus or who have received an advance in wages since the commencement of the war.

"It is also agreed that the war bonus shall be paid for the first time on the first pay-day after January 1, 1916, and shall remain in operation until the expiration of thirteen weeks after an official Declaration of Peace has been signed on behalf of his Majesty's Government; that at the end of such period of thirteen weeks the bonus shall automatically cease and wages shall revert to the rates existing before this war bonus was granted; and that when the wages have reverted to the rates existing before the granting of this war bonus there shall be a further period of 26 weeks during which the rates of wages shall not be altered by either side.

"The war bonus is granted on the understanding that the operatives' representatives first week in January next, and it will not be given to workers who have already received a war bonus or an increase of wages since the outbreak of the war. It will automatically cease thirteen weeks after peace is signed, and then for twenty-six weeks the existing rates of wages are not to be altered by either side.

The Terms.

After separate meetings earlier in the day representatives of the Cotton Spinners' and Manufacturers' Association and of the various weaving trade unions affiliated with the Northern Counties Textile Trades' Federation met together in the rooms of the Manufacturers' Association in Exchange Street, Manchester, and after less than an hour's consultations, separately and collectively, the following settlement was accepted by all concerned:—

"The employers agree to give a war bonus of 5 per cent on the prices paid for weaving by the Uniform List and the Colne Coloured Goods List, and a similar bonus to those engaged in the weaving of towels, quilts, sheetings, and cotton blankets, and to winders, reelers, and beamers whose wages rise or fall with weavers' wages.

"The employers also agree to give a war bonus of 5 per cent to twisters and drawers, overlookers who are paid standing wages, cloth lookers, warehousemen, and other odd hands employed in the warehouse in the weaving section of the trade.

"Where the wages are paid on the basis of a list the war bonus will be an addition of 5 per cent on such list. Thus, in the case of weavers in the grey trade who are paid by the Uniform List the weaving price (while the bonus is in operation) will be Uniform List plus 10 per cent; and in the case of weavers in the coloured trade who are paid by the Colne Coloured Goods List the weaving price for coloured stripes will be the Colone Coloured Goods List plus 12½ per cent, and the weaving price for coloured checks will be Colne Coloured Goods List plus 7½ per cent while the bonus is in operation.

"It is agreed that the bonus now granted shall not apply to weavers paid by the Bury Fustian List nor to any other employees in any of the above occupations who are already receiving a war bonus or who have received an advance in wages since the commencement of the war.

"It is also agreed that the war bonus shall be paid for the first time on the first pay-day after January 1, 1916, and shall remain in operation until the expiration of thirteen weeks after an official Declaration of Peace has been signed on behalf of his Majesty's Government; that at the end of such period of thirteen weeks the bonus shall automatically cease and wages shall revert to the rates existing before this war bonus was granted; and that when the wages have reverted to the rates existing before the granting of this war bonus there shall be a further period of 26 weeks during which the rates of wages shall not be altered by either side.

"The war bonus is granted on the understanding that the operatives' representatives will seek to secure a similar bonus from all cotton employers (whether members of an employers' association or not) in all of the districts covered by the Northern Counties Textile Trades' Federation."

The Parties.

This settlement was signed by Mr. John Taylor and Mr. F. A. Hargreaves, joint secretaries of the Cotton Spinners' and Manufacturers' Association; Mr. Thomas Shaw, secretary of the Northern Counties Textile Trades' Federation; Mr. J. W. Ogden, president, and Mr. Joseph Cross, secretary of the Amalgamatel Weavers' Association; Mr. E. Duxbury, secretary of the General Union of Associations of Loom Overlookers; Mr. W. C. Robinson, general secretary of the Amalgamated Association of Beamers, Twisters, Drawers, and Machine Workers; and Mr. E. Strong, secretary of the General Amalgamation of Cloth Lookers' and Warehousemen's Associations.

Birmingham
18.11.15

ER 5. 1915. 662A

FIVE PER CENT WAR BONUS GRANTED.

MANUFACTURING SECTIONS RECEIVE CONCESSION.

PAYMENT POSTPONED.

SUCCESS OF TEXTILE FEDERATION.

The application of the Northern Counties Textile Trades Federation for a war bonus of five per cent has been granted by the Cotton Spinners and Manufacturers' Association and the firms in the Master Spinners' Federation who weave.

The decision was announced at joint meetings on Wednesday and Thursday.

Twisters, drawers, and overlookers who are paid standing wages, clothlookers, warehousemen, and odd hands are also included in the bonus.

The bonus is to be payable on the first pay day in 1916, and is to "automatically cease" thirteen weeks after the declaration of peace has been signed on behalf of the Government, and it is granted on the understanding that the operatives' representatives will endeavour to secure a similar bonus from all employers in the area of the Northern Counties Textile Federation.

THE TERMS.

DETAILS OF THE EMPLOYERS' CONCESSION.

After separate meetings on Wednesday representatives of the Cotton Spinners and Manufacturers' Association and the unions affiliated with the Northern Counties Textile Trades Federation met together in the rooms of the Manufacturers' Association in Exchange-street, Manchester, and after less than an hour's consultations, separately and collectively, the following settlement was accepted by all concerned:—

"The employers agree to give a war bonus of five per cent on the prices paid for weaving by the Uniform List and the Colne Coloured Goods List, and a similar bonus to those engaged in the weaving of towels, quilts, sheetings, and cotton blankets, and to winders, reelers, and beamers whose wages rise or fall with weavers' wages.

"The employers also agree to give a war bonus of five per cent to twisters and drawers, overlookers who are paid standing wages, clothlookers, warehousemen, and other odd hands employed in the warehouse in the weaving section of the trade.

"Where the wages are paid on the basis of a list the war bonus will be an addition of five per cent on such list. Thus, in the case of weavers in the grey trade who are paid by the Uniform List the weaving price (while the bonus is in operation) will be Uniform List plus ten per cent; and in the case of weavers in the coloured trade who are paid by the Colne Coloured Goods List the weaving price for coloured stripes will be the Colne Coloured Goods List plus 12½ per cent, and the weaving price for coloured checks will be Colne Coloured Goods List plus 7½ per cent while the bonus is in operation.

"It is agreed that the bonus now granted shall not apply to weavers paid by the Bury Fustian List nor to any other employes in any of the above occupations who are already receiving a war bonus or who have received an advance in wages since the commencement of the war.

"It is also agreed that the war bonus shall be paid for the first time on the first pay-day after January 1, 1916, and shall remain in operation until the expiration of thirteen weeks after an official Declaration of Peace has been signed on behalf of his Majesty's Government; that at the end of such period of thirteen weeks the bonus shall automatically cease, and wages shall revert to the rates existing before this war bonus was granted, and that when the wages have reverted

The application of the Northern Counties Textile Trades Federation for a war bonus of five per cent has been granted by the Cotton Spinners and Manufacturers' Association and the firms in the Master Spinners' Federation who weave.

The decision was announced at joint meetings on Wednesday and Thursday.

Twisters, drawers, and overlookers who are paid standing wages, clothlookers, warehousemen, and odd hands are also included in the bonus.

The bonus is to be payable on the first pay day in 1916, and is to "automatically cease" thirteen weeks after the declaration of peace has been signed on behalf of the Government, and it is granted on the understanding that the operatives' representatives will endeavour to secure a similar bonus from all employers in the area of the Northern Counties Textile Federation.

THE TERMS.

DETAILS OF THE EMPLOYERS' CONCESSION.

After separate meetings on Wednesday representatives of the Cotton Spinners and Manufacturers' Association and the unions affiliated with the Northern Counties Textile Trades Federation met together in the rooms of the Manufacturers' Association in Exchange-street, Manchester, and after less than an hour's consultations, separately and collectively, the following settlement was accepted by all concerned:—

"The employers agree to give a war bonus of five per cent on the prices paid for weaving by the Uniform List and the Colne Coloured Goods List, and a similar bonus to those engaged in the weaving of towels, quilts, sheetings, and cotton blankets, and to winders, reelers, and beamers whose wages rise or fall with weavers' wages.

"The employers also agree to give a war bonus of five per cent to twisters and drawers, overlookers who are paid standing wages, clothlookers, warehousemen, and other odd hands employed in the warehouse in the weaving section of the trade.

"Where the wages are paid on the basis of a list the war bonus will be an addition of five per cent on such list. Thus, in the case of weavers in the grey trade who are paid by the Uniform List the weaving price (while the bonus is in operation) will be Uniform List plus ten per cent; and in the case of weavers in the coloured trade who are paid by the Colne Coloured Goods List the weaving price for coloured stripes will be the Colne Coloured Goods List plus 12½ per cent, and the weaving price for coloured checks will be Colne Coloured Goods List plus 7½ per cent while the bonus is in operation.

"It is agreed that the bonus now granted shall not apply to weavers paid by the Bury Fustian List nor to any other employes in any of the above occupations who are already receiving a war bonus or who have received an advance in wages since the commencement of the war.

"It is also agreed that the war bonus shall be paid for the first time on the first pay-day after January 1, 1916, and shall remain in operation until the expiration of thirteen weeks after an official Declaration of Peace has been signed on behalf of his Majesty's Government; that at the end of such period of thirteen weeks the bonus shall automatically cease, and wages shall revert to the rates existing before this war bonus was granted; and that when the wages have reverted to the rates existing before the granting of this war bonus there shall be a further period of 26 weeks during which the rates of wages shall not be altered by either side.

"The war bonus is granted on the understanding that the operatives' representatives will seek to secure a similar bonus from all cotton employers (whether members of an employers' association or not) in all of the districts covered by the Northern Counties Textile Trades' Federation."

The Signatures.

This settlement with the Cotton Spinners' and Manufacturers' Association was signed by Mr. John Taylor and Mr. F. A. Hargreaves, joint secretaries of the Cotton Spinners and Manufacturers' Association; Mr. Thomas Shaw, secretary of the Northern Counties Textile Trades' Federation; Mr. J. W. Ogden, president, and Mr. Joseph Cross, secretary of the Amalgamated Weavers' Association; Mr. E. Duxbury, secretary of the General Union of Associations of Loom Overlookers; Mr. W. C. Robinson, general secretary of the Amalgamated Association of Beamers, Twisters, Drawers, and Machine Workers; Mr. E. Strong, secretary of the General Amalgamation of Clothlookers and Warehousemen's Associations.

662a.

662a/24

The Yorkshire Observer.
17. 12. 15.

HEAVY WOOLLEN DISTRICT WAGES.

WAR BONUS CONCESSIONS OFFERED BY MANUFACTURERS.

An adjourned conference between representatives of the Heavy Woollen District Manufacturers and Shoddy Manufacturers' Association and the Heavy Woollen District branch of the General Union of Textile Workers was held yesterday at the Town Hall, Dewsbury, under the presidency of Sir Mark Oldroyd. The subject under consideration was an appeal made on behalf of the operatives that the war bonuses granted last April and which it was then agreed should constitute a wages agreement not to be disturbed until three months after the declaration of peace should be increased in order to meet the higher cost of living.

Sir Mark Oldroyd explained that manufacturers were not in such a good position as was generally believed. Heavy increases of assessments had been made with respect to mill premises, and in many other directions there had been considerable additions to expenses. The employers' representatives, however, after full consideration of the circumstances, would recommend the members of the two associations to increase the war bonuses from the first pay day in January.

Mr. Ben Turner (Batley) having intimated that the offer would be submitted to a meeting of operatives next day, the conference was again adjourned. If the revision of bonuses is carried into effect it will benefit about 10,000 workpeople.

Daily Mail. 28. 12. 15.

Textile workers at Huddersfield are to receive a war bonus of 3s. a week for men and 1s. [illegible] for women and young persons.

Textile Mercury
29-1-16

Textile Workers' Increased Earnings

Increases expressed in permanent rates of pay and in war bonuses continue from month to month. The Board of Trade returns shew that in December workers in Lancashire, Nottingham, and the North of Ireland obtained similar benefits to those derived by other textile workers during the past year. On the first pay day in December 3,000 velvet weavers, winders, loom overlookers, twisters, drawers, dressers, and slashers were paid a war bonus of five per cent., with revision of prices for certain extras for overlookers, estimated to result in an additional increase of 1s. to 2s. per week. Other advances were made to Nottingham lace makers: in the curtain section a war bonus of 2s. 6d. per week was conceded, and in the plain net section a war bonus of 1s. 3d. per man per machine on mosquito nets, and five per cent. on bobbin nets. These changes affected 800 workers, and came into force on the first pay day after December 11th. New wages arrangements came into operation in the linen industry of the North of Ireland on December 1st, affecting 12,000 workers. For dressers, roughers, preparers, spinners, doffers, weavers, and others, there was an increase of 2s. per week to men over eighteen years of age, and 1s. per week to youths, women, and girls, with an equivalent advance in piece rates.

Yorkshire Herald · 31·5·16

WOMEN WORKERS' COMPLAINTS

To the EDITOR of the YORKSHIRE HERALD.

Sir,—It came to my notice some time ago that Messrs. Rowntree refused to pay a war bonus to anyone who was receiving an old age pension or a separation allowance. I wonder if Mr. Rowntree has ever read the separation allowance forms, which state that the Government grants the money independent of any money earned by employes. I wonder if they ask Mr. Arnold Rowntree when he receives his £400 per year as a member of Parliament whether any of his relatives receive an old age pension or a separation allowance. This matter came to my notice some time ago, and I have travelled nearly all over England since then. I have made inquiries, and I find that Messrs. Rowntree are the only firm in England who have refused to pay a war bonus to anyone who is receiving an old age pension or separation allowance.

So far as the men are concerned, they have behaved very well to them, and have increased their wages from 26s. to 30s. per week, with a 3s. bonus, which makes their total earnings 33s. per week. Some of the men have families; some have none; some of the men take the bonus home; some don't.

Now in regard to the poor girls. Many have widowed mothers and homes to support. These poor girls have quite as much to do for their homes as many men. They have the same prices to pay for food, the same for rent, the same for everything. How is it these poor things have been left out in the cold? Several of the girls have told me they fully expected they were going to receive a war bonus when the men got one, as they had as much right to it as the men, who have received an advance of 7s. per week since the war broke out. They have not received a penny advance. In fact, they are getting less. How do they expect them to live? In fact, some of them are not living, they are only existing. I know many of them had a hard struggle to keep their homes going before the war; it must be much harder now.

Now Messrs. Rowntree, I want you to pay these poor girls the war bonus they are entitled to in the future, and also the money they should have received in the past. I am sure it will help them.—Yours, etc.,

"LIVE AND LET LIVE."

To the EDITOR of the YORKSHIRE HERALD.

Sir,—Would you please allow us a short space in your valuable paper to state the way in which the girls at Messrs. Rowntree's Works are being treated. A girl who has been at the Cocoa Works for six years or over has to be pushed out to let another take her place. That is what we think, because they are asking for more girls and giving them employment, and yet cannot keep those already employed fully in work. When we have to have work we cannot maintain ourselves, so are nothing at a

In the Durham section a war bonus of 2s. 6d. per week was conceded, and in the plain net section a war bonus of 1s. 3d. per man per machine on mosquito nets, and five per cent. on bobbin nets. These changes affected 800 workers, and came into force on the first pay day after December 11th. New wages arrangements came into operation in the linen industry of the North of Ireland on December 1st, affecting 12,000 workers. For dressers, roughers, preparers, spinners, doffers, weavers, and others, there was an increase of 2s. per week to men over eighteen years of age, and 1s. per week to youths, women, and girls, with an equivalent advance in piece rates.

Yorkshire Herald. 31.5.16

WOMEN WORKERS' COMPLAINTS

To the EDITOR of the YORKSHIRE HERALD.

Sir,—It came to my notice some time ago that Messrs. Rowntree refused to pay a war bonus to anyone who was receiving an old age pension or a separation allowance. I wonder if Mr. Rowntree has ever read the separation allowance forms, which state that the Government grants the money independent of any money earned by employes. I wonder if they ask Mr. Arnold Rowntree when he receives his £400 per year as a member of Parliament whether any of his relatives receive an old age pension or a separation allowance. This matter came to my notice some time ago, and I have travelled nearly all over England since then. I have made inquiries, and I find that Messrs. Rowntree are the only firm in England who have refused to pay a war bonus to anyone who is receiving an old age pension or separation allowance.

So far as the men are concerned, they have behaved very well to them, and have increased their wages from 26s. to 30s. per week, with a 3s. bonus, which makes their total earnings 33s. per week. Some of the men have families; some have none; some of the men take the bonus home; some don't.

Now in regard to the poor girls. Many have widowed mothers and homes to support. These poor girls have quite as much to do for their homes as many men. They have the same prices to pay for food, the same for rent, the same for everything. How is it these poor things have been left out in the cold? Several of the girls have told me they fully expected they were going to receive a war bonus when the men got one, as they had as much right to it as the men, who have received an advance of 7s. per week since the war broke out. They have not received a penny advance. In fact, they are getting less. How do they expect them to live? In fact, some of them are not living, they are only existing. I know many of them had a hard struggle to keep their homes going before the war; it must be much harder now.

Now Messrs. Rowntree, I want you to pay these poor girls the war bonus they are entitled to in the future, and also the money they should have received in the past. I am sure it will help them.—Yours, etc.,

"LIVE AND LET LIVE."

To the EDITOR of the YORKSHIRE HERALD.

Sir,—Would you please allow us a short space in your valuable paper to state the way in which the girls at Messrs. Rowntree's Works are being treated. A girl who has been at the Cocoa Works for six years or over has to be pushed out to let another take her place. That is what we think, because they are asking for more girls and giving them employment, and yet cannot keep those already employed fully in work. When we have to leave work we cannot maintain ourselves, to say nothing of a widowed mother and little ones. We hope that Messrs. Rowntree's will look into the matter, and not employ married women to take the present employes' work from them.—Yours, etc.,

SOME OF THE SUFFERERS.

Birmingham Post 4-4-16.

WAGES IN THE POTTING INDUSTRY.

DISPUTE TO BE ARBITRATED UPON.

There was a long conference yesterday between representatives of the Pottery Workers' Union and the manufacturers concerning the wages dispute in the potting industry. The union has demanded an extra war bonus of 5%, the same wages for women as for men when doing equal work, and minimum rates of pay for female labour, ranging from 6s. per week at 14 years to 14s. at 20 years.

The manufacturers at yesterday's conference stated that they could not improve upon the offer they had made of a 2½% war bonus and a minimum wage of 5s. for girls of 14, cases of hardship amongst the older girls to be considered by a conciliation committee.

The representatives of the union stated in reply that they were unable to accept these terms, and suggested arbitration on the points in dispute.

The manufacturers accepted the suggestion of arbitration, but expressed the hope that before the parties proceeded to arbitration the operatives' representatives would submit modified proposals, so that if possible an amicable settlement of the differences might be made.

Kentish Independent. Oct 14, 1916

662.

662a

WOMEN AND A WAR BONUS.

PETITION TO THE MINISTER OF MUNITIONS.

We understand that a petition has been forwarded to the Minister of Munitions (Mr. E. S. Montagu) by women workers employed by the Ministry at Armament Buildings and other offices protesting strongly against the distinction made between men and women in the matter of a war bonus.

The petitioners express the opinion that such discrimination is both invidious and impolitic—invidious because the continued increase in the cost of living is as great a burden on women as on men, and tradesmen do not regulate their prices according to the sex of their customers. The women also consider it impolitic in view of the fact that the trade union objection to the policy of dilution is the suspicion that women will be gradually used as substitutes for men; "if this suspicion becomes certainty (and this differential treatment of women practically means that) there will undoubtedly be a recrudescence of the hostility to further employment of female labour."

It is understood that the petition, which was extensively signed, will be considered by the Ministry at an early date.

Daily Argus, Bradford. 22-6-16.

WOMEN NIGHT WORKERS.

Bradford Woolcombers Reject Home Office Proposals.

Demand for 5s Advance.

Mr. C. F. Wright, His Majesty's Superintending Inspector of Factories, attended a special meeting of the members of the National Society of Machine Woolcombers held at the Palace Theatre, Bradford, yesterday. As reported in the "Argus" last week, the object of Mr. Wright's visit was to lay before the woolcombers, on behalf of the Home Office, proposals for introducing women as night-workers in the woolcombing industry.

After nearly two hours' discussion, during which there were some lively passages, a resolution was passed by a large majority, refusing to agree to the introduction of women on the night shift, thus rejecting the Home Office proposals.

Mr. Richard F. Smith, the secretary of the union, stated after the meeting that other unions concerned with the local textile trade would support the woolcombers in the matter. Mr. Smith said that in the voting on the resolution yesterday the men were unanimous and the women about equally divided. The women comprise about 70 per cent. of those engaged in the industry.

The meeting afterwards resolved to make an application for an advance in wages of 5s per week, to begin on June 10. A war bonus of 2s per week has previously been granted, but it is suggested that this should be included in the 5s, and the whole considered as a permanent advance. It was agreed by the members that double contributions should be paid during the period of the war.

Daily Mail 6/11/16

WOMEN'S WAR BONUS.

MORE PAY FOR WORKERS ON THE RAILWAYS.

Mr. J. H. Thomas, M.P., addressing a meeting of railwaymen at Aberavon yesterday, said that when the time came they would make it perfectly clear that they saw no reason or logic why railways should ever revert to the old position of private ownership.

On the question of women labour on the railways, he said he did not believe that when the war was over all women who had been brought into industry would suddenly be turned out of it. If they believed that, they were living in a fool's paradise. "What you have got to prevent is women's labour being exploited in order to lower the standard of wages of male labour. A bonus for railway women is being arranged. I believe that before this day week there will be an announcement that railway women's claims are fully recognised and that the settlement will date back to the same day as the men got their last bonus."

The Textile Mercury
22. IV. 1916.

THE COTTON WAGES DISPUTE

The Amalgamated Association of Card and Blowing Room Workers have now decided to apply for an increase of ten per cent. in the rates of pay. They take up an attitude similar to that of the Amalgamated Association of Operative Cotton Spinners whose demand for a ten per cent. advance has been before the Federation of Master Cotton Spinners' Associations for two or three weeks. On Friday of last week the application of the operative spinners was considered at a joint meeting of representatives of their Amalgamation and of the Masters' Federation. The proceedings ended in the officials of the workers disagreeing with the proposal of the employers to submit the situation to the Government Committee on Production, with the object of obtaining the Committee's ruling on the award made last year in reference to the granting of a five per cent. war bonus. The question to be decided is whether it was the intention of the Committee that the concession then given should not be followed by further applications during the period of the war. The view of the operatives is that they are entitled to seek a change in rates of pay within any reasonable time, we presume, from the last award, and in accordance with the state of the trade. It was agreed in June, 1915, that the last award (granted in July) should "continue for such period as the Committee on Production shall determine." The Committee, however, did not fix any period—a course which they have adopted with the settlement of disputes in other trades—but decided that the advance should be granted on terms "dependent on the existence of the abnormal conditions now prevailing in consequence of the war."

The employers are willing to leave the meaning of this with the Committee on Production, and have declined to deal with the operative spinners' application till the ruling has been given. The same attitude will be taken with respect to the demand of the cardroom workers. The Committee on Production are in favour of hearing the case of each party concerned in the dispute. The official report of Friday's proceedings, as given by Mr. J. Smethurst, the secretary of the Masters' Federation, was as follows:—

Mr. B. Tattersall, president of the Federation, presided, and the following gentlemen represented the Federation:—Messrs. William Hamer, J. M. Thomas, Harold Cliffe, Percy Ashworth, R. H. Jackson, William Howarth, F. Holroyd, R. Worswick, and the secretary.

A long discussion took place, and the Federation representatives submitted the following offer:—

The Federation of Master Cotton Spinners' Associations and the Amalgamated Association of Operative Cotton Spinners having agreed in June, 1915, to the following terms of reference to the Committee on Production—namely:—

"That it be referred to the Committee on Production to decide whether any and, if so, what alteration should be made in the wages of the classes of operatives covered by the Card and Blowing Room Association and the Amalgamated Association of Operative Cotton Spinners; any alteration made by the award to come into force as from the first settling day following the acceptance of this reference by the operatives' associations and to continue for such period as the Committee on Production shall determine."

and as, by the award of the Committee on Production dated July 21, 1915, a definite date has not been stated up to which the award should continue, and a difference of opinion between the Federation and the Spinners' Amalgamation having in consequence now arisen, and the Committee on Production having expressed its willingness to hear the views of the parties on the particular point and to give a ruling on the same, we hereby, on behalf of the Federation, express our willingness to submit the point for definite ruling to the Committee on Production. Pending such ruling we cannot deal with the claim for a further alteration in wages now put in by the Spinners' Amalgamation.

The operatives declined to accept this offer, and the meeting terminated with a vote of thanks to the chairman.

On the day following the above report (Saturday), the two operatives' Amalgamations met separately and discussed the wages question. The Executive Council of the operative spinners gave no official report of their deliberations, but intimated that a representative meeting of the Amalgamation would be held to-day (Saturday). The whole of the situation will be reviewed by the delegates, who will, no doubt, decide on what future action should be taken. The Cardroom Workers' Amalgamation held their quarterly meeting in Manchester. We understand that very much was said about the alleged large margins of profit now being made by employers in the spinning trade. Subsequently the following resolution was adopted:—

That this representative meeting is strongly of opinion that the margins between cotton and yarn have so improved as to warrant an advance of wages of not less than 10 per cent. being paid to our members; and instructs the Executive Council to give notice to the employers' associations for an advance of 10 per cent. in wages at the earliest opportunity.

The resolution was afterwards forwarded to the headquarters of the Masters' Federation.

Since the meetings of last week-end, the Operative Spinners' Amalgamation have issued a circular to members, and from this we learn that at their meeting to take place this week-end the following question will be discussed:—

Shall a ballot of the members be taken as to whether they are prepared to strike work if necessary to enforce the advance of wages which has been asked for?

Reference is made in the circular to the joint meeting which took place last Friday week, and the writer brings against the employers a charge of wanting to delay the advance by proposing to submit the question to the Committee on Production. There is no foundation for this accusation, and it must be well known that the Government Committee are constantly dealing with wages questions and renewing or increasing bonuses that have been granted since the war commenced. During the past few months many of the war grants in the textile trades have been revised and increased. With regard to the refusal of the Masters' Federation to go into the operatives' application until the Committee on Production have reported upon the meaning of the last award, Mr. Marsland (the operatives' general secretary) makes the comment quoted below:—

In the opinion of your Executive Council this is mere quibbling on the part of the employers, the object apparently being to try to stave off for some time the advance which has been asked for, and which is abundantly justified by the state of trade. The abnormal conditions prevailing in regard to food prices when the last advance was obtained are even more abnormal to-day, while the state of trade, upon which the present application is made, is infinitely better. Your Executive Council cannot, under the cir

The Times
7-7-16.

WOMEN RAILWAY WORKERS' CLAIM.

Sir G. R. Askwith, Sir D. Harrel, and Sir George S. Gibb, of the Committee on Production, to which body was referred the claim by the National Union of Railwaymen against the Great Western Railway (announced in The Times of July 15) for the payment of a war bonus to the company's female employees, have decided that the claim has not been established.

The Union contended that the female employees should receive a war bonus of 5s. per week paid by the company, in common with other railway companies, to their male servants. In view of the large number of women now employed on the railways the decision is regarded as of considerable importance.

Railway Review
21-7-16.

WOMEN'S WAR BONUS.

APPLICATION REFUSED.

OFFICIAL STATEMENT.

The following statement, dated July 13th, has been issued by the Committee on Production :—

FEMALE EMPLOYEES, GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

The following finding is in respect of an application made to the Great Western Company by the National Union of Railwaymen for the payment of a war bonus to the company's female employés.

The application was not acceded to by the company, and the matter was referred to the Committee on Production for decision. Representatives of the parties were accordingly heard on July 10th.

The union's claim is that female employés should receive the war bonus of 5s. per week at present being paid by the Great Western Railway Company, in common with other railway companies, to their male servants.

The company claim that in August, 1915, when the war bonus to male workers (which then was at the rate of from 2s. to 3s. per week and is now 5s. per week) was in operation, they arranged with the National Union of Railwaymen to grant considerable increases to women, and it was agreed that the pay of women employed in grades in which they had not hitherto been employed should, for the duration of the war, be in each case the minimum pay of the grade.

The Committee have given careful consideration to the statements and arguments submitted to them, and their finding is that the claim of the union for the payment of the war bonus to the women employed has not been established.

G. R. ASKWITH.
D. HARREL.
GEORGE S. GIBB.

Aberdeen Express
2-10-16.

AWARD TO EAST OF SCOTLAND SHOEMAKERS.

On Saturday ex-Baillie Smith, secretary to the Arbroath branch of the National Union of Boot and Shoe Operators, received the award by Mr John L. Ward, Leicester, in the claim by the East of Scotland shoe makers for an advance of 20 per cent on their wages. Mr Ward grants 1s 6d per week to men and 1s 6d per week to women, payable from September 23 last. The total war bonus now paid, including the award, is 4s 6d per week to men and 2s 6d to women. The new rates affect both civilian and military work.

The Times.
7-10-16.

662a
662a/28

MORE WAR BONUSES.

A third war bonus has been offered by the Employers' Joint Committee to the members of the Amalgamated Union of Operative Bakers and Confectioners, who put forward a demand for a minimum wage of £2 a week for men working in the London district. The men have already received bonuses of 3s. and 1s., and the employers now offer, in place of a minimum of £2, an additional bonus of 4s., thus making a total bonus of 8s.

The London branch of the Paper Workers' Union have agreed with the Newspaper Proprietors' Association and the Federation of Wholesale Newsagents for an increased war bonus of 2s. a week.

At a meeting of the Tin Box Trade Board (Great Britain), yesterday, it was resolved to issue a proposal under the Trade Boards Act to vary the minimum rate for female workers of 18 years of age and upwards from 14s. 1d. to 16s. 3d. a week, and for male workers of 22 years of age and upwards from 26s. to 30s. 4d. a week.

At a meeting of the Bookbinding Section of the London Chamber of Commerce yesterday the minimum wages of women, both time and piece work, were increased by 10 per cent. The higher rates will be paid as from next week.

Evening News
11-10-16

INADEQUATE SALARIES.

Are Women Clerks Being Exploited by the Government?

Why should a woman clerk's war-bonus be half that of a man clerk?

This is the question Miss Isabel Basnett, Secretary of the Association of Women Clerks and Secretaries, is asking on behalf of her members.

"Women in the Ministry of Munitions and other Government offices, earning less than £2 per week are to get 2s. (on account of the cost of food)," said Miss Basnett to a representative of The Evening News, "and those earning over £2 a week 1s. 6d. The men get 2s. and 3s. bonus.

"The fact is, a great many educated women are being exploited by the Government. They cannot live on the 30s. offered for the better posts, except in the most restricted way.

"After paying for lodgings, food, and fares, there is barely anything left of this sum for clothes.

"Women are not less patriotic than they were, but they are leaving the Government posts of 30s. to 35s. for others at £2 10s. and £3 a week. The private employer has been obliged to raise his scale of pay."

Labour Leader.
2/11/16

Railway Women's Bonus.

We rejoice to learn from Mr. J. H. Thomas, M.P.'s straightforward speech at Aberavon, on Sunday last, on the question of State ownership of the railways and the wages of the workers, that the claim of railway women workers to a war bonus equal to that of the men workers has practically been established, and that there is good hope that it will be made retrospective.

* * *

Railway News.
4/11/16

MIDLAND RAILWAY: WOMEN WORKERS' WAR BONUS.

As the result of a conference held in London recently between the officials of the railway and of the National Union of Railwaymen and the Workers' Union, women workers over eighteen years of age employed in Midland Railway shops at Derby have been granted a war bonus of 3s. per week, and those under eighteen 1s. 6d. per week, the concession to be retrospective from the time the men in the shops received a bonus.

Yorkshire Even. Post.

6.9.16

MURMURS AMONG WOMEN TRAM CONDUCTORS.

STRIKE TALK IN LEEDS.

CITY COUNCIL AND QUESTION OF A WAR BONUS.

At the Leeds City Council meeting this afternoon,

Alderman G. H. Wilson explained at some length the reasons which had guided the General Purposes Committee in alteri.. the scale of war bonus to Corporation workers so as to give 2s. per week to those with less than 20s. per week, and 3s. to those with 20s., and not exceeding 60s. per week. Just about the time the Committee were considering the question the Corporation, said the Alderman, received a windfall—he would not say how much—and this enabled the Committee to make the increased allowances without adding a penny burden on the ratepayers.

The employees' claims had now been practically all dealt with, but there remained the women conductors. These, it should be remembered, constituted a temporary staff; they came into the Corporation's service after the war, and had therefore never been paid a war bonus. He did not think there were many men in that Council who would be prepared to argue that these women were underpaid, when they received 27s. 6d. per week and overtime.

Mr. G. H. Pearson. Hadn't you better say they receive 5½d. for an hour's work? It is not correct to say they receive 27s. 6d. per week.

Alderman Wilson: It is nearly 30s. per week all round.

Mr. Pearson: It is less many times.

Alderman Wilson reiterated that the average was nearer 30s., and he added that the women got two uniforms each year as against the male conductor's one. The women had, he went on, only been with the Corporation a comparatively short time, and surely they were in a bit of a hurry to ask for increases. Many got into the service at a few minutes' notice, as it were, and yet they were holding meetings and talking of striking. He said, "Let them strike;" although that was not such an easy thing for them to do, as the tramway undertaking was a controlled establishment.

Mr. Tallant: But they can leave, can't they?

Alderman Wilson agreed, and said that was the step they ought to take if dissatisfied.

Alderman E. C. Midgley asked the alderman if he could give the annual cost of the increased war bonuses.

Alderman Wilson: I cannot tell you, but it will run into many thousands. It would have involved us in an increase in the rates had we not had the windfall I have referred to. I will explain the source privately to any member of the Council.

Alderman Midgley suggested that the annual cost would be about £4,000.

Alderman Wilson said it would exceed that.

Alderman Midgley: £8,000 or £9,000 then?

Alderman Wilson: Probably a great deal more.

Mr. G. H. Pearson stated that the tram-cars were earning 2d. per car mile more to-day than they did before the war.

Mr. J. Buckle contended that the women conductors were entitled to the same war bonus as male employees of the Corporation.

Alderman Wilson in a brief reply said the women were only engaged as temporary workers and it was not intended to continue their employment after the war.

The increased war bonus as proposed by the General Purposes Committee was adopted, most of the Labour members refraining from voting.

Birmingham Post.

19. 4. 16.

POTTERY TRADE DISPUTE SETTLED.

The wages dispute in the pottery industry of North Staffordshire, which affected 40,000 operatives, has been settled. As from May 1 there is to be an increase of 2½% in the war bonus, making a total war bonus of 10%. Minimum rates of wages are fixed for certain women workers. A conciliation board is to consider cases of hardship among women pieceworkers, fix prices for casting, and fix a line of demarcation between the classes of work to be performed by men and women. Certain male operatives are to receive an increase of 3d. per day besides the increased war bonus.

Reynolds Newspaper.

16-6-16.

— a —

WOMEN'S BONUS.

I referred a few weeks ago to the strong dissatisfaction that existed with regard to the women employed on railways not receiving a bonus. I now hear that matters were brought to a head during the past week by the Committee of Production hearing both sides of the matter. Although only one railway case was argued, namely— the Great Western, there can be no doubt that the general principle must affect the whole. The National Union of Railwaymen are adopting the very wise policy in connection with this matter in standing out for the same rate of pay for women as for men. This is the only way both to protect their own labour and to help their female Trade Unionist comrades.

— x —

WHITE SLAVES IN LAUNDRIES.

A week or two ago I published in this column the grievances of laundry workers, whom I described as "white slaves." A Labour leader now asks to be put in touch with the correspondent who furnished me with the information I used. Will she kindly forward her address, which has been mislaid, so that I can send to her the letter I have received from the gentleman who is desirous of taking up her case? Meantime, I have received a large number of letters complaining of the rates of pay in laundries. "We cannot all do war work," says "Constant Reader." "Someone must do the washing and ironing, but we ought to get a fair price for our work. This we do not get now." "Best Ironer" writes: "It is high time something was done for us poor souls who have to earn their daily bread at laundry work. I have to work many hours ironing wet clothes. . . . I am sure it is time the Government took the matter up."

— x —

Dublin Evening Mail.

30.8.16

CITY STRIKE

NEARLY 200 GIRLS OUT OF WORK

As a result of their demand for a war bonus being refused between 150 and 200 girls, in the employment of Messrs. Armstrong and Co., paper manufacturers, ceased work yesterday.

The premises of the company are temporarily situated at Seville place, their former building in Abbey street having been burned down some time ago.

It appears that the girls yesterday made application to the management for a war bonus all round of 2s. a week. This the company refused, and the girls, to the number mentioned, at once left work. The manager informed our representative to-day that the application could not be considered or complied with.

To-day pickets were stationed in the vicinity of the premises. No steps towards a possible settlement of the dispute have yet been made.

Evening News. 662 A.

11-9-16 662a/30

250 GIRLS TOLD TO GO HOME.

The machinery was stopped at Messrs. Brown, Son, and Co.'s clothing factory at Peterborough to-day and 250 girl employees, who had asked for a war bonus, which was refused, were told to go home.

Daily Mail

29.9.16

ONE-THIRD MORE FOR PRINTING

The Master Printers' and Allied Trades' Association, meeting in London yesterday, passed a resolution granting until six months after the declaration of peace advances of 3s. per week to compositors, readers, machine-minders, binders, machine rulers, warehousemen and cutters, and platen minders, and 1s. 6d. per week to members of the women's branch of the National Union of Paper Workers.

It was urged that increased charges must be made to customers to meet these extra wages and the higher cost of material, amounting to 30 and 40 per cent.

Labour Leader.

28.9.16

Railway Women Left Out.

In the official reports of the result of the conference on railway workers' wages only men and boys are mentioned as receiving the increased bonus. What of the women? The omission is "twice cursed." Many of them have loyally joined the Union, and their desertion (for it is no less, if the official reports are correct) by their men comrades is disloyal to them and fatal to wage levels after the war. We hope it is not too late for the omission to be made good.

Eastern Daily Press.

Oct. 10 1916.

GIRLS ON STRIKE IN NORWICH.

WAR BONUS AND UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE.

All the girl and women workers employed at Messrs. Harmers' clothing factory in St. Andrew's Street, Norwich—some 300—came out on strike yesterday morning. From inquiries the strikers' case appears to centre round the demand for a war bonus. In view of the increased cost of living the girls' leaders say that a war bonus ought to be given. It has been asked for several times. No definite sum, however, was mentioned. Now it is stated that a deputation will approach the management to ask for a bonus of two shillings a week. The strikers met at the Labour Institute yesterday afternoon to draft their case and appoint their deputation.

Apparently some feeling has been aroused on the subject of the compulsory unemployment insurance. There are five weeks arrears, and the management, so the female workers say, are deducting these arrears from their wages. This is a minor grievance, and our representative gathered that those affected do not object to this if they are met by their employers with regard to the war bonus.

In the afternoon the strike extended to Chamberlins' factory in Botolph Street, where 50 girls left work in sympathy with those at Messrs. Harmer's establishment. Their demand, we understand, is practically the same. Mr. W. J. Bunting, the manager, informs us that the girls were perfectly happy until they were approached by the others. The firm, he says, have never been asked by the girls for a war bonus. They have never been approached, and not a word has been said on the subject, either of the war bonus or the compulsory unemployment insurance.

Daily Express
8-1-16

WAR BONUS FOR WOMEN.

Sir William Beardmore, opening a canteen for girl workers at Messrs. Beardmore's munition works, in Renfrewshire, yesterday afternoon, stated that his firm have decided that a bonus of 10 per cent. on the total wages earned by women workers shall be paid as from January 1 until the end of the war, on condition that the girls keep regular time and work steadily.

Daily Mail
26.7.16.

Yorkshire dyers have been awarded a further advance of 4s., making a total war increase of 7s. Women and boys have been given an extra 2s. 8d., bringing their total advance up to 4s. 8d.

Reynold's Newspaper
29-10-16

VOMEN'S BONUSES.

Considerable friction has arisen in consequence of the large and growing numbers of women employed on railways in the country being left out of the recent agreement. Whilst it is true that the minimum wage was agreed upon some fifteen months ago, the whole position has changed today because of the large number employed and also because by the decision of the Committee of Production they were ruled out of the recent bonus. Negotiations, however, have been opened up, and I gather that arrangements have been made for a meeting to be held to discuss the whole question, when it is hoped that a satisfactory settlement will be effected, and so ease what looks like becoming a very dangerous question.

The Times.
6/11/16

RAILWAY WOMEN'S BONUS.

Mr. J. H. THOMAS, M.P., addressing a mass meeting of railwaymen at Aberavon yesterday, said that a bonus for railway women was being arranged, and he was justified in saying that they had now succeeded in establishing the point that there was a claim for a bonus for women. He believed before that day week there would be an announcement stating that the railway women's claims for a war bonus were fully recognized, and he had the strongest ground for believing that whatever the settlement might be it would be retrospective, and date back to the same day as the men got their last bonus.

In regard to the suggested food and wage sliding scale, he had rejected the proposal first because he did not accept the pre-war standard as being a correct basis to calculate railwaymen's wages. In 1914 railwaymen were in the midst of their national programme, which included an all-round advance and a reduction of hours, and to have accepted the principle on that basis would have been to admit that that basis was a fair standard. They had met again during the past week and had agreed on joint proposals which did not accept the pre-war standard. These proposals were being submitted to the companies, and, he added, "I hope we will stand together in trying to bring it into operation."

Tramway and Railway World 21.10.16
662 X
662

Leeds Award on Women's Wages and Bonus. Mr. E. Forbes Lankester, of the Board of Trade, has issued his award in the arbitration in regard to wages of women conductors on Leeds city tramways and the question of their participation in the war bonuses. The Tramways Committee, holding that the engagement of women was a temporary measure, refused to put them on the men's graduated scale of wages. The women's rate was fixed at 5½d. per hour, the commencing rate for men, and they were not given the war bonus of 2s. (since increased to 3s.) per week. The decision of the arbitrator is against the union on the question of the rate of wages, but all women conductors with three months' service are to receive half the bonus and those with twelve months' service the full bonus, payments to be retrospective from the time of qualification.

Nottingham Guardian
25/10/16

TEACHERS' WAGES.

THE WAR BONUS QUESTION IN DERBYSHIRE.

Derbyshire teachers were never so disappointed or in such an ugly mood, the County Education Committee were assured at their meeting at Derby yesterday, as they are over the war bonus question. In accordance with the decision of a joint conference of North Midland county education authorities, a bonus of £7 10s. per annum has been granted to married masters whose salaries do not exceed £120, and of £5 to unmarried mistresses receiving £60 who are not living at home or who have dependents.

Mr. S. Wright (Duffield), the teachers' representative on the committee, declared that some of the authorities had already departed from that agreement, and increased the maximum salary on which the bonus was based. He specially pleaded the cause of the supplementary teachers living at home, challenging any member to say that their rate of pay, which worked out at 15s. 4d. per week, was a living wage for a woman. The committee were shirking their responsibility and throwing it upon the parents or other relatives of these women. While warning his fellow-members in the terms already quoted, and contending that the teachers had not been treated with the consideration they deserved, he intimated that in present circumstances they would not descend to such tactics as "going slow" or to drastic action. Mr. Wright also disagreed with the estimate that the bonus would involve an additional expenditure of £5,000 per annum in the county.

The Chairman (Ald. J. Oakes) said the committee had ever sympathy with the supplementary teachers, a very useful class, which the Teachers' Association at one time wanted to abolish. He pointed out that teachers' salaries had automatically increased thrice during the war.

Canon Molineux (Staveley) also declared that the committee sympathised with the teachers, to whose influence in the past the loyalty and chivalry now being shown by the soldiers were largely due.

Mr. E. Wallis (Long Eaton) reminded the committee that in many cases the teachers' income was diminished, owing to the discontinuance of evening schools. He considered the teachers were being treated very badly, and not encouraged to put forth their best efforts. The effect upon the future supply would be very unfortunate.

No motion being submitted, the committee proceeded to the next business.

FARMERS AND FEMALE LABOUR.

The Agricultural Sub-Committee reported that an 18 weeks' course of instruction in agriculture had been arranged at the Midland College for women, and also for men not eligible for military service. Women taking the three weeks' course were to be paid 2s. 6d. per week as wages during training. It was also proposed to hold classes for women in thatching, hedge-cutting, bending, and other work approved by the Women's Farm Labour Committee. An offer by Ald. Fitz-Herbert Wright, M.P., to train a limited number of women on his farm for two months had been accepted, the committee to pay the sub-agent £2 for the whole period, a forewoman £1 a week, and the students 15s. a week for food and laundry, together with one return railway fare where necessary, and health insurance charge.

The Chairman said it was unfortunate that farmers seemed to think that women could not be of assistance to them, and that they did not show themselves more anxious to take advantage of what the committee were doing for them. Women were undertaking all sorts of tasks in the ironworks, but apparently it was more difficult to train them for agricultural work than for any other industry.

Mr. J. Brown (director of education) agreed that women seemed reluctant to attend agricultural classes.

Railway News
11/11/16

66

66

WAR BONUS FOR WOMEN.

As recorded in our last issue, a conference recently took place between a Committee of general managers and the National Union of Railwaymen and the Associated Society of Locomotive Engineers and Firemen. The subjects discussed were: The practicability of a sliding scale based on cost of foodstuffs being applied to the war bonus, and the question of extending the bonus to women railway employés.

Addressing a meeting of railwaymen at Aberavon on Sunday last, Mr. J. H. Thomas, M.P., said that a bonus for railway women was being arranged, and he was justified in saying that they had now succeeded in establishing the point that there was a claim for a bonus for women. He believed that before that day week there would be an announcement that the women's claim for a bonus was recognised, and he had the strongest ground for believing that, whatever the settlement might be, it would be restrospective, and date back to the same day as the men got their last bonus.

We understand that this statement is correct, and that practically all the companies now under Government control have agreed to grant a bonus to women. The amount has been fixed at 3s. per week in the case of individuals of eighteen years of age and upwards, and 1s. 6d. per week to those under eighteen years. The precise details of the arrangement have yet to be announced, but it may be taken that other understandings in regard to women railway employés will not be altered in any way.

The present, therefore, is opportune for recalling the history of the entry of women into railway war work and what has happened in connection with that development. Soon after the war commenced it became apparent that the railways would be called upon to release a considerable number of their men for service with the Colours. This led to the appointment of women, who were trained as ticket collectors, carriage cleaners, engine cleaners, etc. This was not done alike by all railway companies. In fact, a recent issue of "The Board of Trade Labour Gazette" directed attention to the differences which exist as between the action of one company and that of another. Whereas one company has a large staff of women ticket collectors and a relatively small staff of women carriage cleaners, another has no women ticket collectors nor porters, but a large number of carriage cleaners. Another with no women engine cleaners or labourers has many ticket collectors. In one respect, however, all companies acted alike. We refer to the fixing of wages for women on a slightly lower basis than for men. In so doing they were acting on well-established lines. The wages of women have never been precisely the same as for men, even when employed on like work. A reason for this was assigned in the report of the Select Committee of 1913 on the wages and conditions of employment of Post Office servants. This was that "the services of women were not as valuable as a whole to the Post Office, because they cannot perform work dealing with heavy weights, and they are not as useful in times of pressure and cannot do night work."

But the war has changed many things, and the substitution of men by women has brought into prominence the old trade union principle of safeguarding the rate of a particular job. Thus, in June, 1915, the President of the National Union of Railwaymen said: "We view the employment of women at less rates than those paid to men in positions where the rates have been the subject of agreements as highly prejudicial, and the protection of the standard wages for these positions is a principle to which we shall tenaciously cling."

Acting on these lines, the National Union of Railwaymen made representations to the railways, and in July last year a conference took place between representatives of the Union and of the companies. It was explained that the meetings had been arranged to afford an opportunity to the representatives of the men to discuss questions which had arisen in regard to the employment of women on the railways. The Union asked for and the companies gave an assurance that the employment of women in capacities in which they had not formerly been employed was an emergency provision arising out of the circumstances created by the war, and would not prejudice in any way any undertaking given by the companies as to the re-employment of men who had joined the Colours. It was also agreed that the employment of women during the war in capacities in which they had not previously been employed was without prejudice to the general question of the employment of women.

To make their claim clear, the representatives of the National Union of Railwaymen intimated that they desired that women employed for the duration of the war should be paid the minimum pay of the post they fill, but did not ask that grade increases as settled by the Conciliation Boards or otherwise should apply.

The outcome of the conference was an arrangement that the pay of women employed in grades in which they were not employed prior to August, 1914, should be, for the duration of the war, the minimum pay of the grade. At the time this understanding was come to a war bonus was being paid to railwaymen, and it was quite understood by all parties that it would not be extended to women employés.

Following the increase of the men's bonus to 5s. per week, however, a number of women applied for the bonus. This was in October, 1915, and certain carriage cleaners employed by the Great Western Railway went so far as to strike in order to force their application. They, however, resumed work unconditionally. But ultimately the parties agreed to submit the matter for decision to the Committee on Production. This was in July last. The Union's claim was that the female employés should receive the war bonus of 5s. per week then being paid to the men. The Company's claim was that in August, 1915, when the war bonus to men was in operation, they arranged with the National Union of Railwaymen to grant considerable increases to women, and it was then agreed that the pay of women employed in grades in which they had not previously been employed should be the minimum pay of the grade. The decision of the Committee on Production was that the claim of the Union for the payment of the war bonus to women had not been established.

Although not argued as such, the Great Western case was a test, the result of which applied to all the companies. Accordingly nothing more was heard of the desire to secure a war bonus for women until recently, when the men's bonus was increased to 10s. per week. There was, of course, something to be said in favour of the claim that that fact called for reconsideration of the women's remuneration. The settlement on the terms set out above is, in our opinion, a fair one. We cannot give a precise estimate of the expenditure involved, but there is no doubt that it will be chargeable as working expenditure in the accounts as between the railways and the Government.

Railway Review
1/12/16

WOMEN'S WAR BONUS.

SETTLEMENT.

The following is a copy of the agreement between the representatives of the N.U.R. and the railway managers with respect to payment of war bonus to railway women workers:—

"Memorandum of Agreement made at a meeting between the Committee of General Managers of Railways and Representatives of the National Union of Railwaymen on November 2nd, 1916.

"Present.—Railway Companies: Messrs. Potter (in the chair), Calthrop, Matheson, Sir H. Walker, Mr. Clower, secretary. M.U.R: Messrs. Bellamy, Thomas, Cramp, Morris, Ellison, Allen.

"The meeting was held for the purpose of considering an application made for an increase in the pay of females employed by the railway companies in the manipulation of traffic.

"The representatives of the National Union of Railwaymen stated that they do not desire to disturb the arrangement entered into in August, 1915, under which it was agreed that the rates of pay of women employed in grades in which they were not employed prior to August, 1914, should, for the duration of the war, be the minimum pay of the grade, but suggested that the present request be met by the granting of a war bonus.

"After discussion, it was agreed that, beginning with the week ending September 16th, 1916, females employed in any of the grades referred to be paid a war bonus as under:—

"If 18 years of age or over, 3s. per week; if under 18 years of age, 1s. 6d. per week. Provided—

"(a) that if an employee is now receiving either a war bonus or a rate of pay in excess of the minimum rate for her grade, the bonus to be given under this agreement shall be such a sum as is necessary to make up the total weekly increase to 3s. for adults and 1s. 6d. to juniors: and

"(b) that the bonus is not to be given to females not wholly occupied in railway duties, such, for instance, as wives or relatives of railway employés living in gatehouses and receiving an acknowledgment for attending to the gates.

The North-Eastern, Great Northern, South-Eastern and Chatham, Barry, Brecon and Merthyr, and Scottish Railway Companies are not parties to this agreement.

For General Managers' Committee:—
F. POTTER, Chairman.
W. CLOWER, Secretary.

For National Union of Railwaymen:—
A. BELLAMY, Vice-Chairman.
J. H. THOMAS, Secretary.

Railway News
11/12/16

RAILWAY WOMEN'S BONUS.

Mr. J. H. Thomas, M.P., addressing a mass meeting of railwaymen at Aberavon on Sunday, said they had never admitted that women on railways were permanently employed, and that was the reason why they were treated as casual labour and received minimum rate. They had no right to quarrel with women merely because work was being performed by women, but what they had got to prevent was women's labour being exploited in order to lower the standard wages of male labour. A bonus for railway women was being arranged, and he was justified in saying that they had now succeeded in establishing the point that there was a claim for a bonus for women. He believed before that day week there would be an announcement stating that the railway women's claims for a war bonus were fully recognised, and he had the strongest ground for believing that whatever the settlement might be it would be retrospective, and date back to the same day as the men got their last bonus. Before the war there were no greater hypocrites than the railwaymen of this country, for while they condemned the unscrupulous attitude of employers, yet they were no worse employers than any others, and the real cause for which they had sought to blame others was at their own doors, due to the apathy, selfishness, and indifference of railwaymen themselves. In regard to the suggested food and wage sliding scale, he had turned the proposal down, first because he did not accept the pre-war standard as being a correct basis to calculate railwaymen's wages. In 1914 railwaymen were in the midst of their national programme, which included an all-round advance and a reduction of hours, and to have accepted the principle on that basis would have been to admit that that basis was a fair standard. They had met again during the past week, and had agreed on joint proposals which did not accept the pre-war standard. These proposals were being submitted to the companies, and, he added, "I hope we will stand together in trying to bring it into operation."

No Name Given.

662.a.

662a/34

WAR BONUS TO IRISH NATIONAL SCHOOL TEACHERS.

MADAM,—May I ask for space in your paper to call attention to the Government proposals regarding Irish National School teachers? These proposals form an instructive comment on the supposed desire of the Government to recognise the value of women's work.

Briefly, the position of Irish female teachers in primary schools is this. They hold certificates equal to those of men: their qualifications have to reach as high a standard as those of men: the latter have to reach a higher standard in mathematics; but, on the other hand, women teachers have to qualify in cookery, laundry, and needlework, and teach these subjects in addition to those required from male teachers. As regards salary and expenditure, the male teacher has a much larger salary than the female. Men principals receive an average salary of £114 a year, women an average of £90; men assistants receive an average of £88 a year, women an average of £74; women teachers commence at £24 a year, men at £28 a year. The average pension given on "compulsory retirement" to men teachers is £56, to women it is £34 odd.

Now consider the undertaking given by the Chancellor of the Exchequer to the deputation from the Irish National Teachers' Association. He promised a grant of 4s. to men teachers in receipt of salaries under £100 a year, and of 3s. a week to all receiving salaries above that amount. Female teachers in receipt of salaries under £100 are to receive a grant of 2s. a week, and those receiving over £100 a grant of 1s. 8d. a week.

These figures require no comment: the flagrant injustice involved has roused a storm of protest. A large and representative meeting, convened by the Belfast National School Teachers' Association, was held in the Ulster Hall, Belfast, on October 26th, at which the following resolution was carried unanimously: "That in view of the important services rendered to the State by the women teachers, we claim that their bonus should not be less than that granted the men teachers. . . . "

It was satisfactory to note the expressions of indignation from the speakers of all parties at the unjust discrimination between men and women. I may quote especially the remark of Mr. Joseph Devlin, M.P., "that he felt women would have to play a larger part in the government of the country in the future than they had done hitherto," and of the ex-Moderator of the Presbyterian Church, that "if this sort of thing is going on we shall all be Suffragists."

DORA MELLONE, Hon. Press Secretary,
Belfast Suffrage Society.

MADAM,—I am requested by my Committee to send you the following resolution passed by the Joint Committee of the Irish Women's Local Government Association:—

> "That this Joint Committee strongly protests against the proposal to give to Irish women teachers a War Bonus half as great as that to be given to men, and desires to support any demand the women teachers may make for equal treatment, in view of the fact that they have to meet the present high cost of living with salaries already smaller than those of the men."

The following Women's Societies were represented: Alexandra College Guild, Church League for Women's Suffrage, Conservative and Unionist Franchise Association, Irish Women's Franchise League, Irish Women's Reform League, Women's National Health Association, World-Wide Christian Temperance Union, United Irishwomen.

EDITH SANDERSON, Hon. Secretary.

No Name Given.

GOVERNMENT CLERICAL WORKERS.

MADAM,—The serious warnings uttered by the Committee reporting on the health of munition workers should, one would think, make all employers of labour do their best in every way to minimise the strain on the health of their employees, brought about by hard work and long hours. One of the ways in which the strain on the health of the worker can be lessened is by giving a generous meal-time allowance during the hours of work. An hour for a mid-day meal and half-an-hour for tea is the minimum which should be allowed, and indeed is the minimum under the Factory Acts which the factory owner is compelled to give his workers.

The clerical worker is surely entitled to adequate meal times as much as any other worker, but in many offices but scant time is allowed for lunch or for tea in a day which is often longer than a factory day.

The Government acts with considerable harshness in this respect, and breaks its own laws without compunction. In the sub-recruiting offices in the London area twenty-five minutes only is allowed for a mid-day meal, and even five minutes more taken means deduction of one hour's overtime pay. As the salaries in the Government offices are on a very low scale, deduction of any overtime pay is a serious matter to many workers. In these offices the staffs are composed chiefly of women and girls. But the Government acts in a still worse manner towards the clerical staff at the Headquarters of the London District (Horse Guards). Here the staff, which is composed of elderly civilian men and girls, is penalised for daring to eat at all. No time is allowed for a mid-day meal without deduction of overtime pay. The hours in some of the departments are from 9 to 7.30 or later, and in none are they much less. Tea-time is not allowed, but needless to say the clerks take time for tea, to keep themselves going, though they know still more overtime pay may be deducted at any time.

If the public were aware of the treatment of these workers, many of whom are economically helpless, surely it would be able to raise a sufficiently strong protest to have this wrong put right.

ISABEL BASNETT, Secretary,
Association of Women Clerks and Secretaries.

Irish Independent
16/11/16

Women Teachers.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer announced in the House of Commons on Tuesday that, after consultation with the Chief Secretary, he found that the position of women teachers in Ireland was such as to justify the payment to them of a war bonus at the same rates as in the case of men teachers. On no ground could the differentiation at first made between men and women in regard to the bonus be justified. Under the original arrangement the women teachers would have received only a paltry and almost worthless bonus. Mainly through the vigorous action of the teachers, and, particularly, owing to the strength of the case presented by the women themselves, has the grievance been remedied. In the Press also the claim of the women teachers was strongly supported. By a coincidence which will not surprise anyone who observes the devices of politicians for booming themselves, three Party organs claimed the concession as a success exclusively for Mr. Devlin. His "watchful advocacy" is belauded in the three journals in terms practically identical. We do not desire to disparage the efforts of Mr. Devlin, although he came somewhat late upon the scene, but we do think that some credit is due to the teachers themselves and to those journals which from the very first moment strenuously advocated their cause.

Glasgow Herald
Nov 27, 1916

RAILWAY WOMEN'S BONUS.

RETROSPECTIVE AGREEMENT.

Speaking at a sale of work in aid of the orphan fund of the National Union of Railwaymen, held in the Central Halls, Bath Street, Glasgow, on Saturday afternoon, Mr Albert Bellamy, president of the union, announced that negotiations were now completed with reference to the position of women in regard to the bonus demand of the railway employees. The concession to male employees, it will be remembered, was announced some time ago. Mr Bellamy reported that it had been agreed that a war bonus of 3s per week should be paid to women workers over 18 years of age. Girls under 18 years would receive a bonus of 1s 6d per week. In each case the payment of the bonus would date as from the week ending September 16. As regards the orphan fund, on behalf of which the sale of work was organised, Mr Bellamy pointed out that their liabilities were still heavy. During last quarter 152 additional children came on to the fund, and during the preceding quarter 156 additional children. It would thus be seen, he said, that war conditions were bringing extra burdens on them which they would have to prepare to meet.

Daily Mail
12-1-17

WAR GIRLS' SALARIES.

DEMAND FOR BONUS AND EQUAL PAY WITH MEN.

The girl clerks of the Munitions Department, whose comeliness aroused the envy of other Departments last year, are in revolt over their pay and war bonus. Last night a meeting held at the Fabian Hall, Tothill-street, S.W., showed that the movement had spread to all the other Government Departments and that many thousands of women are concerned.

It was stated by Mr. H. H. Elvin, general secretary of the National Union of Clerks, that the rate for senior women clerks in the Departments is 30s. a week and for senior men 40s. a week. The men receive 4s. a week war bonus and the women 2s. The present demand is for the full bonus to be given to men and women alike and for its payment to be made retrospective as from September 1915, when the first demand was made. The women are also asking for equal pay for equal work with the men.

"There are women in this room," said Mr. Elvin, "who have to teach men their duties but are in receipt of lower salaries than their pupils."

A special committee was appointed to organise the girl clerks and to arrange for the demands being brought before the special Arbitration Tribunal that has been set up.

Reynolds Newspaper
18/2/17

No settlement having been reached concerning the Kirkcaldy textile workers' demand for a rise of 5s. for men and 2s. 6d. for women, a strike is almost inevitable.

Evening News
2.3.17

BOOT AND SHOE TRADE WAGES.

Boot and shoe operatives are asking for a bonus of 15s. weekly for adult males, 7s. 6d. for youths and women, and 3s. 9d., for boys and girls instead of the present war bonus.

Electricity 9.3.17

Accrington.—At a meeting of the Electricity and Tramways Committee on March 1, a letter was read from the Secretary of the Lancashire District Council of the Amalgamated Association of Tramway Workers, making application for the payment of a war bonus of 6s. 6d. per week to females employed as conductors and in the shed. The Committee decided that the question of advance in wages and the payment of war bonus having been referred by the Amalgamated Association of Tramway Workers and this Corporation to the Committee on Production for arbitration, and such Committee having by their award, dated January 3, 1917, expressly decided to make no changes in the wages or war bonus at present being paid to females, this Committee cannot depart from the terms of the award.

Tramway & Railway World
24.3.17

Women Conductors Claim the War Bonus.—The women conductors in fourteen towns in Lancashire and Cheshire have applied for a war bonus of 6s. 6d. a week, the amount recently awarded men employees by the Committee on Production. So far the women have received no favourable response to their application, and they have therefore sent in notices to cease work on April 10. The matter is to be brought to the notice of the Committee on Production.

Electrician
30.3.17

Tramway Women's Wages.—In Lancashire and Cheshire the women tramway workers are demanding an increased war bonus varying from 2s. or 3s. to 6s. 6d. per week, and formal notice has been given of intention to cease work at the end of the month unless the demand is granted by the tramway authorities.

Manchester Guardian
22.3.17

66

62a

TRAMWAY WOMEN.

A THREAT TO STRIKE.

Some thousands of women workers, including about eight or nine hundred in Manchester and Salford, are affected by a notice of the Amalgamated Association of Tramway and Vehicle Workers that their labour will be withdrawn at the end of the present month. On February 10 the officials of the Association requested practically all of the tramway authorities in Lancashire and Cheshire to place the women workers on the same terms as the men by increasing their war bonus—which in most cases is either 2s. or 3s. a week—to 6s. 6d. a week. The request was refused, and on March 11 formal notices of the intention of the women to cease work at the end of the month were sent to the authorities concerned. Both the Board of Trade and the Committee on Production have been notified, but so far have made no move beyond a formal acknowledgment of the notification.

In an interview with a representative of the "Manchester Guardian" yesterday Mr. T. Neafsey, president of the Amalgamated Association, said that nobody regretted the present position more than the officials of the Association, but they had done all they could to induce the local authorities to carry out the promises they made when the Association agreed to women being employed on the tramcars and in the depots and had failed. "It is unfortunate," he continued, that instead of being run by corporation committees our tramway undertakings are left to the control of a federation of managers and chairmen who are acting together in these matters. The refusals we have had have been couched in similar terms. This federation is of quite recent establishment. We have no objection to dealing with such a federation, of course, but much trouble might be saved if they would adopt our suggestion to establish a wages board, consisting of delegates from both sides, to which all disputes could be referred.

The Same Terms as Men.

"The reason for the application," Mr. Neafsey continued, "is that the most definite promise was given that the women should be placed on terms identical with those of the men. By making the women wait twelve months before getting the first advance under the sliding scale the tramway authorities have been saving money, for the men who have gone to the war would have been getting maximum rates. There is no reason why the men should be receiving a 6s. 6d. war bonus and the women substantially less for the same work. As compared with before the war the work is heavier, for owing to the shortness of labour the cars are more loaded and the takings per car mile are greater."

The attitude of the tramway authorities appears to be that since the Committee on Production considered the application in January and decided to make no change no new circumstances have arisen to justify an increase in the bonus to women.

Electrical Review
13.4.17

Lancashire.—FEMALE EMPLOYES AND BONUS.—Considerable interest will attach to the forthcoming decision of the Committee on Production, concerning the application made on behalf of the female tramway employés for a 6s. 6d. war bonus to 14 Lancashire and Cheshire undertakings. The application was made on the grounds that where women were doing men's work they should be paid men's wages, and that the increased cost of living had made the bonus necessary. On behalf of the authorities it was pointed out that the average wage paid to tramway women was considerably higher than the average rate for women operatives; that many of the women were in receipt of separation allowances, and that if the bonus was granted, the cost would fall on the rates.

Railway News
14-4-17

662a/37 662a

horses and tractors for the use of the armies, the loading and unloading of trucks has become much slower, and great congestion has resulted at the stations and on the lines. A further interesting factor is that "not every substitute metal has been able to resist the effects of the long spell of cold weather." The expenditure in connection with the renewal and repair of the rolling stock, which before the war had averaged £11,800,000, rose to £13,400,000 in 1914, £13,450,000 in 1915, £15,350,000 in 1916, and is estimated to reach £21,450,000 in 1917. In 1914, 1,260 new engines had to be acquired: in 1915, 1,711; in 1916, 1,658; and for 1917, 1,854 have been ordered, together with 21,000 trucks. The intention of the Prussian Railway Administration to abolish the first class has called forth an emphatic protest in the Upper House of the Diet, where Count Mirbach used the following characteristic arguments: "Such a measure will be a heavy blow for many people, who would find it extremely disagreeable to travel if they had no first class. Nor is it in the interests of the railway that the rich and the well-to-do should travel by motor car even more than they used to."

RAILWAY EMPLOYES' WAGES: THE NEW AGREEMENT.

An agreement was on 12 April come to between the Railway Executive Committee and the various trade unions representative of railwaymen, under which the war bonus granted to male employés of eighteen years of age and upwards is to be increased from 10s. to 15s. per week, and from 5s. to 7s. 6d. per week in the case of lads. The terms of the agreement are as follows:—

(a) That the war bonus now paid by the railway companies under agreements in September last shall be increased as follows: Employés, eighteen years of age and upwards, 5s. per week additional war bonus; employés under eighteen (except boys engaged since 1 January, 1915, at rates of pay which exceed by 7s. 6d. or more rates usually paid to boys occupying positions similar to those in which such newly-engaged boys are working), 2s. 6d. per week, provided that the weekly amount of any increase in the rates of wages or bonus which may have been given to any grade of employé on any railway by any arbitration since the agreement of September last was concluded, shall be treated as part of the additional war bonus now agreed to be given.

(b) That the war bonus paid to female employés under the agreement made in November last shall be increased if eighteen years of age or over, by 2s. 6d. per week; under eighteen years of age, 1s. 3d. per week, provided that the war bonus is not to be given to females not wholly occupied in railway duties such as wives or relatives of railway employés in gatehouse and receiving an acknowledgment for attending to the gate.

(c) That an employé working on Sunday and having been available for duty on the previous six week days shall receive for each Sunday turn an allowance of one-sixth of the amount of addition to the weekly bonus under this settlement.

(d) That the first payment of the revised bonus shall be in respect of the week commencing 9 April, 1917.

(e) That the truce entered into between the General Managers Committee and representatives of Trade Unions, 1 October, 1914, continue in force.

THE SECOND AGREEMENT.

The parties to the second agreement were the Railway Executive Committee and representatives of the Railway Shops' Organisation, the Committee of Crafts Unions, and the National Union of Railwaymen. The terms of the agreement were that the war bonus now granted shop employés be increased in the case of male employés of eighteen and upwards by 5s. per week; under eighteen, 2s. 6d. Female employés, eighteen and upwards, 2s. 6d.; under eighteen, 1s. 3d. per week. That the war bonus be not paid in any shop employés who are in receipt of recognised list rates of wages and who may benefit under the terms of the award issued by the Committee on Production on 1 March last, upon an application made to them by the engineering and foundry trades. The first payment of revised bonus to be in respect of week commencing 9 April.

This settlement was arrived at as the result of an adjourned conference held at St. Pancras Hotel on 12 April, and following upon conferences which took place last week. The Railway Executive Committee were represented by Sir Herbert Walker, K.C.B. (Acting Chairman of the Railway Executive Committee, and general manager of the London and South-Western Railway), Mr. Frank Potter (general manager of the Great Western Railway), Mr. I. T. Williams (acting general manager of the London and North-Western Railway), Mr. Tatlow (acting general manager of the Midland Railway), Mr. Matheson (general manager of the Caledonian Railway), and Mr. A. Watson (superintendent of the line of the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway). As on former occasions, Mr. W. Clower acted as secretary. The trade unions with which the agreement was made were the National Union of Railwaymen and the Associated Society of Locomotive Engineers and Firemen. In the present case, however, a second agreement has been entered into as the result of direct negotiations between the Railway Executive Committee and representatives of the Railway Shops Organisation Committee of Craft Unions and the National Union of Railwaymen. This has reference to workshop employés, and provides for the payment of a corresponding increase in the war bonus to that granted to railwaymen proper.

It will be seen, therefore, that the new agreements are of very wide application. In fact, practically the only sections of the employés who are not specifically dealt with are clerks and supervisory grades, to whom, however, we have no doubt the bonus will be voluntarily extended. The addition to the railway wages bill will be not less than £6,000,000 per annum, making with the war bonus already granted an increase of not less than £18,000,000 per annum as compared with the year 1913. It has been officially stated that the Railway Executive Committee undertook the negotiations at the request and on behalf of the Government, and, therefore, the expense involved will be included in the railway companies' working expenditure as a charge to be borne by the Government.

THE 1915 BONUSES.

It will be recalled that the first war bonus was granted in February, 1915, to male employés of eighteen years of age and upwards, and was at the rate 3s. per week in the case of men whose wages were less than 30s. per week, and 2s. per week to those whose wages were 30s. or more per week. In June, 1915, a war bonus of 1s. 6d. per week was granted to lads. In October, 1915, the bonus to male employés of eighteen years of age and over was increased to 5s. per week, and to 2s. 6d. per week in the case of lads, whilst in September last it was advanced to 10s. per week in the case of men, and to 5s. per week in that of lads. These amounts were granted to employés embraced in the Conciliation Scheme, i.e., those concerned in the manipulation of traffic.

THE CRAFT UNIONS.

As regards the Craft Unions, it is understood that, with certain exceptions, the first war bonus was very generally extended to railway shopmen, but was subsequently converted into an advance of wages, the amount ultimately fixed either voluntarily or by reference to the Committee on Production being 4s. per week and 12½ per cent. on piece work prices. In September last, however, when the war bonus to railwaymen was increased from 5s. to 10s. per week, a war bonus of 5s. was also granted to the workshop staff, and, as already stated, the Craft Unions, through the medium of the Railway Shops Organisation Committee, have now negotiated with the Railway Executive Committee, and will participate in the further extension. The general position of the Craft Unions is that men of eighteen years of age and upwards will now receive a war bonus of 10s. per week, in addition to the 4s. advance of wages and corresponding increase of piece work prices referred to above.

It may be of interest to place on record a statement of the Craft Unions who are parties to the Railway Shops Organisation Committee, and, therefore, to the new agreement with the Railway Executive Committee, as well as those who are parties to the agreement with the Engineering Employers Federation and the recent award of the Committee on Production, to which we referred in our last issue. The particulars are as follows:—

662a

TRADE UNIONS INCLUDED IN RAILWAY SHOPS' ORGANISATION COMMITTEE OF CRAFT UNIONS.

Name.	No. of Members, December, 1913.
Amalgamated Society of Engineers	161,055
Steam Engine Makers' Society	16,000
United Machine Workers' Association	9,944
United Kingdom Society of Amalgamated Smiths and Strikers	7,765
United Journeyman Brassfounders, Turners, Fitters, etc., Association	5,933
National Brass Workers and Metal Mechanics ...	12,947
Electrical Trades Union	7,272
Associated Blacksmiths' and Ironworkers' Society ...	7,903
Society of Amalgamated Toolmakers	11,488
United Patternmakers' Association	8,477
Friendly Society of Ironfounders	26,279
Amalgamated Machine, Engine, and Iron Grinders' and Glaziers' Society	752
Operative Stonemasons	11,204
Scottish Painters	5,592
Ship Constructors and Shipwrights	26,719
Amalgamated Farriers	2,347
Amalgamated Furnishing Trades	15,707
United Kingdom Coachmakers	12,377
Boilermakers and Iron Shipbuilders	66,288
Amalgamated Carpenters and Joiners	80,927
Amalgamated Painters	30,158
Sheet Metal Workers	2,351
Amalgamated Wood-cutting Machinists	8,625
Railway Vehicle Builders	3,248
British Steel Smelters	34,795
Associated Plumbers	12,923
Saddlers and General Leather Workers	733
Amalgamated Moulders
Locomotive Engineers and Firemen	52,200
Amalgamated Cabinetmakers	3,137
General Union of Carpenters and Joiners	8,733
West of Scotland Brass Turners
Total	640,449

TRADE UNIONS PARTIES TO THE AWARD OF THE COMMITTEE ON PRODUCTION OF MARCH, 1917, IN THE CASE OF THE ENGINEERING AND FOUNDRY TRADES.

Name.	No. of Members, December, 1913.
Amalgamated Society of Engineers	161,055
Steam Engine Makers' Society	16,000
United Machine Workers' Association	9,944
United Kingdom Society of Amalgamated Smiths and Strikers	7,765
United Journeyman Brassfounders, Turners, Fitters, etc., Association	5,933
National Brass Workers and Metal Mechanics ...	12,947
Electrical Trades Union	7,272
Associated Blacksmiths' and Ironworkers' Society ...	7,903
Society of Amalgamated Toolmakers	11,488
United Patternmakers' Association	8,477
Scientific Instrument Makers' Society	1,902
Friendly Society of Ironfounders	26,279
Amalgamated Society of Core-makers	2,527
Iron, Steel, and Metal Dressers' Trade Society ...	1,990
Amalgamated Machine, Engine, and Iron Grinders and Glaziers' Society	752
National Amalgamated Union of Enginemen, Firemen, Mechanics, Motormen, and Electrical Workers ...	16,209
Dock, Wharf, Riverside, and General Workers' Union	51,755
National Amalgamated Union of Labour	60,003
National Union of General Workers
Workers' Union	91,000
Total	501,861

FEMALE EMPLOYES.

It will be noted that the new agreement grants to female employés an increase in the war bonus of 2s 6d. in the case of women of eighteen years of age and upwards, and one-half that amount to girls under eighteen years of age, provided that the war bonus will not be given to women who are not wholly occupied in railway duties. To make the matter clear, it is necessary to recall that when women began to be employed by the railway companies, in order to release men for service with the Colours, the trade unions pressed for an understanding as to the rate of wages they were to receive, the result of meetings held in July and August, 1915, a memorandum was placed on record setting out that an assurance was asked for, and given, that the employment of women in capacities in which they had not formerly been employed was an emergency provision arising out of the circumstances created by the war, and would not prejudice in any way any undertaking given by the railway companies as to the re-employment of men who had joined the Colours on the conclusion of the war, the pay of women employed in grades in which they were not engaged prior to August, 1914, to be the minimum pay of the grade. Although not specifically stated, it was understood that women would not be granted the war bonus. Last year, however, application agreement was arrived at in November, 1916, providing for the payment of a war bonus to female employés in grades in which they were not employed prior to August, 1914, of 3s. per week in the case of women of eighteen years of age and over, and 1s. 6d. per week to those under eighteen years of age, with a proviso that if an employé had already received either a war bonus or an increase of wages which raised her rate of pay to an amount in excess of the minimum rate for her grade, the war bonus was to be such a sum as was necessary to make up the total weekly increase of 3s. for adults and 1s. 6d. for juniors. The women, therefore, will now receive 5s. 6d. per week and the juniors 2s. 9d. per week.

SUNDAY DUTY.

A clause in the agreement with the National Union of Railwaymen and the Associated Society of Locomotive Engineers and Firemen which will be noted with some interest is that which provides that an employé who works on Sunday and who has been available for duty on the previous six week days shall receive for such Sunday duty an allowance of one-sixth the amount of the addition made to the weekly bonus under the settlement. In other words, men who qualify for the full bonus during the week and who work on Sunday will be paid an additional sum of 10d.

We understand that this represents a compromise between the negotiating parties upon an application that men who work on Sunday should receive pro rata payment of the war bonus. Any such arrangement, however, would be at variance with the whole basis on which the war bonus has been granted, viz., that it has been conceded to all men alike to enable them to meet the increased cost of living, and is not proportionate either to their weekly rate of wages or to any variation between the different grades in the standard hours of duty.

"TRUCE" AGREEMENT.

The "truce" agreement entered into at the meeting between the General Managers' Committee and representatives of the National Union of Railwaymen and the Associated Society of Locomotive Engineers and Firemen on 1 October, 1914, is to continue in force. This "truce" provides that, notwithstanding the notice to determine the Conciliation Scheme, it was to remain in operation, and that the men's side of the Boards on each of the several railway companies should continue to act. Further, that all existing contracts and conditions of service were to remain in operation, and that no agreements should be made by the companies either with deputations or Conciliation Boards during the suspensory period.

As in the case of the last agreement, there is no clause as to the duration of the settlement. No doubt this is the result of the experience of the railway companies in regard to the non-observance of the pledge given by the trade unions in October, 1915, when they undertook not to present any fresh demands for an increase of bonus or wages, nor to give countenance or support either to a demand on the part of any of their members to reopen the settlement or to any strike that might be entered into in furtherance of such a demand.

MR. J. H. THOMAS' VIEWS.

Mr. J. H. Thomas, M.P., who left a sick bed to attend the conference, said after the proceedings, "While it is true that we did not secure all we asked, it is true to say that, in my judgment, it is a good settlement, and one which I have no hesitation in feeling will be accepted by the men. My message to the railwaymen is, 'accept the position, as I am sure you will, and continue to keep in mind, as you have done all through, the good work you are doing in the national interest.'"

Tramway & Railway World
14-4-17

LANCASHIRE WOMEN'S DEMAND.

Deputations representing the Lancashire Tramway authorities and the Amalgamated Association of Tramway and Vehicle Workers attended before the Committee on Production on April 3, in reference to the demand of the Lancashire women tramway workers for a war bonus of 6s. 6d. per week, which has been awarded to the men and is to be included in any further advance or war bonus granted to the men. The matter was submitted to arbitration last December, and the Committee on Production then awarded the men 6s. 6d., but decided that the women's wages should remain as they were. The women are receiving the same wages as the men, with the exception of a war bonus, and the average for twelve months' service is 30s. a week. They are practically all conductors and cleaners, only four being drivers. The committee consisted of Sir George Gibb, Sir George Askwith, and Sir David Harrel, and in re-opening the question they exercised their power under the Munitions Act. The application was opposed by representatives of tramway committees or companies from the following towns:—Accrington, Ashton, Bolton, Bury, Birkenhead, Manchester, Oldham, Oldham, Ashton, and Hyde Tramway Companies, Preston, Rochdale, Salford, Stockport, Stalybridge, Hyde, Moseley, and Dukinfield Joint Board, Warrington, and Wigan. Mr. Jeeves, barrister, appeared for the Corporations not represented. Officials of the union represented the employees. In opposing the application Mr. Jeeves said, that the women were in an entirely different position from the men, who were practically all married and had far more responsibility. It was imperative for the undertakings to resist the demand, as they were already in a difficult position owing to the cost of the war allowances to dependents, the increased cost of materials, and the Board of Trade prohibition of increasing fares above a penny a mile. If the bonus was granted the cost would fall upon the rates. The Committee reserved their decision, which will be announced next week.

For the women the contention was advanced that they were doing the work of men and should receive equal pay, and that owing to the increased cost of living the bonus is necessary for their maintenance.

Electrician
20-4-17

Women Tramway Workers' Bonus.—The Committee on Production has awarded a war bonus of 3s. 6d. a week to the women tramway workers employed by Lancashire and Cheshire Corporations and private tramway companies as conductors, trolley girls and cleaners, but those under 18 years of age only get 2s. a week.

The Manchester and Salford conductors had already been granted a war bonus of 2s. and the trolley girls of 1s., and the demand made by the workers' organisation was for a war bonus of 6s. 6d., which would place the women workers on the same rates as men. The Blackburn Corporation is the only Lancashire authority to give a war bonus of 6s. 6d. to men and women tramway workers.

There are between 4,000 and 5,000 workers concerned, and the towns involved in the award are as follows: Manchester, Salford, Rochdale, Oldham, Stalybridge Accrington, Ashton-under-Lyne, Birkenhead, Bolton, Bury, Hyde, Preston, Mossley, Dukinfield, Stockport, Warrington and Wigan. The award operates from the beginning of the first full pay week after March 12.

Tramway & Railway World
21-4-17

Women Drivers; Two Grades for Conductors.—In reporting to Newport Corporation on the unjustifiable strike of many of the tramways employees against women drivers, Councillor J. Moxon, chairman of the Tramways Committee, stated that the undertaking was still short of motormen although the manager had advertised far and near for discharged soldiers. Nothing like a sufficient number could be obtained and they would have to consider the question of the further employment of women drivers. The Ministry of Munitions had complained of the employees losing time and not conveying the war workers to the factories in time. The committee had now received further instructions from the Ministry of Munitions to further dilute labour by the employment of women. It had been suggested to them that women should now be classed into two grades, and they hoped by giving higher wages to get efficient women conductors and get rid of those who were inefficient. The council adopted the report. At Blackpool the Tramways committee have hitherto been opposed to women drivers, but in view of the departure of motormen for the army they have agreed to Mr. C. Furness, the general manager, training a number of women at once, in order to deal with the increased tramway traffic required in the summer. There is no lack of applicants.

Tramway & Railway World 21-4-17

662a
662a/38

BONUS AWARDED TO TRAMWAY WOMEN.

As a result of the rehearing of the application of the women tramway employees of Lancashire and Cheshire to be granted the war bonus of 6s. 6d. per week allowed to the men, the Committee on Production issued on April 13 the appended award: "From the beginning of the first full pay week after March 12, 1917, such further increase shall be given as will bring the advance already given since the outbreak of war, whether by way of permanent increase of wages, or war rate, or war bonus, up to 3s. 6d. per week in the case of women of 18 years of age and over, and to 2s. per week in the case of girls under 18 years of age, such further advance to be regarded as war bonus and recognised as due to and dependent on the existence of the abnormal conditions now prevailing in consequence of the war."

The Manchester and Salford conductors having already received 2s., and trolley girls 1s., will be entitled to an extra 1s. 6d. or 1s. according to their grade.

The towns affected by the award are Manchester, Salford, Rochdale, Oldham, Stalybridge, Accrington, Ashton-under-Lyne, Birkenhead, Bolton, Bury, Hyde, Preston, Mossley, Dukinfield, Stockport, Warrington, and Wigan.

John Bull
5-5-17

Without question, some of the women war workers are badly treated. The matter has been raised by us before, and a factory near Sheffield provides another illustration. If a woman loses one day's work here, they stop on the next pay-day all her overtime and war bonus, "to the tune of sometimes 12s." It goes without saying that, in similar circumstances, men would not stand that sort of treatment—if the firm tried it on with them, the whole factory would stop pretty soon.

Yorkshire Observer
30-6-17.

The Halifax Town Council will be asked on Wednesday by a special committee to increase the war bonus of all female employees of the Corporation, other than those engaged in the education, tramways, and health departments, from 2s. to 4s. per week as from April 1 last.

Liverpool Evening Express. 22-12-16

BIG WAR BONUS SCHEME.

SLIDING SCALE ON THE COST OF LIVING.

A war bonus agreement which, as an example, may have far-reaching effects in the present changing phases of industrialism was reached yesterday in Manchester.

By the agreement the war bonuses of approximately 60,000 miscellaneous workers in Lancashire, Cheshire, and Derbyshire will in future be regulated on a sliding scale reviewed every three months according to the Board of Trade figures as to the cost of living. It is the first attempt on a large scale to adopt a scientific method of regulating wages according to the cost of living.

Briefly, the scheme is that when the Board of Trade figure for the increased cost of living is 75 per cent. (which was the figure when negotiations began) the war grant for all males of 18 years and upwards shall be 4d. per hour, for females 18 and upwards 2½d., for males and females of 16 and under 18 2d., and for workers under 16 1½d. Every three months a joint committee will meet, and on the basis of the last published figure of the Board of Trade will alter the rate of war grant in proportion to the rise or fall. An exact schedule of variations based on rises and falls of 1 per cent. has been prepared, and by this means both employers and workers will be able to reckon their new scale of war wages as altered at each quarterly review.

The agreement remains in force for a period of twelve months (or until the declaration of peace if that event takes place earlier) and is terminable by three months' notice from either side. It embraces practically all classes of workers in the industry except mechanics and others engaged in the maintenance and repair of plant, machine printers, etc., whose war earnings are already fixed under agreement.

Yorkshire Observer
21-9-17.

BRADFORD CORPORATION WOMEN EMPLOYEES' BONUS.

An application from 1,400 women employees has been presented to the committees of the various departments of the Bradford City Council asking for an early revision of the scale of bonus at present being paid to them, and that the present and any future scale of bonus operating for men shall apply equally to women. Facts and figures in support of this have also been submitted.

A deputation of women from the Council of Municipal Women Employees waited on the Bradford and District Trades and Labour Council last night to ask for their support. It was urged that the cost of living was the same for women as for men, and yet the women only got a 6s. bonus while the men got 12s. The Council unanimously decided to support the application.

Leicester Post
24.-9.-17.

WAR BONUS AND ALLOWANCES.

Women Tram Conductors & Engineers

The Special Committee of the Council appointed to go into the question will report that after laying all the circumstances before Sir George Askwith and obtaining from him a letter with reference to the war bonus to be paid to women conductors in the employ of the Leicester Town Council, they are of opinion there is no alternative but to pay women conductors the war bonus at the rate of 12s. per week, the same as the men. The increased cost involved in the payment of the additional 2s. a week to the women conductors is estimated at £1,128 per annum.

An award having been made by the Committee on Production that men employed in engineering and foundry trades shall receive 3s. a week advance from August 1st to assist in meeting the increased cost of living, applications have been made by Corporation workmen in these employments for the further advance on the award, and the committee recommend that the addition be allowed. The estimated annual cost in respect of 174 men in the Sanitary, Gas, War and Tramways Departments is £1,357 4s.

Engineer 21-12-17

BONUSES, on account of the increased cost of living in France, at the rate of 1f. per day, have been granted to female workers earning less than 9f., and 50 centimes per day for female workers earning from 9f. to 12f. daily. Specially skilled workers wili receive a minimum wage of 70 centimes per hour. The wages of specialised female workers, which had not previously formed the subject of a special scale, have now been laid down, and will be, broadly, the same as those of men equally skilled. Male workers earning less than 10f. aer day will have a bonus of 1.50f. per day to cover increased cost of living. This bonus will be 1f. per day for workers earning from 10f. to 12f. daily, and 50 centimes for those earning from 12f. to 15f. This ministerial decision secures, for the lowest paid workmen, a wage of 9f. 50 centimes per day, and for female workers of the same category 7.50f. per day the day covering 10 hours in each case. The award is to date from 1st September last, and holds till April 30th next.

WAGES IN THE HARNESS FURNITURE TRADE.

Application for a Ten per Cent. Increase.

AND "TIME AND A QUARTER" FOR OVERTIME.

Local Union's Annual Meeting.

At the annual meeting of the Harness and Saddlery Furniture Trades Association, held at the Co-operative Hall on Tuesday evening, it was decided that application should be made for a 10 per cent. increase in wages and for time and quarter pay for overtime.

The President (Mr. W. Duck) occupied the chair, supported by Mr. J. Taylor, of Dudley (secretary of the Midland Counties Trades Federation), Mrs. A. Lowin, of London (Women Workers' Federation), Messrs. C. J. Wright (secretary), W. Thornley and H. Newby (auditors), W. Bentley, J. Matthews, Kirby, Purcock, and others.

A SOUND POSITION.

The Chairman said that when they started the union five years ago, they were pooh-poohed, and it was prophesied that the association would die a natural death in a short time, but at the present time they were not only still alive, but in a sound position. They had met with success all along the line, and the workers in the trade were better off than they had ever been. To cite only one instance, it was well known that the spring hook makers had for years been working for very low wages. About eight months ago, however, they were organised and joined the society, with the result that to-day they were enjoying a 20 per cent. increase in their wages. Such success fully justified the society's existence, and other instances could be given of the good work accomplished. Through their efforts the polishing shops had been made better and brighter, and fans had been provided to give proper ventilation. It behoved all the men, and especially the younger ones, to take an interest in the society. (Hear, hear.)

Numerical and Financial Progress.

The Secretary presented his annual report, which stated:—

"Both in members and finance there has been great headway made during the year, the members themselves having, on the whole, taken a greater interest in their society, an improvement which it is hoped will be continued during the coming year, thus strengthening the hands of our officials in the work which they are doing on your behalf. If we take a brief survey of the work done, and improvements brought about, both in wages and conditions, during the year, one finds it very difficult to understand how any sensible-minded man can remain outside the ranks of the trade union movement. As is well known, we opened the year in a struggle that was unique in the history of trade unionism in the Midlands. Happily, this struggle was brought to a close in the second week of the year, after lasting forty-three weeks, during which time the society stood close to the men as the men stood close to the society, backed up by the whole of its members. There have been several other struggles during the year, when we have been compelled to withdraw our men and advise them to cease work in order to obtain what was considered just on their behalf, same only lasting a matter of a few days, and in no case extending over a week, but in every case ending in the demands of the men being met. I very much regret that in one instance, after we had had considerable trouble and work in organising the men employed at one of the firms, and gaining for them an increase of 10 per cent. on their wages, that they should be so careless of lines. Our advice to our members over twenty-one years of age is that they should refuse to work with any fresh hands brought into their shops under this rate. We have had during the year a considerable number of our old members come back again into the trade and the society, who have been charged various amounts as re-entrance fees ranging from five shillings up to as much as fifty shillings, according to what was considered warranted, taking into account each individual case on its merits. Another item of interest during the year was the conference of the Midland Counties Trades Federations, and while I am dealing with this I must take this opportunity of again expressing the thanks of myself and committee for the very able help and advice which we always seem to look forward to on any matter we have to decide, and up to now have never done so in vain. This especially applies to the Secretary, Mr. John Taylor, J.P., who I know has very often, at great sacrifice and trouble to himself, put himself at our disposal.

Workers and the War.

Referring to the war, the report stated: "England never was engaged in a more just struggle, and while we are trade unionists we must also remember we are Britishers, a fact that some of the capitalist and financing classes appear to have overlooked. I look upon the struggle as a fight against militarism, and, while our union has kept loyally to their pledges on the matter, I am afraid some of the so-called upper classes have not, but are seeking to make profit out of the workers by increasing the cost of the necessities of life. There can be no one-sided truce of this character, and unless the Government immediately take some drastic measures in order to right this evil, then I for one, say that the workers have only one course open to them—that is to demand an increase on their wages equivalent to the increased cost of living. As workers, we are prepared to bear our share of the cost of the war, but for the life of me I cannot see why we should bear the share of the capitalist, who would have the most to lose should we fail to come out victorious. Further, we can look with pleasure on the stand trade unionists have made on behalf of just pensions to our soldiers and sailors, who are doing their duty so well, and their dependents—never was such just treatment as is now recognised, solely brought about by the workers of this country on behalf of their own class themselves.

One Hundred Members with the Colours.

"We are proud of the noble sacrifices being made by the workers in this fight, which includes in their ranks a matter of 100 of our members. Your committee have decided that the contributions of [illegible] members shall be paid while [illegible] with the colours, which means that in case any of them should be laid low their dependents will be paid the benefits due to them; and if they return, which we hope they will, they will be enabled to resume their places in our ranks in the same position as when they went away. Again, your committee and officials have been in constant touch with the officials of all the other unions in the district, who are gradually being brought closer together under the auspices of the Walsall Trades Council, who must be given praise for the work which they are doing on behalf of the working classes generally, together with the Workers' War Committee. In conclusion, may I be allowed to refer to the insurance section of the Midland Counties Trades Federation, who, if not already, very soon will, I hope become an approved society itself. I think that our members will agree that their interests in this direction is a matter in which the trade union movement can render them a lot of assistance, in seeing that they have all and every benefit it is possible for them to obtain from it. At present the majority of our members are taking their benefits through their union, and we think that this could be greatly extended."

Balance of £400.

The statement of accounts showed that the income amounted to £1,200 6s. 6½d., made up as follows:—From Members: Entrance fees, £104 5s. 6d.; contributions, £987 6s. 0d.; levies, £11 13s. 0d.; fines, £2 1s. 0d. Received from other Societies [illegible]

when the war was

An Appeal to Workers.

Mr. Taylor said the workers probably would not mind whether it was a war bonus or not so long as they got it. The committee had considered this question of an advance, and, seeing that in other trades increases of wages had been obtained in consequence of the excessively high cost of living, they believed that similar concessions should be obtained for those in the harness furniture trade. The advance would cover all sections of the trade except spring hook makers, who recently had a 20 per cent. increase. As regarded the higher rate for overtime, that matter had never before been considered in their industry, and it was difficult to see why they should not enjoy the same privilege as those in other trades in which no greater skill was required. Fifty-four hours a week should be the limit for ordinary time. In other trades time and a half was paid for Sunday work, and he considered that those who worked on Saturday afternoons were entitled to the same consideration. If this application were successful, he hoped the men would give no cause for complaints by losing time. One of the reasons urged against advances of wages was that some men who were earning more money than usual neglected their work through drink. That, he knew, only applied to a few—the majority were sober, and took care of the money they earned—but, unfortunately, it was the few who brought condemnation on the others, and made it difficult to obtain the benefits to which they were entitled. "I ask you to see to it that there shall be women would be taking work formerly done by men. There were instances of that in Walsall to-day, and the women got about a third of the price that had been paid to the men. That was the fault of the men, who, while having an organisation of their own, had never troubled about the women. The resolution was carried unanimously.

Election of Officers.

The following were elected as officers for the ensuing year:—President, Mr. Duck; vice-president, Mr. Bentley; treasurer, Mr. Wilkes; secretary, Mr. Wright; money steward, Mr. W. Scott; auditor, Mr. Newby; trustee, Mr. Kirby.

Medals to Workers.

The Chairman said he had been asked to suggest to the Secretary that he should make an application, on behalf of the men engaged in Government work, for the medals which were to be distributed.

Fliers' Wages.

In reply to Mr. Matthews, the Secretary said that an application had been made to Mr. Eglington to bring the wages of fliers up to the standard. He had stated that he could not agree to that, but he was willing to refer the matter to the Employers' Association, a course to which the workers' representatives had agreed. Mr. Eglington had raised the wages of his polishers to, and in some instances above, the standard, but so far he had not taken a similar course with regard to the fliers. They had written to the Secretary of the Employers' Association, but as yet no arrange a conference, but as soon as they replied. An application would also be made on behalf of the piece-workers.

The meeting concluded with a vote of [illegible] the Chairman.

their own interests as to allow their membership to lapse, and, while wishing them no harm, I am sadly afraid their loss will be greater than ours.

Twenty per Cent. Increase for Spring Hook Makers.

"Another matter for congratulation is the spring hook trade, which, for some considerable time, has been in a sad state of disorganisation. Efforts were made to bring them together, which were successful, and, upon the men becoming full financial members, an application for an increase in their wages was made, and, after a series of negotiations with the employers in their trade, we were successful in gaining for them an increase of 20 per cent. on present wages, commencing with a 10 per cent. on November 30, 1914, with a definite agreement for a further 10 per cent. on March 1, 1915. Thus, in a few months, by combination, we have accomplished what the men themselves, acting individually, could not accomplish for twenty years, during which time their wages have been going down. There are several other gratifying features of the year's work, such as price lists being arranged for filing and polishing military bits, spurs, and stirrups, to which has been added 10 per cent., and also military hame forging, filing and polishing; and, although we have not secured all that we thought we were entitled to, it must be admitted that they have been a big improvement on what has been paid in the trade generally. Again, efforts have been made to bring up the lower-paid men, taking as a minimum 6d. per hour plus 10 per cent., as the rock bottom price which a man should work for. At one firm alone this meant an increase on the average wages of forty men of 4s. 6d. per week each. At the time of writing, negotiations are in progress with another firm on the same ties: Strike-pay, Midland Counties Trades Federation, £5 5s.; grants, re Withers' strike, £27 12s. 9d.; Loan to Insurance Committee returned, £30; Insurance Committee (for rent, gas, and other expenses), £9 17s. 11d.; Lockmakers' Society, re out-of-work pay, £2 0s. 6d.; cash in hand January 1, 1914, £27 16s. 3d.; bank interest, 18s. 1d. The expenditure was as follows:—Strike pay, £60 3s. 6d.; out-of-work pay, £62 1s. 3d.; deaths, £16 10s.; special grants, £21 15s.; payments to other societies (including £182 14s. 7d. to Midland Counties Trades Federation), £193 15s. 1d.; management expenses (including £112 10s. secretary's salary and £78 12s. 11d. shop collectors' salaries), £255 4s. 3½d.; printing, stationery, and postages, £45 7s. 7d.; meetings, deputations, and conferences, £137 8s. 4½d.; sundry expenses, £12 15s. 5d.; total £805 0s. 6d. The balance at the end of the year was £401 6s. 0½d.

Minimum of Sixpence an Hour.

A member, referring to the suggestion that 6d. an hour should be the minimum for fresh hands over twenty-one years of age, said that at the present time some were working at from 4d. to 5½d. an hour.

The Secretary said that efforts to fix the minimum were proceeding, by dealing with each particular.

Another member asked whether the committee considered sixpence an hour was sufficient.

The Secretary replied that they did not, but for years a majority of the men had been working for considerably less, and the sixpence was agreed upon as a basis to start with. When that was recognised, they could make an effort to raise the minimum to 7d. and 8d. an hour.

A Member: Sixpence an hour is not a living wage at the present time; why not go in for 7d. at once?

The Secretary said it was a matter for the members, but if some could not yet get sixpence, what was the use of demanding sevenpence.

The Chairman: We must learn to walk before we can run.

Military Work for other Countries.

"We are doing tons of military work, and it is not for the British Government," remarked another member of the audience, who suggested that price lists should be fixed for other countries. "You know what they say," he added; "Tariff Reform—tax the foreigner."

The Secretary said that meetings had been held in this connection with a view to the drafting of a price list to cover every country so far as the stirrup trade was concerned. When that had been done, a similar course would be taken with regard to other sections of the trade.

After considerable criticism with regard to items in the statement of accounts, the report was adopted on the proposition of Mr. Purcock, seconded by Mr. Williams.

Ten per Cent. Advance.

Mr. Matthews proposed a resolution instructing the committee "to make an immediate application for a 10 per cent. advance on present wages and for time and a quarter for overtime." He said it must be admitted that the demand for such an increase was a reasonable one; indeed, was not really sufficient to meet the increased prices they had to pay for food and other necessaries. Referring to discontent among workers, the speaker said this was created by capitalists and those who formed "rings" in wheat and other commodities needed by the workers. But for such people, the workers would be more contented and have better wages.

The resolution was seconded by a member, who remarked that they did not want [illegible] cated," added Mr. Taylor, who went on to congratulate the association on the success of the past year's work. They knew something about strikes in Walsall, and he was glad to acknowledge that employers in their industry were very much wiser than they were three years ago. Employers were realising the men's organisation was conducted on reasonable, fair, and just lines. They could now meet the employers in conference and settle difficulties in a friendly spirit. That had not been possible in the past. Many societies which had been in existence much longer than theirs had not obtained such advantages for its members. The society did a great deal of good work in a quiet way, settling disputes and dealing with complaints of which those outside the particular works concerned heard nothing. That day, for instance, they had dealt with a complaint, and, as a result of their intervention, 3s. more a dozen for the making of certain articles had been obtained for the men. (Applause.)

Women Workers.

Mrs. Lewin, supporting, said she wished the advance had been one of 20 instead of 10 per cent., and that it had been for women workers as well as the men. The increased prices of food affected women as much as men, and she appealed to every man to bring the women workers in his factory shoulder to shoulder with him, so that when the men applied for advances it would be possible for the women to do the same. (Hear, hear.) It was to the interests of the men to help the women workers, because, if they were not careful, the

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

There is in the plot of "The Angelus Bell," a new play, which has been produced this week by the Repertory Company, something which is in a small way reminiscent of certain well-known romantic dramas. In this case, however, none of the royal characters has a double, and in some other respects there is not much similarity. The story concerns a princess who becomes the Queen of Sardonia, and sets convention at defiance by wedding an English soldier of fortune who holds the rank of captain in her army. There are plots to secure the throne by the Prince D'Asturios, and suspicion of treachery, both as subject and husband, are cast upon the soldier hero. But right triumphs, and instead of being banished from the country, he is proclaimed as its king. Miss Ada M. Ryder takes the part of the queen distinctly well, and Mr. John B. Shinton as the hero, Mr. Beckett Bould as the villain, and Miss Enid Ross, get through some heavy work very creditably. We have previously remarked that Mr. Bert Atherton may be relied upon to create fund out of almost any material, and this week his success merits special praise. Other parts in the cast are well sustained by Miss Poppy Lytton, Messrs. Jack Bland, H. Kenneth Barton, Norman Tracy, Ernest Regent, and Sydney Bryant.

Next week the company will present another new play, "The Maid of the Mill."

WARNING!

TO FURNITURE BUYERS.

DON'T blame WOODFIELD BROTHERS IF YOU LOSE MONEY by missing their GREAT REMOVAL SALE.

FULL PARTICULARS were given in this paper last week.

THESE ARE THE LAST DAYS, and because WOODFIELD BROTHERS are determined to remove nothing to their new premises, unheard-of bargains are to be obtained for cash or deferred payments.

WOODFIELD BROTHERS,
Complete House and Cottage Furnishers,
8 and 9, Smallbrook Street,
BIRMINGHAM.

Come To-day.

Yorkshire Observer
29. 8. 15.

DYERS' WAGES.

OFFERS OF WAR BONUSES.

CONFERENCE IN BRADFORD.

A conference representing twelve trade unions whose members are engaged in dyeing and kindred industries in Lancashire, Yorkshire, Cheshire, Derbyshire, and Scotland was held in Bradford on Saturday to consider offers of war bonuses to their workpeople by the Bradford Dyers' Association, the British Cotton and Wool Dyers' Association, and the Calico Printers' Association. It was reported that the Bradford Dyers' Association had made the following offer: Women, boys, and youths, 1s. per week; men over 20 years of age earning in any week not exceeding 28s., 3s. a week; 28s. 1d. and not exceeding 40s. a week, 2s. in such week; regardless of the basis of payment. The first payment of the grant, if accepted, will be made on the first pay day in April and continued until the last pay day in September next, but the position will be reconsidered before that time. Employees losing time on their own account (sickness excepted) may have the grant sent to their society for investigation of the circumstances, the grant to be returned to the association if the employee is found to be at fault.

It was stated that the British Cotton and Wool Dyers had agreed to make the same offer as the Bradford Dyers' Association. The Calico Printers' Association had offered a war grant as follows: All women and girls, 1s. 6d. per week irrespective of time worked or earnings received; youths under 18 years of age receiving less than 20s. a week and not engaged on men's work, 1s. 6d. a week irrespective of earnings; youths under 18 years of age engaged on work formerly done by men, whatever their rates of wages n. ? be, and all male employees over 18 years of age receiving in any week less than 20s. a week, 2s. 6d. a week; men receiving 20s. and up to 35s. a week, 2s. a week, provided their total earnings, including the grant, do not exceed 35s. a week. It was decided to leave for the present the consideration of those employees receiving over 35s. a week.

The conference on Saturday lasted for over six hours, and at the close Alderman Joseph Hayhurst (general secretary of the Amalgamated Society of Dyers) made the following official statement:—

The meeting was held to consider the offers of war grants by the Bradford Dyers' Association, the British Cotton and Wool Dyers' Association, and the Calico Printers' Association in response to our application on behalf of the workpeople employed by about 600 firms for an advance of a penny per hour for time workers and 15 per cent. on piece rates. Meetings have been arranged throughout Yorkshire, Lancashire, Cheshire, and Derbyshire, and it has been found impossible to come to a decision until these meetings have been held. The conference invited the meetings, in view of the many complications between the various associations and private firms, to give representatives full power to arrange satisfactory terms with the employers.

The meetings are to be held between now and Wednesday, and the conference will be resumed in Manchester on Wednesday next. A decision will then be arrived at based on the feeling expressed at the meetings and the circumstances attending each case. The answer will be telegraphed to the various associations, and if satisfactory the advances will come into operation next week. The feeling of the conference was that if the offers made were accepted by the men then no terms less favourable should be accepted from private firms, and failing the private firms agreeing to give similar grants as the associations the delegates felt they would be justified in advising their members to hand in a week's notice.

Manchester Courier.
1.4.15

66.

66

BLEACHERS' & DYERS' WAR BONUS.

OPERATIVES TO MAKE NEW DEMANDS.

ABORTIVE OFFERS.

WORKERS' CONFERENCE IN MANCHESTER.

Sixty thousand workers in the dyeing and bleaching trade were represented at a conference of delegates which met in Manchester yesterday to consider the offers of increased wages as a war bonus made by the Bradford Dyers' Association, the Calico Printers' Association, and the British Cotton and Wool Dyers' Association Ltd.

A conference had previously been held at Bradford (Yorkshire), when it was decided to take the opinion of the men in the various districts and to hold the further conference.

An application was made some time ago on behalf of the workpeople engaged by about 600 firms in the North of England for an advance of one penny per hour in the wages of time-workers and of 15 per cent in piece work rates. The employers in certain sections of the trade offered a graduated bonus during the continuance of the war, and this has been thoroughly discussed separately by the members of the trade unions concerned.

The final sectional meeting was held yesterday at the offices of the Bleachers and Dyers' Mutual Indemnity Co. Ltd., Cooper-street, Manchester, and it is understood that the conference was abortive, neither side being able to come to terms. The operatives are to formulate fresh proposals and submit these at another meeting to be arranged for a later date.

POSITION OF PRIVATE FIRMS.

The conference of delegates representing a dozen unions was held last evening in the clubroom of the Engravers' Society, Market-street, Manchester. The proposals of the three dyers' associations mentioned were under discussion. It is understood that the general feeling was that should a settlement be arrived at no terms less favourable should be accepted from private firms outside the association. If there is failure to reach agreement with these private firms there is every reason to fear that the workers will be recommended to tender their notices.

The unions represented by delegates were as follows: The Amalgamated Society of Dyers, Bleachers, Finishers, and Kindred Trades; the Operative Bleachers, Dyers, and Finishers Association (Bolton Amalgamation); National Society of Dyers and Finishers, Gas Workers and General Labourers Union, Stuff and Woollen Warehousemen's Union, Yeadon and District Factory Workers' Union, Bradford and Halifax Stuff Pressers Trade Union, the Leeds and Huddersfield Federated Cloth Pressers, No. 1 Makers-up Trade Sick and Burial Society, Radcliffe and District Dyers and Sizers, the Rochdale Warp Dyers, Bleachers and Sizers, and the Amalgamated Union of Engravers to Calico Printers and Paper Stainers.

The terms offered by the Bradford Dyers' Association were as follow: "(1) Women, boys and youths, 1s per week; (2) Men over 21 years of age earning in any week not exceeding 28s., 3s. in such week; earning in any week 28s. 1d. and not exceeding 40s., 2s. in such week, regardless of the basis of payment; and (3) the first payment of the grant will be made on the first pay day in April, and will be continued until the last pay day in September next, but the position will be reconsidered before that time. "It is understood that employees losing time on their own account (sickness excepted) may have this war grant sent to their society for investigation of the circumstances, such grant to be returned to the association if the employee is found to be at fault."

These terms were accepted. The offer of the British Cotton and Wool Dyers' Association was similar to that of the Bradford Dyers' Association, and this has been accepted.

CALICO PRINTERS' OFFER.

The application for one penny per hour on was similar to that of the Bradford Dyers' Association, and this has been accepted.

CALICO PRINTERS' OFFER.

The application for one penny per hour on time rates and 15 per cent on piece rates was refused by the Calico Printers' Association, who made the following offer:

1. All women and girls to be granted 1s. 6d. per week, irrespective of time or earnings received.
2. Youths under 118 years of age receiving less than 20s. per week and not engaged on men's work, a grant of 1s. 6d. per week irrespective of earnings.
3. That where youths under 18 years of age are engaged on work formerly done by men, whatever their rate of wages may be, they shall come within the operation of clause 4.
4. That all male employees over 18 years of age receiving in any week less than 20s. shall be granted 2s. 6d. per week.
5. That all those employees receiving over 20s. and up to 35s. per week shall be made a grant of 2s. per week provided the total earnings, including the grant, do not exceed 35s.
6. It was decided to leave for the present the consideration of those employees receiving over 35s. per week.

The terms were considered, and refused, with a view to a further conference.

A conference will be held this morning at eleven o'clock of the engravers to calico printers, including the Calico Printers' Association, with a view to considering the terms for the operative engravers.

The terms offered by the Yorkshire Indigo and Scarlet Colour Dyes, Ltd. and the Leeds and District Worsted Dyers' and Finishers' Association were considered and refused, and the secretary was instructed to write both firms offering counter proposals, and if these are not entertained a meeting of the employees will be held and an endeavour made to come to terms. If this is unsuccessful seven days' notice to cease work will be handed to the employers.

Both these firms, we are informed, are engaged on war contract work.

The whole conference was then adjourned until Saturday next, at three o'clock, and will be resumed at Bradford, Yorkshire.

BLEACHERS' WAR BONUS.

The Bleachers' Association Ltd. have offered a special war bonus to their employees, numbering 10,000, in Lancashire, Cheshire, Nottingham, and parts of Ireland and Scotland.

This bonus allowed all women and girls 1s. per week, and the same amount to youths under 21 years of age, all men over 21 years of age earning less than 20s. a week 3s., and those earning 20s. and under 40s. 2s. per week.

This arrangement was intended to apply to piece-workers and day-workers. It stipulated that employees losing time on their own account, except in cases of sickness, would be disqualified from receiving the bonus during that week.

"This bonus," ran the statement issued by the association, "is for the period commencing the week ending March 20th to the week ending June 26th, 1915. Before the expiration of this period the managing directors will reconsider the question further, and will reserve to themselves the right to continue, suspend, or vary the arrangement, according to circumstances."

Yorkshire Observer
10.4.15.

66-

662b

DYERS' WAGES.

FURTHER EXTENSION OF THE WAR BONUS.

A conference of representatives of dyers' trade unions was held on Saturday in Bradford to consider further replies to the demand for a war bonus on behalf of 60,000 workpeople in Yorkshire, Lancashire, Cheshire, Derbyshire, and Scotland. Up to Saturday's conference concessions ranging from one to three shillings per week had been made to about 40,000 of the workpeople concerned. The conference was held in private, and at the close Alderman Joseph Hayhurst (general secretary of the Amalgamated Society of Dyers, Bleachers, &c.) made the following official statement:—

The National Society of Dyers have been authorised to accept the terms of the Huddersfield Woollen Manufacturers and Spinners' Association and the Fine Cloth Manufacturers' Association, which, summarised, are: Persons earning 10s. and under, a bonus of 6d. per week; males earning over 10s. and not exceeding 20s. per week, 1s.; over 20s. and not exceeding 30s., 2s. 6d.; over 30s. and not exceeding 40s., 2s. All women workers earning over 10s., a bonus of 1s.

Earnings to be calculated upon the nominal rate of wages paid per week of 55½ hours, overtime not included.

The war bonus to be made a separate payment and not to be included in the wages, and to be paid fortnightly.

In case of broken time caused by the default of the workman or woman the bonus to be given in proportion to the time worked.

The war bonus to be given as and from the first pay day in April, 1915.

The employers will continue the war bonus until the expiration of three months after peace is declared.

The acceptance of the war bonus constitutes an agreement to revert to the original basis of wages three months after peace is declared.

Disputes as to the interpretation of the agreement to be submitted to a joint committee of the associations and the unions for settlement.

The offer, Alderman Hayhurst explained, affects the whole of the workpeople in the Huddersfield and Colne Valley area.

The Yeadon Factory Workers' Association were authorised by the conference to accept terms, granted last week, similar to those of the Bradford Dyers' Association for the whole of the textile workers in Yeadon and district.

Lister & Co., Limited, Manningham Mills, have granted to all their employees terms similar to those of the Bradford Dyers' Association. Some 4,000 workpeople employed by this firm, but not represented at the conference, will benefit by the grant.

The conference decided to recommend all societies again to write those employers who have not yet conceded terms equal to those of the Bradford Dyers' Association, giving them seven days' notice that unless they comply at once and grant the terms their employees will be recommended to hand in notices to terminate their labour.

The Leeds Cloth Dyers' Association, which includes the Indigo, Scarlet, and Colour Dyers' Association, the Leeds Manufacturers' Association, and the Worsted Dyers' Association—all mainly engaged on war contracts—are to be written to, demanding that the wage limit of 40s. shall be removed. This demand is to be made in consequence of the employees working overtime. Failing compliance it is proposed to hand in notices to terminate employment.

BRADFORD TEXTILE WORKERS.

HOURS AND WAGES DISCUSSED.

A mass meeting organised by the General Union of Textile Workers to protest against "the refusal of the textile employers to give an advance in wages" was held on Saturday night in the Mechanics' Institute, Bradford. Mr. J. H. Watson (secretary of the local branch), presided, and he was supported by the president of the union (Mr. Ben Turner, Mayor of Batley), Mr. Allen Gee (general secretary of the union), Mr. W. H. Leach, Mrs. Hillas, and Miss Jessie Cockerline.

The Chairman said that not only did they protest against the scanty response of the employers to a request for an advance in wages, but against the refusal of the employers' federation of the district to recognise their union. If all the weavers and burlers and menders of the Bradford district were of the same mind as he was the weavers would not put in another pick, the burlers and menders would not deal with another piece until the employers' federation recognised their union. In reference to the question of a war bonus he expressed the opinion that the 5 per cent. offered by some employers was an insult. Since last August the cost of food had increased by 25 per cent., so that even with a 5 per cent. wages bonus the employees would be 20 per cent. worse off in respect of the power to purchase accept the terms, which are to take effect as from April 7. The terms are similar to those given in the report of the dyers' conference.

A HUDDERSFIELD SETTLEMENT.

A meeting attended by about 1,000 members of the General Union of Textile Workers was held yesterday in the Town Hall, Huddersfield, to hear a report as to the terms which had been offered by the three employers' associations in Huddersfield district with reference to the granting of a war bonus. The three employers' associations concerned were the Huddersfield and District Fine Cloth Manufacturers' Association, the Woollen Manufacturers and Spinners' Association, and the Yarn Spinners' Association.

The terms had been the subject of negotiation for several weeks, and a final offer was made by the employers on Wednesday last, when the operatives' representatives agreed to submit it to a meeting of the workpeople.

Mr. Ben Turner presided at yesterday's meeting, and the terms were read by Mr. Allen Gee (secretary of the union), being similar to those given in the report of the dyers' conference.

The terms were put to the vote and agreed to by a very substantial majority, only a very few hands being held up against the proposition.

Manchester Guardian.
5.4.15.

DYERS' WAGES.

ADVANCES FOR 25,000 MEN.

The sub-committee appointed at a conference in Manchester last week to review the progress of the movement for an advance in dyers', bleachers', and finishers' wages, met in Bradford on Saturday, when it was announced that a large number of firms had agreed to grant terms to the employees similar to those offered by the Bradford Dyers' Association—namely, an advance of 3s. to persons over 21 years of age earning up to and including 28s.; an advance of 2s. to those earning more than 28s. and up to 42s. per week, and an advance of 1s. to women, boys, and youths.

The associations and firms which had agreed to these terms are the Bradford Dyers' Association, the British Cotton and Wool Dyers' Association, the Yorkshire Fraternity of Dyers (including about fifteen private firms), the Calico Printers' Association, Messrs. Alfred Priestman and Co., Bradford; Messrs. Richard Taylor and Son, Scholes; Messrs. J. Mandleberg and Co., Pendleton; Messrs. Arthur Harrison and Co., Leeds; Messrs. Jobson, Bardsley, and Jobson, Nelson; Messrs. Copley, Marshall, and Co., Holmfirth; and Messrs. Hodgson and Taylor, Blackburn.

All the Bradford cotton warp and hank dyeing firms have replied that they will pay the B.D.A. terms from April 9. The Yorkshire Indigo and Scarlet Colour Dyers, Limited, have made offers similar to those quoted above, and also the Leeds and District Worsted Dyers' and Finishers' Association, Limited. Negotiations are still in progress between representatives of the unions concerned and these associations, and there will be interviews in the course of this week.

The Bleachers' Combine has not yet offered satisfactory terms, but new proposals are to be submitted by the men asking for advances in wages slightly modified from the original demands. A conference has been arranged to be held this week.

It was decided to send out further circulars to all firms with whom interviews have not yet been fixed up or from whom satisfactory replies have not been received, and the representatives of the unions have been recommended in the event of satisfactory terms not being arranged, to hand in seven days' notice wherever possible. It was officially announced that settlements have been arrived at with associations and firms employing 25,000 trade unionists. The original demands were made on behalf of 60,000 trade unionists employed by about 600 firms. Another conference is to be held in Bradford next Saturday.

federation recognised their union. In reference to the question of a war bonus he expressed the opinion that the 5 per cent. offered by some employers was an insult. Since last August the cost of food had increased by 25 per cent., so that even with a 5 per cent. wages bonus the employees would be 20 per cent. worse off in respect of the power to purchase the necessities and comforts of life than they were before August. If the employees of Bradford were organised as were their fellows in the Huddersfield district and the Heavy Woollen District, the employers would recognise them. The organisation was ready for a fight if only the rank and file would support it. They wanted, not a 5 per cent. bonus, but a 10 to 15 per cent. bonus. Up to now the employers had been making large profits, and were practically bleeding and sweating the workers with long hours of overtime in order to make profits out of them.

The Mayor of Batley, advocating closer organisation among local textile workers, said they had heard a great deal lately about the failings of working folks, but he had not heard much about the races at Wetherby or at Ascot, or the boxing match in London. He was tired of being lectured by those who set a bad example. He contended that the textile workers of Yorkshire were an exceedingly sober class, and entailed no loss upon their employers through drinking habits. He could understand the employers exhibiting shyness in the face of a demand to meet the employees to discuss a claim for increased wages if they were poor, but most of the employers were rolling in wealth. During the last five or six months they had been absolutely swimming in gold; they were nearly as well off as they were in the great days after the Franco-German war. Concluding his speech, the Mayor of Batley said that after the war the textile workers of Bradford ought to agitate for a uniform price-list, after the fashion of the textile workers in Lancashire.

Mr. W H. Leach said that the current issue of "The Board of Trade Gazette" showed that 36,664 Yorkshire textile workers in the week ended March 27 earned £31,772. This meant an average of 17s. 4d. per week per head. Take out the higher-paid men folk what was there left for the women? Now remember that the week was a good one; 12 per cent. of the workpeople reported upon were working overtime. Knocking off the overtime, the average fell to 15s 6d. for a normal week. What would the average be for weavers? Probably 12s. But put it as high as they could reckon it, they could not by any conceivable stretch of imagination make it a living wage. They could therefore accuse the textile trade of Bradford of sweating its workpeople. Government orders had been obtained under practically non-competitive conditions; anyone could obtain Government orders so long as he could guarantee a certain quality and rate of delivery. Therefore the manufacturer who said that he had had to cut his prices fine because of competition was either lying or proving his utter incompetence as a business man. The trade in Bradford could afford to pay the workers more, but was apparently not willing to do so until the workers forced it. "My suggestion to you," he said, "is to get on and force it." The Bradford trade, he added, could afford to reduce hours from ten to eight per day without the slightest hardship being involved for anyone.

Mr. Allen Gee said he knew a firm which was dealing with an order for 100,000 yards of khaki, and not a woman working on the job would get less than 24s. a week while the job was on. "And you in Bradford," he said, "get a miserable 12s. a week and you are satisfied." They had no desire, he proceeded, that anyone fighting the battles of the country should go without clothing; but if the workers would only back them up they hoped at least to compel the Government to intervene.

Mr. Hillas, dealing with the grievances of burlers and menders, said that one of the great evils was the amount of commission burling that was done in Bradford. There were burling and mending shops in Bradford run by butchers and milkmen.

MORE MONEY FOR THE MORLEY TEXTILE WORKERS.

On Saturday night a largely attended meeting of the Textile Union members in Morley and district was held in the Co-operative Hall, Morley, for the purpose of receiving the proposals of the Morley Manufacturers' Association for a war bonus to textile workers. Mr. Ben Turner presided, and he and Mr. Allen Gee (secretary of the union), explained the terms of agreement which had been agreed upon by a joint committee of the executive of the association and of the union respectively, and after some discussion it was resolved by a large majority to

The Yorkshire Observer
1. 11. 15

WAGES IN THE DYEING TRADE.

STRIKE BALLOT TO TAKE PLACE.

20.000 EMPLOYEES INVOLVED.

Disagreement has arisen between the employers and employees in certain sections of the dyeing trade in Lancashire and Yorkshire, and in the course of this week about 20,000 workpeople will be called upon to decide by ballot whether they shall hand in their notices.

The issue has arisen regarding the amount of war bonus to be paid and the conditions under which it shall be operative. In the case of the Bradford Dyers' Association a satisfactory agreement, the terms of which have already been published in "The Yorkshire Observer," was arrived at about a fortnight ago. Since then other associations of employers have made offers, and these were the subject of discussion on Saturday at a conference held in Bradford of representatives of various unions in the dyeing and kindred trades.

A tentative agreement arrived at between the Hebden Bridge and District Master Dyers' Association and the National Society of Dyers and Finishers provided that the following alterations in wages should be made on the first pay-day in November, 1915: Girls and women, an advance of 2s. per week; boys under 18 years of age, 2s. per week; all male employees 18 years and over, 3s. per week. Employees paid on piece-work rates are, according to the agreement, to receive advances as follow: Ten per cent. on all piece rates for dyers; 7½ per cent. for cutters, menders, and stovers. These advances are to be regarded as war wages and recognised as due to and dependent on the existence of the abnormal conditions now prevailing in consequence of the war; and neither party shall, before the signing of peace terms, seek to alter this agreement except on the ground of material alteration in the cost of living. This arrangement shall thereafter be terminable by three months' notice in writing from either party. In the event of advances being granted and accepted at lower rates in the Lancashire districts (including Manchester, Middleton, and Littleborough) the above advances are to be reduced accordingly.

The Leeds Manufacturers' Association have made an offer very similar to that of the Bradford Dyers' Association.

Saturday's conference decided to recommend the acceptance of these two offers.

Offers were also submitted from the Lancashire Federation of Dyers, the Calico Printers' Association, Limited, and the Employers' Federation of Bleachers, but the conference decided unanimously in each case to reject the offer.

The Lancashire Federation of Dyers (Piece Goods Section) offered a war bonus as follows: All women and girls, 1s. 6d. per week; youths under 21 years of age, 1s. 6d. per week; men over 21 years of age, 3s. per week. They offered besides a grant of war bonus for eight weeks if off sick, and payment of war bonus during slack periods.

The Calico Printers' Association, Limited, offered to increase the war grant and to extend it as follows to all works' employees paid weekly: Men and youths over 18 years of age, 3s. per week; boys unde. 18 years of age, 1s. 6d. per week; girls and women, 1s 6d. per week; any half-timers, 1s. per week. The following conditions were specified: Recent advances in lieu of war grant will be taken into consideration; overtime rates to be calculated as before; production bonus to be paid in full without respect to grant; holiday weeks to be paid for in full; short time to be paid for pro rata to hours worked; in case of shortness of work employees to be paid in full for odd days, but if no wages are due for a working week no grant will be paid; piece work to be calculated and divided as before, than 1s., 1s. 6d., or 3s. granted to each person as above.

The Employers' Federation of Bleachers were prepared to give—to all women and girls, 1s. 6d. per week; to youths under 21 years of age, 1s. 6d. per week; to men over 21s. and earning 33s. or less, 3s. per week; to men earning over 33s., 2s. per week. These arrangements are to apply to both piece and day workers and also to any week which includes recognised holidays, or any week where no wages are payable owing to slackness of trade. Employees losing time on their own account in any week, except by reason of sickness, will be disqualified from receiving the war bonus during such week. Cases of sickness must be reported to the management as early as possible, and if proved to be legitimate the war bonus will be paid for a period of eight weeks.

These rejected offers concern about 20,000 workpeople, who will be balloted this week as to the handing in of notices; and a sub-committee has been appointed to meet as soon as notices have been sent in with a view to terminating employment.

The conference also had before them the question raised by the Factory Inspector for Manchester district, who was authorised by the Home Office to negotiate with the trade unions regarding the em-

662b/3

Cotton Factory Times
1. 11. 15

WILL BLEACHERS AND DYERS STRIKE?

DEADLOCK IN WAGE MOVEMENT IN LANCASHIRE.

YORKSHIRE CONCESSIONS.

CASE FOR THE MEN.

Unless the unexpected happens there is likely to be trouble in the bleaching and dyeing trade of Lancashire.

The Operative Bleachers' Association (Bolton Amalgamation) has joined with other societies in the trade in seeking a wage advance in lieu of the war bonus now being paid. The unions are asking that the present payment of a war bonus of 1s. 6d., 2s., or 3s., according to grade or sex, should be superseded by a 3s. advance put on wages to day workers and a 10 per cent advance to pieceworkers, and also for payment to be made for overtime. After various conferences with the employers the Bradford Dyers' Association (Yorkshire branches), and several other associations in Yorkshire, along with the British Cotton and Wool Dyers' Association and a large number of private firms conceded an advance of wages in place of the war bonus, as follows:

3s. per week to all workmen of 18 and over; 2s. per week to all youths under 18 and to women and girls; and a ten per cent advance on the earnings of pieceworkers.

Overtime is already paid for by these associations. These offers have been considered and accepted by the Joint Wages Board, and will come into operation on the first pay-day in November. It was also arranged that no society engaged in the movement would accept any terms less favourable than these.

Lancashire Outside.

The three principal federations of employers operating in Lancashire have not yet seen their way to offer the same terms as have been accepted by the Joint Wages Movement Board as a compromise, but have merely varied the war bonus payment. The present offers are:—

The Calico Printers' Association:
1s. 6d. per week to women and girls.
1s. 6d. „ to boys under 18.
3s. „ to youths and men over 18.
1s. „ to half-timers.
(To apply to pieceworkers and dayworkers.)

The Federation of Bleachers (including the Bleachers' Association, Ltd.):
1s. 6d. per week to all women and girls.
1s. 6d. „ to youths under 21 years of age
3s. „ to men over 21 years of age, earning 33s. or less per week.
2s. „ to men earning over 33s. per week.
(To apply to pieceworkers and dayworkers.)

The Federation of Bleachers, Printers, etc. (piece goods):
3s. per week to males 21 years of age and upwards.
1s. 6d. „ „ under 21 years of age, and to all women.
(To apply to pieceworkers and dayworkers.)

It must be noted that the offers of the three associations named above are in the nature of a war bonus, and are not an advance placed upon wages, and the offer does not contemplate in any case the alteration of any piecework rates.

The Bolton Amalgamation, at a special delegate meeting held at Bolton on October 28th, unanimously rejected the offers as unsatisfactory, and this decision was confirmed on Saturday last by a joint meeting of the whole of the societies interested in the movement, which was held at Bradford. The Bolton Amalgamation consists of 20 branches in various parts of Lancashire, Cheshire, and Derbyshire, and has about 12,000 members. During the present week the whole of the members have had the opportunity by ballot vote of saying whether they are willing to strike or not.

The Executive Council have issued a full statement of the position in a circular letter, which is now in the members' hands. It shows that the Yorkshire branches of a certain federation have conceded the terms, viz 3s. and 2s. to dayworkers and 10 per cent to pieceworkers. In Lancashire (being members of the Piece Goods Federation) they offer 1s. 6d. under 21 years and 3s. above it be legitimate the war bonus will be paid for a period of eight weeks.

These rejected offers concern about 20,000 workpeople, who will be balloted this week as to the handing in of notices; and a sub-committee has been appointed to meet as soon as notices have been sent in with a view to terminating employment.

The conference also had before them the question raised by the Factory Inspector for Manchester district, who was authorised by the Home Office to negotiate with the trade unions regarding the employment of women in the place of men, and a meeting with the inspector was fixed to take place in Manchester early this week.

During the present week the whole of the members have had the opportunity by ballot vote of saying whether they are willing to strike or not.

The Executive Council have issued a full statement of the position in a circular letter, which is now in the members' hands. It shows that the Yorkshire branches of a certain federation have conceded the terms, viz 2s. and 3s. to dayworkers and 10 per cent to pieceworkers. In Lancashire (being members of the Piece Goods Federation) they offer 1s. 6d. under 21 years, and 3s. above 21 years, but no alteration in piecework rates.

Doubly Justified.

The circular continues: "With regard to other associations and private firms, if the workers in our trade were justified in asking them for an advance in March last they are doubly justified now. The cost of living has greatly increased in the intervening months. Many large organisations have succeeded in obtaining advances in wages for their members far in excess of what we are asking, and we believe our case for an advance is an unanswerable one. The issue rests with you. If you are in earnest about the matter you will take pains to record your vote. It has been stated in some quarters that you are satisfied with the war bonus. This we know is not the case, and we hope that no indecision on the matter will be shown. If we are united we shall stand, and stand firm. If we are divided we may fall. Let us then show our unity and determination."

In the event of the vote being in favour of a strike—and there is little hope of any other decision—the whole of the members of the Bolton Amalgamation employed by the above associations and by private firms who have not conceded the advance will tender notice next week. The other societies interested have already received a mandate from the members concerned to hand in notices at the same time.

The men feel that the advance asked is small. Already in many cases men are receiving 3s. as war bonus, and all they ask is for that sum to be recognised as an advance in wages and for payments to be made for overtime. When it is said that 10 per cent. is a large order the men point out that at the present time they are receiving the war bonus. Thus the advance, after elimination of the war bonus, is very small indeed.

Manchester Guardian
10.11.15

LANCASHIRE DYEING TRADE.

20,000 WORKERS DECIDE TO STRIKE.

NOTICES TO-DAY.

A strike involving between 20,000 and 22,000 workers in the Lancashire dyeing, bleaching, and finishing trades was decided upon at a meeting in Manchester yesterday of the Wages Sub-committee of the twelve or more kindred trade unions affiliated together for common purposes.

At a conference held in Bradford on October 30, offers of war bonuses from the Bleachers' Association, the Calico Printers' Association, and the Lancashire Federation of Piece Goods Dyers were considered and referred to the members to be balloted upin. The Wages Sub-committee met yesterday to receive the returns, and on their behalf Alderman Joseph Hayhurst, of Bradford, announced that 16,000 had voted in favour of refusing these offers and handing in notices to cease work and 3,000 against such a course; 1,000 had not voted, and there were still a few hundred votes to come in. As a result, he added, notices to cease work would be handed in to-day and on successive making-up days, with the result that if the employers did not concede the demands of the workers there would be a complete stoppage next Friday week in the premises of the three combines named and of a large number of private firms in Scotland.

Concessions in Yorkshire.

The claims made by the allied unions are an advance of 3s. a week for men over 18 years of age, 2s. a week for women and girls and for youths under 18 years, and a 10 per cent advance on piece rates. These, we are informed, have been conceded to about 40,000 employees by virtually all of the woollen firms in Yorkshire, the British Cotton, Wool, and Hank Dyers' Association, and—during the last few days—by five private firms in the Lancashire Federation of Piece Goods Dyers. But from the outset of the wages movement Lancashire employers have pointed out that the woollen trade of Yorkshire has been far more prosperous since the outbreak of the war than has the cotton trade, and that "the losses and risks caused by the war to the calico printing industry have been increased by the counter-attraction of those industries which temporarily benefit by the war."

The offers of the three combines which have been rejected were of the nature of war bonuses instead of advances of wages, and varied in detail from one another.

The Calico Printers' Association's terms included a bonus of 3s. a week to men and youths over 18 years of age, 1s. 6d. a week to boys under that age and to women and girls, and 1s. to half-timers, with overtime rates and piecework "calculated as before." Those of the Bleachers' Association were a bonus of 3s. a week for men over 21 years of age earning 33s. or less per week, one of 2s. for men earning more than that amount, and 1s. 6d. for women and girls and for youths under the age of 21 years; whilst chief among the terms of the Federation of Piece Goods Dyers were a bonus of 3s. a week for men over 21 years and 1s. 6d. for other workers. In each case there were varying provisions for such events as holidays, slackness, and sickness.

It should be added that the members of the Union of Engravers to Calico Printers and Paper Stainers are not concerned in the strike decision, as they are bound by special agreement with their employers to give three months' notice in the event of a dispute, but all the other kindred trades are involved, including the Gasworkers' and General Labourers' Union.

6626/4

6626/3

Manchester Evening Chronicle
10.11.15

BONUS OR WAGE?

Threatened Strike of Dye Workers.

NOTICES THIS WEEK.

25,000 Employes Affected in Lancashire Dispute.

A strike of operatives engaged in the dyeing, bleaching, and finishing trades of Lancashire is threatened. Beginning on Wednesday next and continuing until the following Friday, strike notices will expire at the works of the Calico Printers' Association, the Lancashire Federation of Piece Goods Dyers, and the Bleachers' Association. In all something like 25,000 workpeople are concerned, 17,000 being members of the Bleachers', Dyers', and Finishers' Association (Bolton Amalgamation), and the remainder members of the Amalgamated Society of Dyers and Gas Workers' and General Labourers' Union.

The trouble has arisen owing to the refusal of the three combines, Bleachers' Association, Calico Printers, and Federation of Piece Goods Dyers, to pay a permanent advance of wages to workpeople, viz.: 2s. per week for all women, 3s. for all men over 18 years of age, 2s. for all youths under 18 years of age; 10 per cent. advance for all piece workers, and overtime at the rate of time and a quarter for the first and time and a half for overtime beyond the first hour.

Against these demands the employers have offered war bonuses instead of permanent advances. The offer was rejected by the unions.

As already stated in the Evening Chronicle the Calico Printers offered a 3s. bonus for employes over 18 years of age, 1s. 6d. to youths, women, and girls under 18 years of age, and 1s. to half-timers. The Bleachers' Association offered a bonus of 3s. for those above 21 years of age and earning less than 33s. per week, and 2s. for men earning more than 33s., and 1s. 6d. for women and girls and for youths under 21 years of age: the Piece Goods Dyers offered 3s. to those over 21 years, and 1s. 6d. for all others.

It was contended to-day by a union official that the dyeing trade was one of the worst paid in the whole country, despite the fact that it was a trade requiring perhaps the greatest skill. Practically all the firms in Yorkshire had given the permanent advance, and he believed that there was every prospect of the whole of the Lancashire firms following suit. In all some 300 works would be affected in Lancashire, but a great number of private firms, 50 perhaps in all, had conceded the advance.

LAST WORDS SAID.

"We have said our last word on the question," he added, "and after weeks of negotiation we are entitled to an answer one way or another. If the advance is not granted we shall allow the notices to expire."

To-day a meeting of the firms interested in the dispute was held in Manchester, but it was stated that no information could be given. It is understood, however, that the increasing price of raw materials is one of the reasons why the increase is withheld.

It is interesting to note that firms engaged in the trade have decided not to issue further lists owing to the advance. One firm of colour dealers, Messrs. Javeri and Co., inform us that they sold a keg of colour 224lb. in February last at 52s. 6d. per lb., the total for 2 cwt. being £588. Since that time prices have advanced considerably. A keg of methyl blue sold by the Midland Railway Company realised 36s. per pound.

This afternoon it transpired that strike notices were served at a few firms, and

Manchester Guardian
17. 11. 15

NO STRIKE.

TROUBLE AVOIDED IN DYEING TRADE.

AN AGREEMENT.

The strike of 22,000 operatives in the dyeing, bleaching, finishing, and kindred cotton trades of Lancashire, which was to have begun today, has been averted. After separate and joint conferences extending over most of yesterday Mr. F. B. Knott, secretary of the Allied Trades Committee of the employers' organisations concerned, issued the following announcement:—

"An agreement has been reached. Notices to be withdrawn. A ballot will be taken of the works at once."

In answer to questions, Mr. Knott explained that terms had been drawn up which were considered satisfactory by the representatives of both sides, but that it was necessary to submit them for confirmation by the employers and workers concerned. For the present those terms were not to be published.

The dispute was originally part of a general movement among these trades throughout Lancashire and Yorkshire, and in some districts of Cheshire and Scotland, for an advance of wages in consequence of the higher cost of living. The woollen dyeing firms of Yorkshire granted an advance of 3s. a week to all men over the age of 18 years, 2s. to women and girls and to youths under 18 years, and a 10 per cent advance on piece rates; and these figures were made the substance of the demand by the workers in Lancashire and elsewhere. The Lancashire employers, in resisting this demand, pointed out that the cotton trade has not enjoyed the same prosperity as the woollen trade since the outbreak of war.

Admitting, however, the hardship caused by the war, the employers made counter-offers of war grants or bonuses. These differed from one another, but were slightly lower in amount than the advances claimed. The operatives rejected them, and decided a week ago that their claim should be enforced by the tendering of notices. Last Friday the Allied Trades Committee of the employers' organisations held another meeting, and offered to submit the dispute to the arbitration of the Industrial Council. Since then negotiations have been continuous, with the result which we now announce.

Daily Dispatch
18. 11. 15

DYERS' BONUS.

Addition of 3s for Both Day and Piece Workers.

The basis of settlement of the dispute in the Lancashire, Cheshire, and Derbyshire dyeing, bleaching, and finishing trade, were announced last night.

The terms offered by the employers are as follow:—Day workers to receive a bonus of 3s.; all male workers under 18 years of age and women and girls to receive 2s. The bonus will also operate in regard to overtime. Any man who works more than a full week of 55½ hours will receive a bonus at the rate of ⅗d. per hour, plus time and a quarter for the first two hours, and time and a half for subsequent hours of overtime.

Piece workers will receive 3s. per week, and boys under 18 and women and girls 2s. They will also receive a flat rate for overtime at the rate of ⅗d. per hour, irrespective of the earnings on piece rates. This would place piece workers on the same level as day workers.

A ballot of the workers on the question of accepting or refusing the terms is to be taken this week.

6623

6626/5

Daily Dispatch

22. 11. 15

DYE TRADE DISPUTE.

Terms of Settlement for Lancashire.

COLNE VALLEY TROUBLE.

Conference With Factory Inspectors as to Labour Shortage.

A conference of representatives of twelve trade unions catering for dyers, finishers, bleachers, and kindred trades was held at Bradford on Saturday to consider the new terms offered with a view to settlement of the wages dispute by the Calico Printers' Association, the Bleachers' Federation, and the Lancashire Dyers' Federation (piece goods section). The conference sat for about four hours, and at the close Alderman Joseph Hayhurst stated that reports were given of meetings with the above employers' associations in Manchester last week, and the terms agreed upon at those meetings were submitted. In the end the conference recommended that the whole of the members concerned, numbering between 20,000 and 25,000, should vote for their acceptance.

The Terms Offered.

The terms offered by the Calico Printers Association, the Bleachers' Federation, the Bradford Dyers' Association (respecting their Lancashire branches), the Lancashire Dyers' Federation (piece goods section), and the English Velvet and Cord Dyers' Association are as follow:—

To day workers: A war grant at the rate of 7-16d. per hour for every hour worked to all women, irrespective of age, and to all youths under 18 years of age. A war grant of 21-32d. per hour for every hour worked to all male workers 18 years of age and over. Time and a quarter for overtime up to 7-30 p.m.; after 7-30 p.m. time and a half.

To piece workers: All women, irrespective of age, and youths under 18 years of age, a war grant of 2s. a week. All male workers 18 years of age and over 3s. a week.

The bonus to be paid in full to all employes who have worked the number of hours requested by the employer. Time lost will be deducted pro rata to the grant. Piece workers to be paid an addition on their earnings of 2½d. an hour for each hour worked after the usual stopping time.

These advances are to be regarded as war grants and recognised as due and dependent on the existence of the abnormal conditions now prevailing in consequence of the war, and neither party shall, before the signing of piece terms, seek to alter the arrangement, except on the ground of a material alteration in the cost of living.

The new arrangement is to come into force on the first pay day after the announcement of the result of the ballot by the workpeople, which is to be announced on Wednesday next.

All notices are to be withdrawn at once, and the agreement is to be terminable by three months' notice in writing by either side.

It is pointed out that 7-16ths of a penny is equal to 2s. a week, and 21-32nds of a penny to 3s. a week of 55 hours.

Threat of Strike.

The Gasworkers' and General Labourers' Union reported that the firm of J. and J. Longbottom, Birstall Dyeworks, near Leeds, a branch of the Scarlet and Colour Dyers' Association, had not yet granted the terms agreed upon, and a resolution was carried unanimously that the union instruct their members to give a week's notice at once so that the firm give the same terms as others in the same combine.

The Huddersfield Manufacturers' Association have refused to give the same terms as other firms in the same trade in Yorkshire, and the members of the National Society of Dyers, and the Leeds and Huddersfield Federated Cloth Pressers' Society, had already ordered their members to hand in their notices, and this action was endorsed by the conference. This will affect the whole of the Huddersfield and the Colne Valley trade, and will bring out about 2,000 workers.

A meeting is to take place in Glasgow on Friday next for dealing with the wages of dyers, bleachers, &c., in Scotland. Representatives of all the great combines in the trade and the whole of the private firms will be invited to be present. Mr. Hayhurst said that no difficulty was anticipated with the Scottish employers.

Alderman Hayhurst added that the conference had had under consideration the question of the shortage of labour in the the Colne Valley trade, and will bring out about 2,000 workers.

A meeting is to take place in Glasgow on Friday next for dealing with the wages of dyers, bleachers, &c., in Scotland. Representatives of all the great combines in the trade and the whole of the private firms will be invited to be present. Mr. Hayhurst said that no difficulty was anticipated with the Scottish employers.

Alderman Hayhurst added that the conference had had under consideration the question of the shortage of labour in the trade, which is regarded as the most serious question the unions have yet had to deal with, not excepting the wages question. It was decided to accept the proposal of the Chief Inspector of Factories in Manchester that a conference of the executives of the societies be held with the factory inspectors present for the purpose of arriving at methods of dealing with the shortage of labour when the various works become so depleted as to interfere with the carrying on of business. Following this a meeting is to be arranged with the employers throughout the country in the dyeing trade, with the view to making such arrangements as will prevent a disturbance of business.

APPEAL TO WOMEN.

The Shortage of Labour in the Cotton Trade.

The shortage of labour in the cotton trade has become so acute at Rochdale that the employers and representatives of the men's union have had a conference, and the result is that an appeal has been issued to women in the district to resume work at their former occupations in the mills.

The appeal, which is signed by the chairman of the Rochdale branch of the North and North-East Lancashire Cotton Spinners' and Manufacturers' Association, and the representatives of the various unions affected, points out that there has been a continued and increasing shortage of female workers in many of the cotton mils, and that it is of the utmost importance, in the general interests of the country, that the shortage should as far as possible be made up. For this purpose an appeal is being made to those women workers who have had previous experience in the card room, ring spinning room, reeling, winding, and warping room, and weaving shed, to take up work again in the mill during the continuance of the war.

"We feel sure," continues the appeal, "there are hundreds of skilled women cotton workers at home with time to spare who, if they were convinced that their work would help to win the war, would at once render their services in the department of the mill in which they are skilled. We therefore earnestly and confidently appeal to you to offer yourself for work in the mills, and so do your bit in this time of national crisis."

In order to induce operatives to return to work, employers are offering wages which have never previously ruled in the trade. One firm are offering wages from 25s to £2 to weavers, and "irreproachable working conditions." Young girls, from 13 to 14 years of age, can earn from 11s to 12s. a week, and youths from 18s. to £1 a week.

Textile Mercury
29-7-16

DYERS' WAGES

The award resulting from arbitration with regard to the application of the operatives in the dyeing industry was received in Bradford on Tuesday. Under the award the following advances are granted on the present rates:—4s. per week to all men 18 years of age and over, 2s. 8d. to all youths under 18 years of age and women and girls, and the usual equivalent advances to piece-workers. These advances are to take effect from June 2, and are to be regarded as war wages and recognised as due to and dependent on the existence of the abnormal conditions prevailing in consequence of the war. The award in the case of the dyers in Lancashire, Cheshire, and Derbyshire is as follows:—

DAY WORKERS.—(a) That 1d. be substituted for 7-16d. granted under the previous agreement to all women irrespective of age, and to all youths under 18 years of age; (b) 1½d. to be substituted for 21-32d. per hour to all male workers 18 years of age and upwards.

PIECE WORKERS.—That all women, youths, and men be given an advance of 10 per cent. on earnings, exclusive and irrespective of the war grants of 2s. and 3s. per week. The respective war grants of 2s. and 3s. to continue to be paid on the same terms as heretofore.

That such advance be deemed to come into operation on June 2, 1916, and be regarded as war wages and recognised as due to and dependent upon the existence of the abnormal conditions prevailing in consequence of the war.

The arbitrator disallows the claim of the Lancashire operatives to be put on the same level as the Yorkshire workers in the matter of overtime rates and hours. In Yorkshire the weekly hours are 54 and the overtime rate 3d. an hour extra. For Lancashire the corresponding figures are 55½ and 2½d.

Manchester Evening Chronicle
20-6-17

RISE OF 15s. FOR BLEACHERS.

All-Night Arbitration in Manchester.

50,000 HANDS AFFECTED.

Advance to be Payable from June 9.

A remarkable arbitration on a wages application was concluded in Manchester this morning, the proceedings extending throughout the whole night, and resulting in a substantial advance for the operatives.

Some time ago, on behalf of the Amalgamated Society of Dyers, Bleachers, Calico Printers, and Paper Stainers, the National Society of Dyers and Finishers, the Amalgamated Union of Engravers to Calico Printers and Paper Stainers, an application was made to the Employers' Association for an advance of 65 per cent. in wages upon pre-war rates, and finally arrangements were made by Mr. F. B. Knott, secretary of the Employers' Federation, and Alderman Joseph Hayhurst, secretary of the Operatives' Amalgamation, met Sir George Askwith, to hold arbitration proceedings in Manchester on the 19th and 20th inst.

Yesterday the parties met at the Queen's Hotel, Manchester. Preliminary gatherings were held of the various parties, and at 4 p.m. Sir George Askwith, the chief Industrial Commissioner, who presided, called upon Alderman Hayhurst to state the case for the operatives. He based the claim on the high cost of living. Mr. Shaw, on behalf of the National Society of Dyers, supported the claim.

EARLY-MORNING SETTLEMENT.

Mr. Davies, chairman of the Federated Association, and Mr. T. Robinson, of the Bradford Dyers' Association, stated the case on behalf of the employers. The proceedings went on hour after hour, and there was every appearance of a deadlock.

At midnight the parties were still in negotiation. At two o'clock there was little prospect of a settlement, but shortly after three o'clock Sir George Askwith made a suggestion to the employers, and this led to a final offer being made and accepted at 4-30 a.m. The proceedings had extended over a period of fifteen hours.

The following settlement was arrived at:

Increased wages to be paid: Day workers and piece workers over 18 years of age, 3½d. per hour.

Females over 18 years of age, 2d. per hour.

Males and females under 18 years of age 1½d. per hour.

Piece workers to be paid in accordance with the above scale, up to any standard week in any given works, and to receive the full amount if the person works 45 hours, the hours worked over a standard week to be paid at the same rate, plus overtime rates.

Non-process men, firebeaters, and labourers to be dealt with apart from this arrangement on Friday.

The advance shall be payable from June 9 for the previous week.

Engravers employed by the firms represented at this conference shall receive the above advance.

At the last moment Alderman Hayhurst wanted the Bolton Amalgamation to tabulate their claim, and the agreement also affects that body.

The new award means an increase to day workers of at least 15s. per week, and to a large number of calico print workers 6s. and upwards per week. In all 50,000 workpeople in Lancashire, Cheshire, and Derbyshire will receive the advance.

6626

6626/7

Leeds Mercury. 3.1.18

DYEING TRADE WAGES.

HEBDEN BRIDGE EMPLOYEES AWARDED INCREASES.

Members of the National Society of Dyers and Finishers at Hebden Bridge have obtained another considerable addition to their wages. In connection with their application, a difference arose between the society and the Master Dyers' Association, and it was agreed to refer the matter to Sir George Askwith, and Mr. Wm. Alexander Robertson, London, was deputed to decide the matter.

Mr. Robertson, after meeting the parties at the Bradford Town Hall, has issued his award, and has decided that in substitution of any war grant or bonus there shall be paid to day workers:—

To all males and females under 16 years of age, an increase of 1½d. per hour.

Males and females of 16 and under 18, an increase of 2d. per hour.

Female workers 18 and upwards, an increase of 2½d. per hour.

Males 18 years and upwards, an increase of 4d. per hour.

An exactly similar award has been made to the piece workers, who, whether male or female, are to be paid increased rates per hour up to the standard week in any given works, but not to receive less than the full amount if 45 hours have been worked. Hours after the standard week to be paid the same rates of increase plus the usual overtime allowance.

Standing wage men are to be dealt with by the employers.

The advances are to be payable as from the nearest pay day to 9th November, 1917, and shall be for the full pay week preceding that date. They are to be regarded as war wages.

Respecting the award to piece workers, both masters and men have agreed to the payment of the following percentages instead:—

Netterwood cutters, 52½ per cent.; hand cutters, 47½ per cent.; menders, 40 per cent.; all other piece workers, 45 per cent.

For Government contracts now going through a clause affecting fine and medium cords is to be substituted by a flat rate of 1s. 6d. for a 40's reed; and 1s. 8d. for a 41 and 42 reed.

Daily Express. February 9th. 1915.

WOMEN TO FILL THE PLACES OF MEN.

GOVERNMENT APPEAL TO THE TRADE UNIONS.

OUR ARMY'S WORK.

By Our Parliamentary Representative.

HOUSE OF COMMONS, Monday.

We want more men.

Women should be employed to serve in shops, releasing men for the front.

The trade unions should relax their rules, such as those about hours and "qualifications," and let off large numbers of fit men of military age, and allow men not fit for the front or women to take their places.

That was the gist of the appeal of the Government to-night, the outstanding feature of the speech of the Under-Secretary for War, Mr. Harold Tennant, in introducing the annual debate on the Army Estimates.

There was a debate, but no estimates. There were two reasons for giving no detail as to military strength and expenditure; first, that such information would be of great help to Germany, and, second, that no figures could be given with any exactitude. "We do not know," said Mr. F. D. Acland, Financial Secretary to the Treasury, "whether we shall return to peace expenditure during the financial year" (ending March 31, 1916).

MRS. ASQUITH A LISTENER.

Mr. Tennant had his sister, Mrs. Asquith, listening to him from the ladies' gallery, his brother-in-law, the Prime Minister, stayed beside him on the bench to listen, and his brother, Lord Glenconner (formerly Sir Edward Tennant) listened from the Peers' Gallery.

He made a clear and pleasing exposition of the obvious. For national reasons he gave, of course, none of the usual facts about the numbers of men in the Army, or the money to be spent on the various Army services.

"I have to remember," he said, "that my words might reach, and certainly will reach if they are sufficiently indiscreet, the Chief of the Staff at Berlin," and in grave tones he warned any member who might be in possession of the figures against divulging them.

He told of the difficulties experienced in organising the equipment and housing of the great New Army, and of how they had been overcome. There was the question of huts, for instance. Contractors had been behind, the great rainstorms of December had intervened, but now a very large number of troops were comfortably housed in huts, and before long the accommodation for all would be available.

Loud cheers went up when he paid a tribute to the householders who had so willingly billeted the troops, to the good behaviour of the men, and to their cheerfulness in times of discomfort. Then he turned to the question of recruiting.

"Recruiting has been very satisfactory," he said. "Of course, it varies from week to week. Possibly at the present moment if a little more energy were put into recruiting it would not be out of place. But we have no cause for discontent or disquiet.

"But we want more men. Every man will be needed in this great life-and-death struggle.

"The time approaches when we may have to make inroads—in fact, they are being made—into important industries on which large populations depend. Important issues must be involved in the denudation of the labour market of large numbers of men of military age and military physique.

APPEAL TO LABOUR.

"I would appeal to the Labour party," said the Government spokesman, turning round to the two benches of trade union leaders, "to help us to organise the forces of labour. I would ask them to help us so that when one man goes to join the colours his place may be taken by another man neither of military age nor physique, or by a woman. I believe that may be able to be done.

"I would ask them to assist the Government by allowing some form of relaxation of their rules and regulations.

"In many firms—not so much armament men at the front, and added that measures were being taken to prevent these effects of the wet and cold work in the trenches.

"I am glad to say," he continued, "that cases of enteric are rare, and the evidence is accumulating that inoculation ought to be made compulsory.

"The absence of inoculation so vitally affects the fighting efficiency of the force in the field that it is not one of those subjects which ought to be settled by prejudice. A leaflet, with a prefatory note by Lord Kitchener impressing the great value of inoculation, has been published, and is sent to every soldier.

"The preventive measures which I should like to mention, because they are new features, are the sanitary squads, the water-purifying sections, and the travelling hygiene and bacteriological laboratories.

"It has not been possible for me," he concluded, "to make a review of all the operations in the field, or of the truly marvellous achievements of the British Army in the last six months; nor am I able to make any forecast as to what may be in front of us.

"The variations and vicissitudes in this great struggle may call for even greater sacrifices from the nation as a whole more than any they have yet had to make. But I do not believe there is a single man in the House who is despondent—(cheers)—nor that there is a single man who is not determined that this matter shall issue in one way only, and that is that the Allies must dictate the terms of peace."

MR. WALTER LONG.

MR. WALTER LONG said that in his concluding remarks Mr. Tennant faithfully represented the spirit which animated the entire nation.

"I remember," he continued, "when I was in South Africa General Botha informed me that among all the experiences of the Boer war, one fact which impressed him above all others was the personal character of the British private soldier. would like to hear his tribute to the Britis rank and file who throughout this cam paign have given abundant proof that thei hearts are as brave and their hands as clea as those of the men who have fought i any of the great wars of the past. 'Th Opposition will not offer any criticism of a hostile character," continued Mr Long, "so long as they are assured tha the Government are prosecuting the wa with a steadfast determination to bring i as spedeily as might be possible to a suc cessful conclusion, and are giving the fullest measure of support to the Commander-in-Chief and the troops in the field

"In regard to the operations in the field and the progress of recruiting at home," he added, "the Government might with advantage have given more information to the public than they have seen fit to do. This is a matter, however, upon which private individuals cannot decide. The Government alone know the facts, and are able to judge of the prospects and of the effect of divulging information which they possess. I hope that the effect of this reticence may not prove unsatisfactory. If it does not have an unsatisfactory effect on the country, it will be enormously to the credit of our people.

"I have a shrewd suspicion—which I know is shared by many people—that the enemy has fairly accurate knowledge of the number of troops we are raising, and if I had to choose between the risk of telling the enemy something he does not know and the risk of discouraging our own people, I would rather choose the former."

WILLING VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. Long pleaded for the recognition of the volunteer forces. "There are thousands of men in the country," he declared, "who cannot go to the front who are fully capable of taking a share in home defence. The Government can get as many men as they want without pay. But they do ask that they should be told who is to lead them, and they also ask that they should be properly organised and trained as a military force.

"It is a great opportunity which shou' not be lost, because even with our gre Navy there are risks of invasion. Who is in supreme command of home defence?"

MR. TENNANT said Sir Ian Hamilton was commander-in-chief of the central force.

MR. W. LONG asked, Was he responsible for the internal defence of the country in the event of invasion? His information was that Sir Ian Hamilton's command covered only one portion of the country, and that there were other independent commands. He understood from the Under-Secretary that this was incorrect, and he hoped that in the course of the debate the House would have more definite information on the subject.

MR. J. HODGE (Lab.) declared that every demand made by employers of labour upon their workers to provide equipment and munitions of war had been cheerfully complied with. He did not think any body of men had been more patriotic than the trade unionists had been. They realised that in what they were doing they were serving their country as much as the men at the front.

LORD CHARLES BERESFORD urged the Government to take more vigorous action to get information as to officers and men who were returned as missing. The question of the missing was one of the saddest features of the war. Many of these men would never be heard of, but every effort should be made to get information whether they were alive or dead.

SIR COURTENAY WARNER urged that the services of more women nurses should be engaged for the care of the wounded, espec-

APPEAL TO LABOUR.

"I would appeal to the Labour party," said the Government spokesman, turning round to the two benches of trade union leaders, "to help us to organise the forces of labour. I would ask them to help us so that when one man goes to join the colours his place may be taken by another man neither of military age nor physique, or by a woman. I believe that may be able to be done.

"I would ask them to assist the Government by allowing some form of relaxation of their rules and regulations.

"In many firms—not so much armament as clothing firms—the rules have been largely abrogated already. I would ask my friends whether they could not prevail upon the trade unionists of this country to take measures, entirely of a temporary kind, for the relaxation of some of their more stringent rules.

"Would it not be possible for hon. members to induce such a union as the Shop Assistants' Trade Union to say that all male workers of age and physique fit to join the Army should be replaced by women workers?

"I do not say that this is a possible thing to do; I only throw it out tentatively.

"Many men are anxious to serve in the Army, and many are restrained by the urgent representations of their employers that they cannot be spared. Many have joined the colours without the permission of their employers.

MEDAL FOR WORKERS.

"In the case of the armament firms some of such men have already, on the instructions of Lord Kitchener, been brought back from the front in order to keep the works going at full strength.

"Lord Kitchener is considering the possibility of issuing at the termination of the war a medal to certain technical workers in the armament firms who have served so faithfully and well in the manufacture of those articles which are required, and by whose skill and zeal the army in the field has been supplied."

Then Mr. Tennant turned to the Army abroad.

"Troops have been brought from many parts of the world," he declared, proudly "without, as far as we know, a single casualty. When the numbers come to be known, that, I believe, will be regarded as one of the most extraordinary feats in history."

In a few words he declared that all had been well with the provisioning of the troops and with the supply of munitions of war, and in eloquent words he praised the efficiency, conduct, and value of the Territorial Forces, who in overwhelming preponderance had volunteered for service abroad. He continued:—

"I come now to the Flying Corps. I think that it has been proved beyond doubt that the British design of aeroplane has proved its superiority to that of any other nation. That is due to the Royal Aircraft Factory initiated by Lord Haldane, and the fact that so much progress has been made in the design is largely due to the late Secretary of War, Colonel Seely.

"The workmanship and material put in are so good that our aeroplanes last almost twice, if not quite twice, as long as those of any of the other Powers concerned. We have to acknowledge the valuable assistance the French Government have rendered in the matter of aeroplane engines.

"But we are now becoming self-supporting in this matter, and the first British-made aeroplane engines are now in use, and it will not be long before a considerable number of them reach the front.

"I may say that the British pilot, in the operations so far, has proved himself on every occasion without exception superior to the German pilot."

The medical service also came in for lavish praise from Mr. Tennant. "This is the first war," he said, "in which there has been an organised sanitary service." He described how rheumatism and frost-bite had been the principal sicknesses of our men had been more patriotic than the trade unionists had been. They realised that in what they were doing they were serving their country as much as the men at the front.

LORD CHARLES BERESFORD urged the Government to take more vigorous action to get information as to officers and men who were returned as missing. The question of the missing was one of the saddest features of the war. Many of these men would never be heard of, but every effort should be made to get information whether they were alive or dead.

SIR COURTENAY WARNER urged that the services of more women nurses should be engaged for the care of the wounded, expressing the view that partly trained nurses were better than male hospital orderlies.

MR. CURRIE considered that if a larger number of soldiers than that mentioned in the vote should be found necessary, the Government would be obliged to introduce some form of conscription in conjunction with a scheme of industrial regulation.

The appeal of the Government to the Labour representatives was not gone into in detail to-night, the Army discussion becoming general and discursive.

Mr. G. H. Roberts (Lab., Norwich) and Mr. Tyson Wilson (Lab., Westhoughton) are going to speak to-morrow (Tuesday), and they will ask the Government what exactly Mr. Tennant meant.

The Times, March 18th 1915. 6b

WAR SERVICE FOR WOMEN.

GOVERNMENT SCHEME.

INDUSTRIAL MOBILIZATION.

Prominent attention has been called in The Times to the problem of getting women to fill the places of men as far as possible in the ranks of trade and industry, and so at once release more and more men for the Army and maintain in full activity the supply of those necessaries without which, as Lord Kitchener said, our soldiers in the field cannot fight. We are glad to learn that the Board of Trade in behalf of the Government have been at work on the problem and have now framed a scheme with a view to dealing with it. The scope and character of the Government scheme is set out in the following official statement :—

WAR SERVICE FOR WOMEN.

The President of the Board of Trade wishes to call attention to the fact that in the present emergency, if the full fighting power of the nation is to be put forth on the field of battle, the full working power of the nation must be made available to carry on its essential trades at home. Already, in certain important occupations there are not enough men and women to do the work. This shortage will certainly spread to other occupations as more and more men join the fighting forces.

In order to meet both the present and the future needs of national industry during the war, the Government wish to obtain particulars of the women available, with or without previous training, for paid employment. Accordingly, they invite all women who are prepared, if needed, to take paid employment of any kind—industrial, agricultural, clerical, &c.—to enter themselves upon the Register of Women for War Service which is being prepared by the Board of Trade Labour Exchanges.

Any woman living in a town where there is a Labour Exchange can register by going there in person. If she is not near a Labour Exchange she can get a form of registration from the local agency of the Unemployment Fund. Forms will also be sent out through a number of women's societies.

The object of registration is to find out what reserve force of women's labour, trained or untrained, can be made available if required. As from time to time actual openings for employment present themselves, notice will be given through the Labour Exchanges, with full details as to the nature of work, conditions, and pay, and, so far as special training is necessary, arrangements will if possible, be made for the purpose.

Any woman who by working helps to release a man or to equip a man for fighting does national war service. Every woman should register who is able and willing to take employment.

By setting up this "Register of Women for War Service" the Board of Trade hope in the first place to obtain a census of all the available female labour supply, and then, from this reserve, to make good in some measure both the existing shortage in specific trades and any future shortages in the labour market that may be created by new demands on the manhood of the country. They will endeavour to ascertain as exhaustively as possible the occupations in which women have previously been engaged and in which they could and would be ready to engage again, as well as those in which fresh volunteers could do very well, with a little training. Having ascertained what the supply is, and classified it, they will be in a position to give reasonable assurances to employers in various trades and occupations that if patriotically they allow their men to go women can be supplied to take their place.

The 400 Labour Exchanges throughout the country have received, or will presently receive, instructions and registration forms. In the forms applicants, after entering their name, age, and whether they are married, single, or widow, will be invited to answer such questions as these :—

"Have you ever done any paid work, and, if so, what?" "If so, when; what kind, employer's name or names?" "Are you free to work—(a) whole time; (b) part time; (c) to leave your home for work if pay is sufficient, and housing satisfactory?" "Is there any other kind of work which you are willing and able to do?" "Are you prepared to be trained for work which you have not previously done?"

There are also a series of questions for persons willing to do agricultural work. All the women's societies, political, educational, and social, have been invited to lend their aid and cooperation in making known and promoting the success of this side of the scheme, and a great number have promised to do so. There is every reason to hope that the end of next week will see a large number of names entered on this register of women for war service.

With the enormous demands on the war industries women who want to work can get work, and remunerative work too. For light machine work for armaments and making of cartridge cases and shell cases there is almost no limit to the number of hands that could be employed. In engaging for this sphere women may feel that they are doing something to relieve what Lord Kitchener has described as his "very serious anxiety." The Army clothing factories require all the recruits they can get. The Prime Minister himself has endorsed and emphasized the call of the farmers for more labour on the land.

The case of the country woman presents a little difficulty. Where her husband has joined the Army she has in her separation allowance more money coming in than in many cases she ever had before, but the Board of Trade hope that through this scheme country women will patriotically come forward in greater numbers to take the place of their husbands who have gone to the front. In this connexion it may be stated that the agricultural colleges have undertaken to train women in suitable branches of farm work.

A MOBI... NATIO...

CALL TO ... AND SOBR...

MR. LLOYD G... APPEAL

Mr. Lloyd George, in openi... of representatives of trade ... Treasury yesterday, made an ... to employers and workmen ... differences and to concentrate ... a larger, increase in the outpu... of war.

A sub-committee of the La... tatives afterwards met and d... recommending that the Gover... appoint an Advisory Board, ... an equal number of represent... ployers and workmen, to assi... the greatest possible accelerati... put of war materials.

A conference of representat... Unions met the Chancellor of ... and the President of the Board o... request at the Treasury yesterda... pose of discussing certain matters ... to labour arising out of the rec... the Government, embodied in t... the Realm (Amendment) Act, t... steps to organize the resources ... to meet naval and military requ...

Representatives of the fol... unions were present :—

Friendly Society of Ironfounders.
British Steel Smelters' Association.
Amalgamated Society of Engineers.
Federation of Engineering and Shipbuilding ...
National Transport Workers' Federation.
General Union of Textile Workers.
Amalgamated Society of Carpenters and Join...
Boilermakers and Iron and Steel Shipbuilders...
Shipconstructors' and Shipwrights' Associatio...
National Amalgamated Sheet Metal Workers...
United Operative Plumbers' Association.
Gasworkers' and General Labourers' Union
Parliamentary Committee Trades Union Cong...
Boot and Shoe Operatives' Society.
Miners' Federation of Great Britain.
United Machine Workers' Association.
Associated Iron and Steel Workers of Great ...
Amalgamated Society of Wood-cutting Machi...
National Amalgamated Union of Labour.
The Workers' Union.
Amalgamated Toolmakers.
Shipbuilding Trades Agreement Committee.
General Federation of Trade Unions.
General Union of Textile Workers.

There were also present :—

The Right Hon. A. J. Balfour, M.P., the Ri... Montagu, M.P., Dr. Macnamara, M.P., Mr. Har... General Sir J. Wolfe Murray (Chief of the Imperi... Rear-Admiral Tudor (Third Sea Lord), Rear-Admir... Captain Grestorex, Captain Dumas, Sir Hubert ... Sir George Askwith, Sir Francis Hopwood, Sir ... Charles Harris, Mr. W. H. Beveridge, Mr. Lla... Cummings, Mr. Shackleton.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer, ... the conference, said :—

Gentlemen,—I am exceedingly oblige... responding to the invitation which was ... by the President of the Board of Trade ... to come here to-day. Lord Kitchener ... apologize for his inability to be here, ina... had fixed an inspection some time ago, ... not possibly put it off. Otherwise he had ... be present in order to discuss the matters ... pose to put before you. He is represe... General Wolfe Murray, the Chief of the S... Admiralty is also represented.

The President of the Board of Trade ... on behalf of the Government, have inv... not to consider any particular trade in... consider the general position in reference ... need of the country to expand to the large... increase in the output of munitions of w... urge which the Government propose ... organize the industries of the country ... as nothing like that. You know that ... a serious one. You know it to be the ... to [illegible] Kitchener in the course of ... at Mansion House a few months ago ... you have discussed this question ... we have discussed it, and we ... that it is necessary that we should ... the best possible use of the resources ... this country in order to meet the ... [illegible] which are being made upon us ... [illegible] Now, gentlemen, I ... [illegible] to you ... [illegible] ... [illegible] ... [illegible]

WAR SERVICE FOR WOMEN.

GOVERNMENT SCHEME.

INDUSTRIAL MOBILIZATION.

Prominent attention has been called in The Times to the problem of getting women to fill the places of men as far as possible in the ranks of trade and industry, and so at once release more and more men for the Army and maintain in full activity the supply of those necessaries without which, as Lord Kitchener said, our soldiers in the field cannot fight. We are glad to learn that the Board of Trade in behalf of the Government have been at work on the problem and have now framed a scheme with a view to dealing with it. The scope and character of the Government scheme is set out in the following official statement :—

WAR SERVICE FOR WOMEN.

The President of the Board of Trade wishes to call attention to the fact that in the present emergency, if the full fighting power of the nation is to be put forth on the field of battle, the full working power of the nation must be made available to carry on its essential trades at home. Already, in certain important occupations there are not enough men and women to do the work. This shortage will certainly spread to other occupations as more and more men join the fighting forces.

In order to meet both the present and the future needs of national industry during the war, the Government wish to obtain particulars of the women available, with or without previous training, for paid employment. Accordingly, they invite all women who are prepared, if needed, to take paid employment of any kind—industrial, agricultural, clerical, &c.—to enter themselves upon the Register of Women for War Service which is being prepared by the Board of Trade Labour Exchanges.

Any woman living in a town where there is a Labour Exchange can register by going there in person. If she is not near a Labour Exchange she can get a form of registration from the local agency of the Unemployment Fund. Forms will also be sent out through a number of women's societies.

The object of registration is to find out what reserve force of women's labour, trained or untrained, can be made available if required. As from time to time actual openings for employment present themselves, notice will be given through the Labour Exchanges, with full details as to the nature of work, conditions, and pay, and, so far as special training is necessary, arrangements will if possible, be made for the purpose.

Any woman who by working helps to release a man or to equip a man for fighting does national war service. Every woman should register who is able and willing to take employment.

By setting up this "Register of Women for War Service" the Board of Trade hope in the first place to obtain a census of all the available female labour supply, and then, from this reserve, to make good in some measure both the existing shortage in specific trades and any future shortages in the labour market that may be created by new demands on the manhood of the country. They will endeavour to ascertain as exhaustively as possible the occupations in which women have previously been engaged and in which they could and would be ready to engage again, as well as those in which fresh volunteers could do very well, with a little training. Having ascertained what the supply is, and classified it, they will be in a position to give reasonable assurances to employers in various trades and occupations that if patriotically they allow their men to go women can be supplied to take their place.

The 400 Labour Exchanges throughout the country have received, or will presently receive, instructions and registration forms. In the forms applicants, after entering their name, age, and whether they are married, single, or widow, will be invited to answer such questions as these :—

"Have you ever done any paid work, and, if so, what?" "If so, when; what kind, employer's name or names?" "Are you free to work—(a) whole time; (b) part time; (c) to leave your home for work if pay is sufficient, and housing satisfactory?" "Is there any other kind of work which you are willing and able to do?" "Are you prepared to be trained for work which you have not previously done?"

There are also a series of questions for persons willing to do agricultural work. All the women's societies, political, educational, and social, have been invited to lend their aid and cooperation in making known and promoting the success of this side of the scheme, and a great number have promised to do so. There is every reason to hope that the end of next week will see a large number of names entered on this register of women for war service.

With the enormous demands on the war industries women who want to work can get work, and remunerative work too. For light machine work for armaments and making of cartridge cases and shell cases there is almost no limit to the number of hands that could be employed. In engaging for this sphere women may feel that they are doing something to relieve what Lord Kitchener has described as his "very serious anxiety." The Army clothing factories require all the recruits they can get. The Prime Minister himself has endorsed and emphasized the call of the farmers for more labour on the land.

The case of the country woman presents a little difficulty. Where her husband has joined the Army she has in her separation allowance more money coming in than in many cases she ever had before. But the Board of Trade hope that through this scheme country women will patriotically come forward in greater numbers to take the place of their husbands

A MOBILIZED NATION.

CALL TO WORK AND SOBRIETY.

MR. LLOYD GEORGE'S APPEAL.

Mr. Lloyd George, in opening a conference of representatives of trade unions at the Treasury yesterday, made an earnest appeal to employers and workmen to sink their differences and to concentrate on a larger, increase in the output of munitions of war.

A sub-committee of the Labour representatives afterwards met and drafted a report recommending that the Government should appoint an Advisory Board, to consist of an equal number of representatives of employers and workmen, to assist in securing the greatest possible acceleration in the output of war materials.

A conference of representatives of Trade Unions met the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the President of the Board of Trade at their request at the Treasury yesterday, for the purpose of discussing certain matters of importance to labour arising out of the recent decision of the Government, embodied in the Defence of the Realm (Amendment) Act, to take further steps to organize the resources of the country to meet naval and military requirements.

Representatives of the following trade unions were present :—

Friendly Society of Ironfounders.
British Steel Smelters' Association.
Amalgamated Society of Engineers.
Federation of Engineering and Shipbuilding Trades.
National Transport Workers' Federation.
General Union of Textile Workers.
Amalgamated Society of Carpenters and Joiners.
Boilermakers and Iron and Steel Shipbuilders' Society.
Shipconstructors' and Shipwrights' Association.
National Amalgamated Sheet Metal Workers.
United Operative Plumbers' Association.
Gasworkers' and General Labourers' Union.
Parliamentary Committee Trades Union Congress.
Boot and Shoe Operatives' Society.
Miners' Federation of Great Britain.
United Machine Workers' Association.
Associated Iron and Steel Workers of Great Britain.
Amalgamated Society of Wood-cutting Machinists.
National Amalgamated Union of Labour.
The Workers' Union.
Amalgamated Toolmakers.
Shipbuilding Trades Agreement Committee.
General Federation of Trade Unions.
General Union of Textile Workers.

There were also present :—

The Right Hon. A. J. Balfour, M.P., the Right Hon. Edwin Montagu, M.P., Dr. Macnamara, M.P., Mr. Harold Baker, M.P., General Sir J. Wolfe Murray (Chief of the Imperial General Staff), Rear-Admiral Tudor (Third Sea Lord), Rear-Admiral Morgan Singer, Captain Greatorex, Captain Dumas, Sir Hubert Llewellyn Smith, Sir George Askwith, Sir Francis Hopwood, Sir George Gibb, Sir Charles Harris, Mr. W. H. Beveridge, Mr. Isaac Mitchell, Mr. Cummings, Mr. Shackleton.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in opening the conference, said :—

Gentlemen,—I am exceedingly obliged to you for responding to the invitation which was sent to you by the President of the Board of Trade and myself to come here to-day. Lord Kitchener wishes me to apologize for his inability to be here, inasmuch as he had fixed an inspection some time ago, and he could not possibly put it off. Otherwise he had intended to be present in order to discuss the matters which I propose to put before you. He is represented here by General Wolfe Murray, the Chief of his Staff, and the Admiralty is also represented.

The President of the Board of Trade and myself, on behalf of the Government, have invited you here not to consider any particular trade dispute, but to consider the general position in reference to the urgent need of the country in regard to the large and a larger increase in the output of munitions of war, and the steps which the Government propose to take to organize the industries of the country, with a view to achieving that end. You know that the position is a serious one. You know it by the speech delivered by Lord Kitchener in the House of Lords, I think on Monday last. In every country engaged in the war they have discovered that the expenditure of war material is considerably in excess of any anticipation ever made by any General Staff; so that, even in the best-prepared countries, the pressure is beyond anything that anyone ever expected. In France they have met it by organizing the whole of the industries of the country. In this country we have had the additional difficulty of having to increase our Army too fast, and therefore the pressure upon this country is greater, in consequence of that fact, than upon any other country engaged in the war. The position of the cases there is almost no limit to the number of hands that could be employed. In engaging for this sphere women may feel that they are doing something to relieve what Lord Kitchener has described as his "very serious anxiety." The Army clothing factories require all the recruits they can get. The Prime Minister himself has endorsed and emphasized the call of the farmers for more labour on the land.

The case of the country woman presents a little difficulty. Where her husband has joined the Army she has in her separation allowance more money coming in than in many cases she ever had before, but the Board of Trade hope that through this scheme country women will patriotically come forward in greater numbers to take the place of their husbands who have gone to the front. In this connexion it may be stated that the agricultural colleges have undertaken to train women in suitable branches of farm work.

increase in the output of munitions of war, and the steps which the Government propose to take to organize the industries of the country, with a view to achieving that end. You know that the position is a serious one. You know it by the speech delivered by Lord Kitchener in the House of Lords, I think on Monday last. In every country engaged in the war they have discovered that the expenditure of war material is considerably in excess of any anticipation ever made by any General Staff; so that, even in the best-prepared countries, the pressure is beyond anything that anyone ever expected. In France they have met it by organizing the whole of the industries of the country. In this country we have had the additional difficulty of having to increase our Army ten-fold, and therefore the pressure upon this country is greater, in consequence of that fact, than upon any other country engaged in the war. The duration of the war and therefore its cost, not merely in money, but in lives and in suffering, and even the success of this country in the war, depend upon our increasing and accelerating the output of munitions of war.

MORAL OF NEUVE CHAPELLE.

I have no doubt you have read the account of the battle which took place last week, which gives you a very good idea of what the increase in the output of munitions means, not merely from the point of view of success, but from the point of view of the lives which you save if an army is well equipped. The position for the attack was prepared by the most tremendous concentration of artillery fire that has probably been witnessed upon any given point during the whole of this war. What was the effect of that? It was not merely to ensure success, but, what was equally important, its effect was to save the lives of British soldiers in the attack that was made. The French told me in France when I was there that by a concentration of fire upon a particular point they were able to achieve their purpose with one-tenth of the loss of life which they otherwise would have needed to accomplish that object. So that the turning out of munitions of war not merely means success, but it means the saving of lives; and as we are all making our contribution in that respect from every class, without distinction, in sending those who are related to us to the war, we are anxious to see our country win, and we are also anxious to save the lives of our people. That is why it is not merely urgent that we should get an increased output; it is urgent that we should accelerate it. Every month that there is delay in the output may mean two or three months added to the duration of the war, with all its horrors.

The Government have, therefore, decided to take action—absolutely unprecedented action—in organizing the industries of this country for the purpose of increasing the output, in order to give support to our gallant countrymen when they advance to the attack against the enemy. It is an absolutely unprecedented action so far as this country is concerned. I think that organization has already been achieved in France. It was achieved, I think, voluntarily there; but it was done there under the pressure of invasion. In this country we have the Defence of the Realm Acts. The last, and perhaps the most drastic of them, was carried yesterday, and I believe the Royal Assent was given to it last night. Under those Acts of Parliament we have the power to assume control or to take over any works in this country which are either turning out munitions of war or which are capable of being adapted for that purpose. That is what I want to consult you about.

Although we have the power, we cannot exercise it unless we have the complete cooperation of employers and workmen. What does it mean? I do not want to use the term "taking over" without explaining that it is capable of an interpretation which I do not wish to put upon it. By taking over a works we do not mean to establish an admiral or a general in command of the works, turning adrift those who are managing them at the present moment. That is an impossible task. Our admirals and generals have as much to do as they possibly can, and, with the greatest confidence in them, we do not think they would manage works of this kind with the skill of those who are accustomed to that kind of task. That is not what we mean.

LIMITATION OF PROFITS.

We mean to assume control of works which are now being exclusively devoted to that purpose. There are certain works which are not adapted for that kind of control, but there are others which are, and the great works which are now being used for the purpose of the production of munitions of war are eminently works of that kind. Above all, we propose to impose a limitation of profits, because we can quite see that it is very difficult for us to appeal to labour to relax restrictions and to put out the whole of its strength unless some condition of this kind is imposed. The workmen of the country, I am perfectly certain, are prepared to put their whole strength into helping the war, so long as they know that it is the State that is getting the benefit of it, and that it does not merely enure to the profit of any particular individual or class. If we are merely to take over the works and assume control and guarantee profits within that limit, you will realize that means that the employer has not quite the same interest as he has now in limiting expenditure. Therefore, we might be face to face, not merely with the employees making demands upon the State which we for the moment might regard as unreasonable, but we might find the employers in combination with them, and therefore we should have employers and employed combining to bring pressure upon the State, and we should not be in a position to deal with it unless we had a complete understanding in advance. That is exactly what we want. Before we undertake the control and direction of these works and undertake the responsibility for them we must have a complete understanding with the employers and the employed.

What understanding can be asked for? The understanding we must get with the employers is an understanding with regard to the limitation of profits; that we must get, and an understanding, of course, that whatever the State wants done that shall be done. I do not dwell upon these two points; those are matters which I shall have to put before the employers when the time comes, but these are the points I wish to put before the representatives of the workmen. For the moment we are liable to have important work interrupted by labour disputes. As I have said before, it is not a question of who is to blame there The question is, How is the interruption of work to be prevented whilst you are settling the dispute? That is the matter which is important to us to consider. Speaking on behalf of the Government, we do not say that the workmen ought never to complain, or that the workmen ought never to ask for an increase of wages; that is not our point. Our point is that during the time the questions at issue are being adjudicated upon the work shall go on. The first proposition, therefore, which I shall put before you for your consideration is this:—

> With a view to preventing loss of production caused by disputes between employers and workpeople, no stoppage of work by strike or lock-out should take place on work for Government purposes. In the event of difficulties arising which fail to be settled by the parties directly concerned, or by their representatives, or under any existing agreement, the matter shall be referred to an impartial tribunal nominated by his Majesty's Government for immediate investigation and report to the Government with a view to a settlement. All this is purely during the continuation of the war, and does not bear on anything that might happen after the war.

THREE SUGGESTIONS.

There are three suggestions which I put forward for the settlement of disputes. The first is that a single arbitrator agreed upon by the parties or appointed by the Board of Trade should adjudicate. The second one is the Committee on Production. I think that consists of Sir George Askwith, Sir Francis Hopwood, and Sir George Gibb. The third proposition is that a Court of Arbitration shall be set up upon which labour is represented equally with the employers. Those are the three methods I put before you for your consideration. That is my first proposition. I should like, on behalf of the Government, to establish an understanding with labour that in works which are turning out munitions and equipment for the war, where there is a dispute occurring there shall be no dropping of tools, but that some means shall be established by which the dispute shall be settled without any interruption of the work.

The second point is a very difficult and a very delicate one to handle, as I know. I am very glad at this point to be able to give you good news from the Clyde. There are some of you here who know it, but there are others who perhaps have not heard it. I believe there has been a ballot on the Clyde, which began about a week ago, and I understand that although the ballot is scarcely completed, the result is overwhelmingly in favour of accepting the Government's proposals for arbitration in the matter. (Cheers.) We are exceedingly grateful to those who have assisted to bring about this end. We know how difficult it is under those conditions to face men who are pressing forward their grievances and who are always rather inclined to doubt the zeal of those who counsel moderation.

The second proposition is the suspension, where necessary, during the war of restrictions of output. Here again I want to make it perfectly clear that I am only discussing this suspension during the war. The increase in output is so essential to us where we have to turn out munitions of war, not merely for ourselves, but to help our Allies, that I do hope you will assist us for the moment by suspending the operation of any rules or regulations which tend to diminish the output. I know it is a very difficult question for you to decide upon, but it is very very important for the State at the present juncture.

EMPLOYMENT OF FEMALE LABOUR.

There is the question of the number of machines which one man is permitted to attend to. There is the question of the employment of semi-skilled labour, where under normal conditions you could not assent to it: and there is the question of the employment of female labour. In France there is a vast amount of work being done by women and by girls in the ammunition factories. In that country they have suspended all these rules and regulations for the time being because they realize that the ecurity of their country depends upon it.

I have pointed out that in the factories where munitions of war are made there is a very considerable employment of women labour. They are employing semi-skilled labour where before the war the workmen would not have assented to it, and for the same reason as we are making an appeal here. The way in which France has met her responsibilities is one of the most astonishing chapters in the history of any country, and it is something of which democracy can be proud. The French Government has shown that democracy, when put to the test, is quite equal to any strain placed upon it, and that is exactly what we have to prove in this country.

These are the two propositions which I put before you with regard to the increase in the output. The first is that there should be a means, and a summary means, of settling disputes as they arise, without resort either to strikes or lock-outs. The second is that there should be, during the duration of the war, a complete suspension, where necessary (I do not want it except when it is necessary), for the purpose of increasing the output, of all rules and regulations that have the effect of restricting the output.

THE MINORITY AND DRINK.

I am sorry to say that I have to refer to another is very difficult to talk about it without creating an impression which is not very helpful for the moment. But it is very much better that you should understand entirely what the position is. (Hear, hear.) The resources of this country are enormous: in fact, the resources of this country are greater than those of any other country in this war, and the ultimate triumph of the cause of the Allies will depend, I think, upon the way in which we mobilize the whole of those forces.

There are two alternatives before this country, and they are alternatives which must be presented to every class here. At the end of this war we shall either be the vassals of the German military caste, drunk with success, or we shall have broken militarism for ever. (Cheers.) It is because I realize as a democrat how very important that is that I am making this appeal to the leaders of the workmen to assist us to organize our industries.

The President of the Board of Trade and myself will make exactly the same appeal to the employers—that it is important for us to mobilize to the last the whole of our resources, so that we shall be able as a nation, perfectly united, to march to a victory, which is essential, I can assure you, to human liberty. (Cheers.)

After a short discussion the trade union representatives consulted among themselves, and a further meeting with the Government representatives took place in the afternoon, after which the Conference adjourned until to-day.

In the event of difficulties arising which fail to be settled by the parties directly concerned, or by their representatives, or under any existing agreement, the matter shall be referred to an impartial tribunal nominated by his Majesty's Government for immediate investigation and report to the Government with a view to a settlement. All this is purely during the continuation of the war, and does not bear on anything that might happen after the war.

THREE SUGGESTIONS.

There are three suggestions which I put forward for the settlement of disputes. The first is that a single arbitrator agreed upon by the parties or appointed by the Board of Trade should adjudicate. The second one is the Committee on Production. I think that consists of Sir George Askwith, Sir Francis Hopwood, and Sir George Gibb. The third proposition is that a Court of Arbitration shall be set up upon which labour is represented equally with the employers. Those are the three methods I put before you for your consideration. That is my first proposition. I should like, on behalf of the Government, to establish an understanding with labour that in works which are turning out munitions and equipment for the war, where there is a dispute occurring there shall be no dropping of tools, but that some means shall be established by which the dispute shall be settled without any interruption of the work.

The second point is a very difficult and a very delicate one to handle, as I know. I am very glad at this point to be able to give you good news from the Clyde. There are some of you here who know it, but there are others who perhaps have not heard it. I believe there has been a ballot on the Clyde, which began about a week ago, and I understand that although the ballot is scarcely completed, the result is overwhelmingly in favour of accepting the Government's proposals for arbitration in the matter. (Cheers.) We are exceedingly grateful to those who have assisted to bring about this end. We know how difficult it is under those conditions to face men who are pressing forward their grievances and who are always rather inclined to doubt the zeal of those who counsel moderation.

The second proposition is the suspension, where necessary, during the war of restrictions of output. Here again I want to make it perfectly clear that I am only discussing this suspension during the war. The increase in output is so essential to us where we have to turn out munitions of war, not merely for ourselves, but to help our Allies, that I do hope you will assist us for the moment by suspending the operation of any rules or regulations which tend to diminish the output. I know it is a very difficult question for you to decide upon, but it is very very important for the State at the present juncture.

EMPLOYMENT OF FEMALE LABOUR.

There is the question of the number of machines which one man is permitted to attend to. There is the question of the employment of semi-skilled labour, where under normal conditions you could not assent to it: and there is the question of the employment of female labour. In France there is a vast amount of work being done by women and by girls in the ammunition factories. In that country they have suspended all these rules and regulations for the time being because they realize that the ecurity of their country depends upon it.

I have pointed out that in the factories where munitions of war are made there is a very considerable employment of women labour. They are employing semi-skilled labour where before the war the workmen would not have assented to it, and for the same reason as we are making an appeal here. The way in which France has met her responsibilities is one of the most astonishing chapters in the history of any country, and it is something of which democracy can be proud. The French Government has shown that democracy, when put to the test, is quite equal to any strain placed upon it, and that is exactly what we have to prove in this country.

Those are the two propositions which I put before you with regard to the increase in the output. The first is that there should be a means, and a summary means, of settling disputes as they arise, without resort either to strikes or lock-outs. The second is that there should be, during the duration of the war, a complete suspension, where necessary (I do not want it except when it is necessary), for the purpose of increasing the output, of all rules and regulations that have the effect of restricting the output.

THE MINORITY AND DRINK.

I am sorry to say that I have to refer to another question of a totally different character, and I hope no one will misunderstand me when I drag it in. It has absolutely nothing to do with the first part of the proposition, but at the same time it is a question where we must have the influence and support of the leaders of organized labour behind us. I am referring now to the effect which excessive drinking amongst a minority of the workmen in some districts has upon the output. Believe me, I am very loth to mention it; one is so apt to be misconstrued. It may be said, "You are bringing a charge against the working classes." I am doing nothing of the kind. I am referring to a minority. But, as you know perfectly well, where the minority do that, they may throw the whole works out of gear, and very often they prevent men who are anxious to go on with their work from continuing that work.

I am sorry to say that I am acting upon reports we have got both from the Admiralty and the War Office. In some districts it is very serious. In some areas it is interfering with the amount of the output, and gravely interfering with it. In other areas it is interfering with the transport. Transport has been delayed where we are sending not merely munitions of war, but necessaries to our troops at the front. I am sure you will prefer I should talk quite plainly about it. (Cheers.) It is very much better that we should do it, whatever the misconstruction is.

I think you will agree with me that that is a very disastrous thing to happen during the period of the war, and it involves very strong action on the part of the Government. But we cannot take action effectively unless we have the support of the Labour leaders throughout the country. I am sure we shall get it in whatever action we think necessary to apply to that state of things.

GRAVITY OF THE SITUATION.

I have this to say in conclusion. The Government would not have summoned this conference unless they knew the gravity of the situation. It same reason as we are making an appeal here. The way in which France has met her responsibilities is one of the most astonishing chapters in the history of any country, and it is something of which democracy can be proud. The French Government has shown that democracy, when put to the test, is quite equal to any strain placed upon it, and that is exactly what we have to prove in this country.

---

Af

Influ

Those are the two propositions which I put before you with regard to the increase in the output. The first is that there should be a means, and a summary means, of settling disputes as they arise, without resort either to strikes or lock-outs. The second is that there should be, during the duration of the war, a complete suspension, where necessary (I do not want it except when it is necessary), for the purpose of increasing the output, of all rules and regulations that have the effect of restricting the output.

THE MINORITY AND DRINK.

I am sorry to say that I have to refer to another question of a totally different character, and I hope no one will misunderstand me when I drag it in. It has absolutely nothing to do with the first part of the proposition, but at the same time it is a question where we must have the influence and support of the leaders of organized labour behind us. I am referring now to the effect which excessive drinking amongst a minority of the workmen in some districts has upon the output. Believe me, I am very loth to mention it; one is so apt to be misconstrued. It may be said, "You are bringing a charge against the working classes." I am doing nothing of the kind. I am referring to a minority. But, as you know perfectly well, where the minority do that, they may throw the whole works out of gear, and very often they prevent men who are anxious to go on with their work from continuing that work.

I am sorry to say that I am acting upon reports we have got both from the Admiralty and the War Office. In some districts it is very serious. In some areas it is interfering with the amount of the output, and gravely interfering with it. In other areas it is interfering with the transport. Transport has been delayed where we are sending not merely munitions of war, but necessaries to our troops at the front. I am sure you will prefer I should talk quite plainly about it. (Cheers.) It is very much better that we should do it, whatever the misconstruction is.

I think you will agree with me that that is a very disastrous thing to happen during the period of the war, and it involves very strong action on the part of the Government. But we cannot take action effectively unless we have the support of the Labour leaders throughout the country. I am sure we shall get it in whatever action we think necessary to apply to that state of things.

GRAVITY OF THE SITUATION.

I have this to say in conclusion. The Government would not have summoned this conference unless they knew the gravity of the situation. It

Af
Influ
nothing
ANGIER'S
PETROLEUM
HYPOPHOS
Of all Chemists.
The unique soothing, healing properties of Angier's Emulsion, combined with its strengthening and nerve-tonic properties, make it invaluable after influenza. It stops the cough, heals the inflamed tissues, restores
"16 YEARS EXPERIE
I have had sixteen years experience, both hospital and private, under our leading physicians, and know that during all this time Angier's Emulsion has been largely ordered in pulmonary and wasting diseases.
FREE SAMPLE. Send name
ANGIER CHE
Illustrated booklet d used in present

663/3 60

The Standard, March 18th. 1915.

TO RELEASE THE MEN.

REPLACEMENT BY WOMEN.

STRONG APPEAL BY THE GOVERNMENT.

DETAILS OF SCHEME.

TRAINING IN ALL KINDS OF INDUSTRIES.

By a direct appeal to women to free men for the fighting line the Government has brought to every home recognition, as never before, of the immense gravity of the present national crisis.

"Are you able to work and free to work, but not working?" is the question addressed today to every woman in the United Kingdom by the Government, which has officially inaugurated a "War Service for Women" movement which is of the utmost importance and significance. It is officially recognised that there are thousands of women able, and probably in most cases eager, to perform the work in various industries which is now performed by men, of course for payment, and thus to free those men for enlistment in the King's forces. To facilitate the employment of women to carry on "business as usual" when more and yet more men are required for the Army and Navy the Government Labour Exchanges have opened special registers of women for war service. It is not a question of employing women who must work for their daily bread, but of inducing all idle women to work to their utmost capacity to get the nation's needs supplied.

RATE OF WAGES PROBLEM.

The chief problem of this vast undertaking is the difficulty of maintaining rates of wages. There are some industries in which a woman can do a man's work as well as he can, but not many. Grasping employers may in some cases seek to exploit the relative inefficiency of women's labour by paying women disproportionately low wages, and labour interests will naturally be keenly on the look-out for such conduct. The introduction of women of all classes in large numbers into occupations of all kinds involves an appeal to the patriotism not only of the women themselves, who are asked to undertake daily tasks possibly quite uncongenial, but to the men who will gradually be enabled or forced to recognise that they are more needed in the firing line than at home, and to employers who will be perplexed by the adjustment of wages, and will be disinclined to allow men who know their work to be replaced by women who have much to learn, and, perhaps, in the employers' opinions, can never be "quite so good."

The Government—which is as much as to say Our Country—wants a steady supply of men for the Regular Forces, and means to have it. Any man eligible for "the front" must expect to be asked, sooner or later, to fulfil his patriotic duty, for which all women are essentially ineligible, by taking his place in the firing line. It is the duty of every woman, if she is not already completely occupied by household or other duties, to qualify for performing some man's work, to free a man, sooner or later, for "the front."

HOW TO HELP.

"Every woman who can work and is free to work should come forward," says the Board of Trade, speaking for the Government. "Women are wanted at once for farm work, dairy work, leather stitching, brushmaking, clothing machining, and light machining for armament. If you have no experience of this work you should nevertheless register. It may be possible to train you. It is certain that as more men join the forces more women will be wanted to work while they are away. Even if you can work only half of each day you may be useful. Any woman who by working helps to release a man or equip a man for fighting does national war service."

This is an appeal of tremendous force and authority, and there can be no doubt at all that women will respond to it in tens of thousands. Forms for filling up can be obtained at any post-office or Labour Exchange. After personal particulars of name, age, and so forth, a woman is asked to state whether she has ever done any paid work, and, if so, what (and when), and whether she is free to work her whole time or part of her time, and to leave her home for work "if pay is sufficient and housing satisfactory." If a woman has never done paid work she is asked to state what kind of work she is best suited for.

TO ALL CLASSES.

"This is an appeal to women of all classes," said a Board of Trade official to a representative of The Standard yesterday. "If the full fighting power of the nation is to be put forth on the field of battle, the full working power of the nation must be made available to carry on its essential trades at home. Already in many important occupations there are not enough men and women to do the work. As more and more men join the fighting forces this shortage will certainly spread to other occupations. The Government wants, therefore, particulars of all women prepared, if needed, to take paid employment of any kind, industrial, agricultural, clerical, or any other, and women are therefore asked to register themselves at once. Special training may be given, if required. The primary object of this movement is to get the nation's work efficiently done, and especially the armies in the field supplied with equipment and munitions of war, while freeing the greatest possible number of men for active service.

AGRICULTURAL LABOUR.

"If farmers tell us that they don't want women to work for them, and that it is 'all rubbish,' well, that will show that for the moment it is true that they can do without the women. They would be only too glad to employ women if there were no men to employ. The time will come, sooner or later, when they will feel the dearth of men more than they do now. Women can do milking, dairy work, market gardening, and poultry farming, and look after live stock, almost as well, if not quite as well, as men. We want to be able to say to employers of all kinds: 'We have this woman who will work for you if you can get your man to enlist.'"

63.

The Daily Dispatch, March 18th. 1915.

WOMEN'S AID

To Release Men for the State.

GOVERNMENT CENSUS.

Registration of Offers of Service.

NEW PROPOSALS.

Labour Exchanges To Be Utilised.

An appeal to the women of the country to come forward for war service employment was issued last night by the Board of Trade. The President, it was stated in the document, wishes to call attention to the fact that if the full fighting power of the nation is to be put forth on the field of battle, the full working power of the nation must be made available to carry on its essential trades at home. Already in some important occupations there are not enough men and women to do the work. This shortage will certainly spread to other occupations as more and more men join the fighting forces.

In order to meet both the present and the future needs of national industry during the war the Government wish to obtain particulars of the women available, with or without previous training, for paid employment. Accordingly they invite all women who are prepared, if needed, to take paid employment of any kind—industrial, agricultural, clerical, etc.—to enter themselves upon the register of women for war service which is being prepared by the Board of Trade Labour Exchanges.

Registration forms can be obtained through the Labour Exchanges, the local agencies of the Unemployment Fund, a number of women's societies, or the general manager of the Board of Trade Labour Exchanges.

The object of registration is to find out what reserve forces of women's labour, trained or untrained, can be made available if required. As from time to time actual openings for employment present themselves notice will be given through the Labour Exchanges, with full details as to the nature of work, conditions, and pay, and, so far as special training is necessary, arrangements will, if possible, be made for the purpose.

Any woman who, by working, helps to release a man or to equip a man for fighting does national war service, and every woman should register who is able and willing to take employment.

Women Tram Conductors?

Our Bradford correspondent learned on inquiry last night that this will have little effect on Bradford, as practically all working women are absorbed by the textile industry, and work could be found for more were they available.

There is a shortage of men in the tramway and railway services, owing to so many men having joined the colours, and the suggestion has been made that women be employed as tram conductors and as carriage cleaners.

On the railways there would, however, probably be some difficulty with railwaymen, who are strongly organised, and might object to work alongside of women at the same job. As a matter of fact, Bradford railwaymen have a grievance about a proposal to employ Belgian refugees as carriage cleaners on one of the lines, and a local Belgian refugee committee will meet a deputation of the men to-day to discuss the matter.

Substantial Sacrifices Necessary.

Speaking on behalf of the Women's Defence Corps, Mrs. Verity, of Whalley Range, a prominent member of the committee, said she welcomed the announcement of the Board of Trade. That defence corps has over 300 members, and they are all enthusiastic about their work.

Amongst them there are women and girls who are typists and shorthand writers who (she thinks) are able to take the place of men who might offer their services to the Government. They were, she believed, quite willing to fall in with the scheme, and expressed her willingness of laying the matter before them at an early meeting.

Speaking generally on the duties of women, Mrs. Verity said:—"I believe they will have to be prepared to make substantial sacrifices now. The country obviously wants all the men it can get, and women will have to look out and see what they can do to help in this emergency. The existence of a corps like ours will, of course, help to focuss their efforts and place members in proper touch with such work as they are able to undertake.

"Some of them," she added, "are sufficiently well educated to undertake foreign correspondence, whilst others have business capabilities and could relieve men in that capacity."

She instanced cases in which that had already been done, and with the greatest satisfaction to employers.

Authorities Hitherto Not Sympathetic.

Mrs. E. D. Simon, a well-known Manchester lady, who is a member of the Executive Committee of the National Union of Women Workers, interviewed last night by a Daily Dispatch representative, thought the idea of the Board of Trade would have good results if properly worked. "It seems to be an excellent idea," she said, "if they can get hold of the women available.

"I find that large numbers of women are willing to help the nation at this time as far as they possibly can. The municipal authorites, at any rate in Manchester," added Mrs. Simon, "have not been very ready to employ women instead of men, and I think a good deal more might be done in that way.

"Women might be employed in many capacities in place of men, such, for instance, as tram conductors and for clerical work. Now that the Board of Trade has brought the matter forward, perhaps the municipality may be more inclined to take it up."

Daily Express, March 18th. 1915.

Women and the War.

The Board of Trade have evolved a scheme for enlisting women in the war—not by sending them to the front, but by inviting them to accept employment which will release men for fighting purposes. We may be sure that the appeal will meet with a substantial response, because the women are as wholeheartedly in this enterprise as the men, and, incidentally, we may be sure that the supporters of the enfranchisement of women will make the fullest possible use of it when the war is over. The Board of Trade has been considering this question for some time, indeed, women have already been transferred from some industries where work is slack to neighbourhoods where armaments are being manufactured. The appeal, therefore, to women to register themselves for service is frankly based upon the belief that more men will be released for fighting purposes. To be effective it needs doing on a large scale, and the Government first of all desire to know what reserve force of women's labour there is available. When that is ascertained they will be in a position to act, and employers of labour, who would be quite willing to encourage their young men to join the colours if they were sure of being able to "carry on," will be re-assured. At any rate the appeal is now made, and the women are informed that any of their number "who by working helps to release a man or to equip a man for fighting does national war service."

663/4 663

Pall Mall Gazette, March 18th. 1915.

Women's Chance.

It is clear that the response to the Government's appeal to women will be principally a middle-class one. The reason, of course, is that in that class there are more unoccupied and capable women than in any other. All over the country are thousands of women, well educated and eager to be helpful, but hitherto denied the opportunity. It has come now; and, as a result, in London alone, in the first few hours of yesterday, over seven hundred gave in their names as willing and able to help. The various women's social and political societies have also taken up the effort in a spirit both helpful and enthusiastic; and there is every sign that within the next few months we shall see thousands of able and intelligent women helping the country in countless ways to "keep going" while our men are at the firing-line.

The most tragic thing in life is the intelligent unoccupied woman of small means or entirely dependent, who goes drifting through life, hugging perhaps some impracticable ideal, but doing and earning nothing. No life is so drearily frittered away, no powers are so disastrously wasted, as hers. Here comes her chance. She is educated, she is intelligent, she has good manners and a pleasant appearance. Let her give in her name. A thousand positions will soon be open to her as clerk, secretary, bookkeeper, railway and tube ticket clerk, toy-maker, gardener, tram conductor, taxi-driver, shop-assistant, typist, and so on. If in any of these capacities she can give honest work and receive honest pay, will her dignity be lessened? It will be heightened, and life will become a practical instead of a weary and empty thing.

We notice here and there the demand being made that the women who take up these positions shall receive precisely the same wages as the men who have temporarily left them vacant. Where the newcomers' qualifications and experience are the same she is obviously entitled to the same wages. But where the engagement is necessarily somewhat experimental, as it will be in many cases, such a demand would manifestly be excessive. We are, however, entirely on the side of those who, like Mrs. FAWCETT, are labouring to raise the standard of women's work and wages; and we may be sure that the Government will use its influence in the same direction. Once again, in this war as in others, England owes much to her women. Indeed, in the present case, their work and their influence have, we think, been more splendid than they have ever been before. Now, therefore, that we are offering them the work which men have hitherto done (and which men will do again when they return from the war), the guarantees for their fair treatment should be incontestable.

Evening Standard & St. James's Gazette, March 18th. 1915.

6315 663.

WOMEN FOR MEN.

LABOUR VIEWS ON PROPOSED SUBSTITUTION.

40,000 UNEMPLOYED.

MISS MARY MACARTHUR'S QUESTIONS.

The Government's scheme to mobilise women for war service is being taken up enthusiastically by the various organisations of women and by the women themselves. At the Central Office of the Board of Trade Labour Exchanges at Queen Anne's Gate alone, between 30 and 40 women registered themselves this morning, the first calling as early as 9.40.

Whilst there can be no question as to the readiness of women to continue to help the nation to carry on its industries, the proposal of the Board of Trade to institute a "Register of Women for War Service" is one which raises questions of importance to organised labour, and Miss Mary Macarthur points out that organised labour must be satisfied on points of difficulty before the scheme can be wholly successful.

Generally speaking, the idea of the Government to mobilise women who will take the places in various trades and industries of men who have joined the Army is received with favour. The Government proposes that all women who are ready to take paid employment of any kind should enter themselves on the register at the Labour Exchanges, so that our resources in this direction may be known.

"Any woman who by working helps to release or equip a man for service does national war service," says the President of the Board of Trade in his circular. Registration forms invite information as to what kind of paid work, if any, has been done by the person registering, and among the questions are the following:—

Are you free to work (a) whole time, (b) part time, (c) to leave your home for work if pay is sufficient and housing satisfactory?

Is there any other work which you are willing and able to do?

If you have never done paid work, what kind of work are you best suited for?

Are you prepared to be trained for work which you have not previously done?

Difficult and Delicate.

Some of the questions involved in the proposal were mentioned to one of our representatives by Miss Mary Macarthur, who, as the secretary of the Women's Trade Union League, represents 240,000 organised women workers.

"The Government," she said, "would have been well advised before issuing an appeal of this kind to take into consultation the representatives of the organised trade workers, men and women. This question of shortage of men in any particular trade and substitution of women for them is a most difficult and delicate one, and one in which the advice and co-operation of the organised workers is essential.

"I feel that the circular may give a false impression of the actual industrial situation at the moment. I can only imagine that it has been drafted rather with a view to possible eventualities than a present crisis. Whilst we are, of course, aware that there is a shortage of men in many industries, and even a shortage of women in some industries, it is by no means a simple matter to arrange for the transference of labour with different experience or in different areas.

"These difficulties apply to men, but they apply with double force to women, who are naturally less mobile. As I understand this appeal, it is made to women who are not normally wage-earners, and even to women who have not previously been wage-earners.

Assurances Wanted.

"Knowing as I do that at present there are at least 35,000 or 40,000 women who are normal wage-earners unemployed throughout the country, I should like some assurance that the practicability of the adaptation of these women has been fully considered before the introduction of new and presumably economically independent women is contemplated.

"There can be no doubt that the trade unions, even if convinced of the necessity of this innovation, will require a satisfactory guarantee on the various aspects of the proposed substitution."

On what conditions are these women to be substituted for men?

Are they to receive the same wages for the same work?

What guarantee is to be given to men that, when they return to civil life, their situations will be open for them, and that the standard of conditions in their trade remain unimpaired?

And if the men receive satisfactory guarantees, what is to happen to women who have taken their places when they return, if in the meantime the women have become self-dependents?

"The appointment of a national representative committee, including a strong representation of industrial interests, to lay down the conditions of transference is one of the first safeguards which must be insisted upon. The composition of this committee must be such as to inspire confidence in the minds of the working people."

Value of a Register.

Lady Bamford-Slack, the well-known advocate of women's causes, approved of the proposal to obtain the help of women.

"One cannot help feeling," she said, "that it is very essential that men should be set free to join the Army, and that the various industries of the country should also be maintained.

"Women are eminently fitted for many industries. I believe in a register because it is likely to ensure capable and well-trained people for the positions which require such. It is most important to get the right women for the particular positions. Even after the war there will be a certain shortage of men, and, therefore, this work which women have begun to do now they might be required to carry on.

"Of course, the Government should consult the recognised organisations representing the workers, and they should not forget, as they are apt to do, that women are capable of looking after their own affairs, and know something of their own needs and capacities."

Yorkshire Post, March 18th. 1915.

The new move of the Board of Trade regarding women labour is not a surprise. As I indicated the other day, women have already been transferred from some industries where work is slack to neighbourhoods where armaments are being manufactured. These women have proved so adaptable, after a few days' training, that many employers, and even the War Office, are prepared to extend the experiment. In many parts of the country employers are still, to say the least, not encouraging their men to go to the colours, because they do not see where they are to get fresh labour. This is the impelling reason for what is really the beginning of a mobilisation of the women for war service. The Board of Trade cannot do much in a large way until they know exactly what number of women would be prepared to take this war emergency service. Hence the appeal issued to-night. Experience has shown that in moving labour to a new place the housing difficulty is often serious, but it is never so serious in the case of women as of men, who have their families to think about. But the Board of Trade believe that a woman who takes the place of a man who has gone to the front might well live with the wife of the soldier whom she is replacing.

Pall Mall Gazette, March 18th. 1915.

WOMEN WORKERS.

RESPONSE TO THE CALL.

A GOOD START.

EMPLOYERS AND THE SCHEME.

The work of registration in connection with the Government scheme for effectively mobilising the women workers of the country for war service opened yesterday, and satisfactory progress was made.

"Enlistment" is a simple process. Any woman who is ready to take up work has only to register herself at the nearest Labour Exchange. If a visit to the exchange is not convenient a form for registration can be obtained from a post office. It should be filled up and forwarded to the local Labour Exchange.

More than seven hundred women registered in London yesterday.

While there has not yet been time for employers generally to make considered statements about the scheme, there is a distinct disposition to view it favourably. In one quarter it was suggested that the Government themselves might lead the way by releasing the army of second division clerks and copyists.

WOMEN'S VIEWS.

Some interesting views have been expressed by well-known leaders of opinion.

LADY RANDOLPH CHURCHILL.

The women of England are strong and healthy, and now is their great opportunity.

Mrs. HUMPHRY WARD.

Women must, of course, help the Government to the utmost. I think that special organization would be wanted for the middle-class. I would gladly help personally.

Mrs. DACRE FOX.

The proposals are admirable. They provide the first practical opportunity by the State to help women.

Mrs. BRAMWELL BOOTH.

I have not the slightest doubt that middle-class women will do their part in the Government's eminently practical suggestion.

Miss LENA ASHWELL.

The women of England will respond if the Government's offer is genuine and their labour is protected.

Lady MOND.

Farming, dairy work, horticulture, poultry-farming are especially women's work, the opportunity for which should be welcomed with open arms by middle-class women, always provided that the remuneration is the same as that to male workers.

The Daily Express, March 18th. 1915. 663/6 663.

THE APPEAL TO LABOUR.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE MEETS TO ORGANISE THE RESOURCES OF THE COUNTRY.

STATE CONTROL OF PROFITS AND NO STRIKES.

An important conference on the mobilisation of the country's industrial resources was opened yesterday at the Treasury, and was attended by nearly 100 trade union leaders.

Mr. Lloyd George outlined the Government's plans. These include:—

The limitation and guaranteeing of the profits of factories taken over for making munitions of war.

The prohibition of strikes or lock-outs which would hinder Government work. All disputes are to be settled by compulsory arbitration.

The suspension, where necessary, of all regulations restricting output.

The Government have also adopted the "Daily Express" scheme for employing women workers wherever possible. Mr. Lloyd George referred to what France is doing in this direction, and the President of the Board of Trade has issued an appeal to women willing to help to register their names at once at Labour Exchanges.

INTEMPERANCE.

Towards the close of his speech Mr. Lloyd George referred to Admiralty and War Office reports on the results of intemperance, and plainly hinted at "very strong action."

Following the departure of Mr. Lloyd George from the conference, a committee of seven was appointed by the Labour representatives to draft a report embodying the views of the conference.

The sub-committee met and drafted a report, in which the principal recommendation was a proposal that the Government should appoint an Advisory Board, to consist of an equal number of representatives of employers and workmen, to assist them to secure the greatest possible acceleration in the output of war material.

Another important point was a suggestion for safeguarding the interests of members of the skilled trades at the end of the war.

This report was submitted later in the day to Mr. Lloyd George and the Government representatives.

OFFICIAL STATEMENT.

The following official statement was issued last night:—

A conference of representatives of trade unions met the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the President of the Board of Trade at their request at the Treasury to-day for the purpose of discussing the position in regard to the output of munitions of war.

The President of the Board of Trade and myself, on behalf of the Government, have invited you here, not to consider any particular trade dispute, but to consider the general position in reference to the urgent need of the country in regard to the large and a larger increase in the output of munitions of war, and the steps which the Government propose to take to secure that increase.

Parliament we have the power to assume control or to take over any works in this country which are either turning out munitions of war or which are capable of being adapted for that purpose.

That is what I want to consult you about. Although we have the power, we cannot exercise it unless we have the complete co-operation of employers and workmen in the various trades concerned.

We have had a very full discussion with the Admiralty and War Office, and I am bound to say that the information which they have given us has filled us with grave concern. We are all making our contribution in that respect, from every class, without distinction, in sending those who are related to us to the war, we are anxious to see our country win, and we are also anxious to save the lives of our people.

That is why it is not merely urgent that we should get an increased output; it is urgent that we should accelerate it. Every month that there is delay in the output may mean two or three months added to the duration of the war, with all its horrors.

The Government have, therefore, decided to take action—absolutely unprecedented action—in organising the industries of this country for the purpose of increasing the output, in order to give support to our gallant countrymen when they advance to the attack against the enemy. It is an absolutely unprecedented action so far as this country is concerned.

I think that organisation has already been achieved in France. It was achieved, I think, voluntarily there; but it was done there under the pressure of invasion.

In this country we have the Defence of the Realm Acts; the last, and perhaps the most drastic of them, was carried yesterday, and the Royal Assent was given to it last night. Under those Acts he had fixed an inspection some time ago, and he could not possibly put it off. Otherwise he had intended to be present in order to discuss the matters which I propose to put before you. He is represented here by General Wolfe Murray, the Chief of his Staff, and the Admiralty is also represented.

G. R.

WAR SERVICE FOR WOMEN.

The President of the Board of Trade wishes to call attention to the fact that in the present emergency, if the full fighting power of the Nation is to be put forth on the field of battle, the full working power of the Nation must be made available to carry on its essential trades at home. Already in certain important occupations there are not enough men and women to do the work. This shortage will certainly spread to other occupations as more and more men join the fighting forces.

In order to meet both the present and the future needs of national industry during the war, the Government wish to obtain particulars of the women available, with or without previous training, for paid employment. Accordingly, they invite all women who are prepared, if needed, to take paid employment of any kind—industrial, agricultural, clerical, etc.—to enter themselves upon the Register of Women for War Service which is being prepared by the Board of Trade Labour Exchanges.

Any woman living in a town where there is a Labour Exchange can register by going there in person. If she is not near a Labour Exchange she can get a form of registration from the Local Agency of the Unemployment Fund. Forms will also be sent out through a number of women's societies, and can be obtained by post from the General Manager, Board of Trade Labour Exchanges, at the address below.

The object of registration is to find out what reserve force of women's labour, trained or untrained, can be made available if required. As from time to time actual openings for employment present themselves, notice will be given through the Labour Exchanges, with full details as to the nature of work, conditions, and pay, and, so far as special training is necessary, arrangements will, if possible, be made for the purpose.

Any woman who by working helps to release a man or to equip a man for fighting does national war service. Every woman should register who is able and willing to take employment.

Board of Trade, March, 1915.

lock-outs which would hinder Government work. All disputes are to be settled by compulsory arbitration.

The suspension, where necessary, of all regulations restricting output.

The Government have also adopted the "Daily Express" scheme for employing women workers wherever possible. Mr. Lloyd George referred to what France is doing in this direction, and the President of the Board of Trade has issued an appeal to women willing to help to register their names at once at Labour Exchanges.

INTEMPERANCE.

Towards the close of his speech Mr. Lloyd George referred to Admiralty and War Office reports on the results of intemperance, and plainly hinted at "very strong action."

Following the departure of Mr. Lloyd George from the conference, a committee of seven was appointed by the Labour representatives to draft a report embodying the views of the conference.

The sub-committee met and drafted a report, in which the principal recommendation was a proposal that the Government should appoint an Advisory Board, to consist of an equal number of representatives of employers and workmen, to assist them to secure the greatest possible acceleration in the output of war material.

Another important point was a suggestion for safeguarding the interests of members of the skilled trades at the end of the war.

This report was submitted later in the day to Mr. Lloyd George and the Government representatives.

OFFICIAL STATEMENT.

The following official statement was issued last night:—

A conference of representatives of trade unions met the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the President of the Board of Trade at their request at the Treasury to-day for the purpose of discussing certain matters of importance to labour arising out of the recent decision of the Government, embodied in the Defence of the Realm (Amendment) Act, to take further steps to organise the resources of the country to meet naval and military requirements.

Representatives of the following trade unions were present:—

Friendly Society of Ironfounders, British Steel Smelters' Association, Amalgamated Society of Engineers, Federation of Engineering and Shipbuilding Trades, National Transport Workers' Federation, General Union of Textile Workers, Amalgamated Society of Carpenters and Joiners, Boilermakers and Iron and Steel Shipbuilders' Society.

Ship Constructors' and Shipwrights' Association, National Amalgamated Sheet Metal Workers, United Operative Plumbers' Association, Gasworkers' and General Labourers' Union, Parliamentary Committee Trade Union Congress, Boot and Shoe Operatives' Society, Miners' Federation of Great Britain, United Machine Workers' Association.

Associated Iron and Steel Workers of Great Britain, Amalgamated Society of Wood-cutting Machinists, National Amalgamated Union of Labour, the Workers' Union, Amalgamated Toolmakers, Shipbuilding Trades Agreement Committee, General Federation of Trade Unions, General Union of Textile Workers.

There were also present:—

Mr. Balfour, M.P., Mr. Edwin Montague M.P., Dr. Macnamara, M.P., Mr. Harold Baker, M.P.

General Sir J. Wolfe Murray (Chief of the Imperial General Staff), Rear-Admiral Tudor (Third Sea Lord), Rear-Admiral Morgan Singer, Captain Greatorex, Captain Dumas.

Sir Hubert Llewellyn Smith, Sir George Askwith, Sir Francis Hopwood, Sir George Gibb, Sir Charles Harris, Mr. W. H Beveridge, Mr. Isaac Mitchell, Mr. Cummings, Mr. Shackleton.

CHANCELLOR'S SPEECH.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in opening the conference, said:—

I am exceedingly obliged to you for responding to the invitation which was sent to you by the President of the Board of Trade and myself to come here to-day.

Lord Kitchener wishes me to apologise for his inability to be here, inasmuch as

WAR SERVICE FOR WOMEN.

The President of the Board of Trade wishes to call attention to the fact that in the present emergency, if the full fighting power of the Nation is to be put forth on the field of battle, the full working power of the Nation must be made available to carry on its essential trades at home. Already in certain important occupations there are not enough men and women to do the work. This shortage will certainly spread to other occupations as more and more men join the fighting forces.

In order to meet both the present and the future needs of national industry during the war, the Government wish to obtain particulars of the women available, with or without previous training, for paid employment. Accordingly, they invite all women who are prepared, if needed, to take paid employment of any kind—industrial, agricultural, clerical, etc.—to enter themselves upon the Register of Women for War Service which is being prepared by the Board of Trade Labour Exchanges.

Any woman living in a town where there is a Labour Exchange can register by going there in person. If she is not near a Labour Exchange she can get a form of registration from the Local Agency of the Unemployment Fund. Forms will also be sent out through a number of women's societies, and can be obtained by post from the General Manager, Board of Trade Labour Exchanges, at the address below.

The object of registration is to find out what reserve force of women's labour, trained or untrained, can be made available if required. As from time to time actual openings for employment present themselves, notice will be given through the Labour Exchanges, with full details as to the nature of work, conditions, and pay, and, so far as special training is necessary, arrangements will, if possible, be made for the purpose.

Any woman who by working helps to release a man or to equip a man for fighting does national war service. Every woman should register who is able and willing to take employment.

Board of Trade, March, 1915.

The President of the Board of Trade and myself, on behalf of the Government, have invited you here, not to consider any particular trade dispute, but to consider the general position in reference to the urgent need of the country in regard to the large and a larger increase in the output of munitions of war, and the steps which the Government propose to take to organise the industries of the country with a view to achieving that end.

You know that the position is a serious one. You know it by the speech delivered by Lord Kitchener in the House of Lords.

In every country engaged in the war they have discovered that the expenditure of war material is considerably in excess of any anticipation ever made by any General Staff; so that, even in the best prepared countries, the pressure is beyond anything that any one ever expected. In France they have met it by organising the whole of the industries of the country.

In this country we have had the additional difficulty of having to increase our army tenfold, and therefore the pressure on this country is greater, in consequence of that fact, than on any other country engaged in the war.

The duration of the war, and therefore its cost, not merely in money, but in lives and in suffering, and even the success of this country in the war, depend on our increasing and accelerating the output of munitions of war.

I have no doubt you have read the account of the battle which took place last week, which gives you a very good idea of what the increase in the output of munitions means, not merely from the point of view of success, but from the point of view of the lives which you save if an army is well equipped. The position for the attack was prepared by the most tremendous concentration of artillery fire that has probably been witnessed on any given point during the whole of this war.

What was the effect of that? It was not merely to ensure success, but, what was equally important, its effect was to save the lives of British soldiers in the attack that was made. The French told me in France when I was there that by a concentration of fire on a particular point they were able to achieve their purpose with one-tenth of the loss of life which they otherwise would have needed to accomplish that object.

So that the turning out of munitions of war not merely means success, but it means the saving of lives, and, as we of Parliament we have the power to assume control or to take over any works in this country which are either turning out munitions of war or which are capable of being adapted for that purpose.

That is what I want to consult you about. Although we have the power, we cannot exercise it unless we have the complete co-operation of employers and workmen.

What does it mean? I do not want to use the term "taking over" without explaining that it is capable of an interpretation which I do not wish to put upon it. By taking over a works we do not mean to establish an admiral or a general in command of the works, turning adrift those who are managing them at the present moment; that is an impossible task.

Our admirals and generals have as much to do as they possibly can, and, with the greatest confidence in them, we do not think they would manage works of this kind with the skill of those who are accustomed to that kind of task. That is not what we mean.

CONTROL OF WORKS.

We mean to assume control of works which are now being exclusively devoted to that purpose. There are certain works which are not adapted for that kind of control, but there are others which are, and the great works which are now being used for the purpose of the production of munitions of war are eminently works of that kind.

Above all we propose to impose a limitation of profits, because we can quite see that it is very difficult for us to appeal to labour to relax restrictions and to put out the whole of its strength unless some condition of this kind is imposed. The workmen of the country, I am perfectly certain, are prepared to put their whole strength into helping the war, so long as they know that it is the State that is getting the benefit of it, and that it does not merely enure to the profit of any particular individual or class.

If we are merely to take over the works and assume control and guarantee profits within that limit, you will realise that means that the employer has not quite the same interest as he has now in limiting expenditure.

Therefore we might be face to face not merely with the employers making demands on the State which we for the moment might regard as unreasonable, but we might find the employers in com-

(Continued on Page FIVE.)

6637 663.

The Daily Express, March 18th. 1915.

THE APPEAL TO LABOUR.

(Continued from Page ONE.)

bination with them, and therefore we should have employers and employed combining to bring pressure on the State, and we should not be in a position to deal with it unless we had a complete understanding in advance.

That is exactly what we want. Before we undertake the control and direction of these works, and undertake the responsibility for them, we must have a complete understanding with the employers and the employed.

What understanding can be asked for? The understanding we must get with the employers is an understanding with regard to the limitation of profits; that we must get, and an understanding, of course, that whatever the State wants done there shall be done.

For the moment we are liable to have important work interrupted by labour disputes. As I have said before, it is not a question of who is to blame there. The question is, how is the interruption of work to be prevented while you are settling the dispute. That is the matter which is important to us to consider.

Speaking on behalf of the Government, we do not say that the workmen ought never to complain, or that the workmen ought never to ask for an increase of wages; that is not our point. Our point is that during the time the questions at issue are being adjudicated on the work shall go on.

NO STRIKES.

The first proposition, therefore, which I shall put before you for your consideration is this:—

With a view to preventing loss of production caused by disputes between employers and workpeople, no stoppage of work by strike or lock-out should take place on work for Government purposes. In the event of difficulties arising which fail to be settled by the parties directly concerned, or by their representatives, or under any existing agreement, the matter shall be referred to an impartial tribunal nominated by his Majesty's Government, for immediate investigation and report to the Government with a view to a settlement.

All this is purely during the continuation of the war, and does not bear on anything that might happen after the war.

There are three suggestions which I put forward for the settlement of disputes.

The first is that a single arbitrator agreed on by the parties or appointed by the Board of Trade should adjudicate.

The second one is the committee on production; I think that consists of Sir George Askwith, Sir Francis Hopwood, and Sir George Gibb.

The third is that a court of arbitration shall be set up, on which labour is represented equally with the employers.

That is my first proposition. I should like, on behalf of the Government, to establish an understanding with labour that in works which are turning out munitions and equipment for the war, where there is a dispute occurring, there shall be no dropping of tools, but that some means shall be established by which the dispute shall be settled without any interruption of the work.

THE CLYDE.

The second point is a very difficult and a very delicate one to handle.

I am very glad at this point to be able to give you good news from the Clyde. I believe there has been a ballot on the Clyde, and I understand that although the ballot is scarcely completed, the result is overwhelmingly in favour of accepting the Government's proposals for arbitration in the matter.

We are exceedingly grateful to those who have assisted to bring about this end.

The second proposition is the suspension, where necessary during the war, of restrictions of output. Here again I want to make it perfectly clear that I am only discussing this suspension during the war.

The increase in output is so essential to us where we have to turn out munitions of war, not merely for ourselves, but to help our allies, that I do hope you will assist us for the moment by suspending the operation of any rules or regulations which tend to diminish the output. I know it is a very difficult question for you to decide, but it is very, very important for the State at the present juncture.

There is the question of the number of machines which one man is permitted to attend to. There is the question of the employment of semi-skilled labour, where under normal conditions you could not assent to it; and there is the question of the employment of female labour.

In France a vast amount of work is being done by women and by girls in the ammunition factories. In that country they have suspended all these rules and regulations for the time being, because they realise that the security of their country depends on it.

WOMEN WORKERS.

I have pointed out that in the factories where munitions of war are made there is a very considerable employment of women labour. They are employing semi-skilled labour where, before the war, the workmen would not have assented to it, and for the same reason as we are making an appeal here.

The way in which France has met her responsibilities is one of the most astonishing chapters in the history of any country, and it is something of which democracy can be proud. The French Government has shown that democracy, when put to the test, is quite equal to any strain placed on it, and that is exactly what we have to prove in this country.

Those are the two propositions which I put before you with regard to the increase in the output. The first is that there should be a means, and a summary means, of settling disputes as they arise, without resort either to strikes or lock-outs. The second is that there should be, during the duration of the war, a complete suspension, where necessary (I do not want it except when it is necessary) for the purpose of increasing the output, of all rules and regulations that have the effect of restricting the output.

I am sorry to say that I have to refer to another question of a totally different character, and I hope no one will misunderstand me when I drag it in I am referring now to the effect which excessive drinking among a minority of the workmen, in some districts, has upon the output.

Believe me, I am very loth to mention it; one is so apt to be misconstrued. It may be said, "You are bringing a charge against the working classes." I am doing nothing of the kind. I am referring to a minority.

But, as you know perfectly well, where the minority do that, they may throw the whole works out of gear, and very often they prevent men who are anxious to go on with their work from continuing that work.

I am sorry to say that I am acting on reports we have got both from the Admiralty and the War Office. In some districts it is very serious. In some areas it is interfering with the amount of the output, and gravely interfering with it.

In other areas it is interfering with the transport. Transport has been delayed where we are sending not merely munitions of war, but necessaries to our troops at the front. It is very much better that we should do it, whatever the misconstruction is.

I think you will agree with me that that is a very disastrous thing to happen during the period of the war, and it involves very strong action on the part of the Government. But we cannot take action effectively unless we have the support of the Labour leaders throughout the country. I am sure we shall get it in whatever action we think necessary to apply to that state of things.

The Government would not have summoned this conference unless they knew the gravity of the situation. The resources of this country are enormous; in fact, the resources of this country are greater than those of any other country in this war, and the ultimate triumph of the cause of the Allies will depend, I think, on the way in which we mobilise the whole of those forces.

TWO ALTERNATIVES.

There are two alternatives before this country. At the end of this war we shall either be the vassals of the German military caste, drunk with success, or we shall have broken militarism for ever. It is because I realise as a democrat how very important that is that I am making this appeal to the leaders of the workmen to assist us to organise our industries.

The President of the Board of Trade and myself will make exactly the same appeal to the employers: that it is important for us to mobilise to the last the whole of our resources, so that we shall be able as a nation, perfectly united, to march to a victory which is essential to human liberty.

After a short discussion the trade union representatives consulted among themselves, and a further meeting with the Government representatives took place in the afternoon, after which the conference adjourned until to-morrow.

Daily Express

LONDON, THURSDAY, MARCH 18, 1915.

The Morning Post, March 18th 1915.

663.

MATTERS OF MOMENT.

Women and the War.

"Any woman who by working helps to release a man or to equip a man for fighting does national war service." That is the note of the remarkable appeal to the women of the nation issued last night by the Board of Trade. The country must realise that the enemy cannot be defeated unless its full strength is thrown into the struggle. Voluntary enlistment has given us a wonderful new army, splendid in quality, unrivalled in enthusiasm. The task before that army, acting with the French and Belgians, is to drive the Germans back to the Rhine, and to inflict on them such overwhelming losses that the Kaiser will be forced to accept peace on the terms the Allies dictate. Last week the comparatively small British victory at Neuve Chapelle was bought at a heavy cost of men killed and wounded. It is well for us to stay and consider what the loss will be before peace is signed in Berlin. The gaps in the ranks must be filled. When the New Army goes to the front a newer army must be training at home. Before the end is reached the nation will need every able-bodied man, but at the same time the commercial and economic machine must be kept going, and, in order that this may be done, the Government has now begun to mobilise the women. For the first time in history women are given the same patriotic privilege as men.

Abraham Lincoln, when the existence of his country was in the balance, had the courage to commandeer the manhood of the Northern States. Mr. Asquith has not yet found that courage. It is evident that he and his colleagues are now convinced that we are still faced by a long, wearing struggle, and that there is an urgent necessity for tens of thousands more recruits. It is possible that this mobilisation of women is preparatory to some sort of compulsory service. On the other hand, it may be intended as an alternative, the Government hoping that wives or sisters may shame their men into the realisation of their duty. If that is the idea we regard it as inadequate, and we seriously doubt its success. Halfway measures and futile secrecy have hampered the Government and discouraged the country for seven months. The moment Ministers take the public into their confidence the result is electrical. Lord Kitchener's appeal to the workers was open and candid. Months ago in these columns we predicted that if employers were allowed to make fortunes out of the war their men would naturally demand higher wages. Lord Kitchener recognised that this was perfectly natural and fair. He told the men that without them the war would continue indefinitely, and might be lost. The answer is a pledge of stern, hard work. If the country is frankly told its military necessities it will not be frightened by universal service.

WAR SERVICE FOR WOMEN.

MOBILISATION OF LABOUR.

THE GOVERNMENT SCHEME.

An effort is to be made by the Government to mobilise women for war service. There are many things they can do which would directly help our Navy and Armies, and many more which they can do which would release men for military service. There are several industries, particularly agriculture, which are already very short of labour, because so many of the workers have enlisted. It is, for example, said that herds of cows are having to be killed because there is no one to milk them. Women could keep this sort of industry going if their labour were available. If the farmers are hard hit they will be glad to take the women, if they can get them, and the Board of Trade are proposing to try to get them. There are other industries of the same sort which it is vital to keep going, and in which the additional labour necessary could be supplied by women. Then there is another type of industry where more labour is wanted, where men cannot be found, and in which women could do the work. Perhaps the most surprising work of this type which is even now being done by women is the making of shells for big guns. Already the Board of Trade Labour Exchanges have been able to supply armament firms with women from such districts as the Potteries, where employment is not good, and the women have proved most adaptable. The demand for women who can do this work is enormous, and will continue to be enormous. The big armament firms could at this moment absorb 10,000 more women if they could be found. In transferring labour from one area to another where there is a sudden demand it is often found that housing is a difficulty. That is not so much a trouble in transferring women even in ordinary times. Still less will it be a trouble in cases where women go to take the place of a soldier with the Colours, for the obvious place for them to live is with the soldier's wife.

The Labour Exchanges are to-day issuing the following official circular:

WAR SERVICE FOR WOMEN.

The President of the Board of Trade wishes to call attention to the fact that in the present emergency, if the full fighting power of the Nation is to be put forth on the field of battle, the full working power of the Nation must be made available to carry on its essential trades at home. Already in certain important occupations there are not enough men and women to do the work. This shortage will certainly spread to other occupations as more and more men join the fighting forces.

In order to meet both the present and the future needs of national industry during the war the Government wish to obtain particulars of the women available, with or without previous training, for paid employment. Accordingly, they invite all women who are prepared, if needed, to take paid employment of any kind—industrial, agricultural, clerical, &c.—to enter themselves upon the Register of Women for War Service which is being prepared by the Board of Trade Labour Exchanges.

Any woman living in a town where there is a Labour Exchange can register by going there in person. If she is not near a Labour Exchange she can get a form of registration from the Local Agency of the Unemployment Fund. Forms will also be sent out through a number of women's societies, and can be obtained by post from the General Manager, Board of Trade Labour Exchanges, at the address below.

The object of registration is to find out what reserve force of women's labour, trained or untrained, can be made available if required. As from time to time actual openings for employment present themselves, notice will be given through the Labour Exchanges, with full details as to the nature of work, conditions, and pay, and, so far as special training is necessary, arrangements will, if possible, be made for the purpose.

Any woman who by working helps to release a man or to equip a man for fighting does national war service. Every woman should register who is able and willing to take employment.

Board of Trade, Queen Anne's-chambers,
Broadway, Westminster, S.W.

On the reverse side of the form for registration is the following:

THE SPECIAL REGISTER.

Are you able to work and free to work but not working?

You should have your name entered at once on the Special Register of Women for War Service which is being prepared by the Government Labour Exchanges.

Women are wanted at once to work in the following (among other) occupations: Farm Work, Dairy Work, Leather Stitching, Brush Making, Clothing Machining, Light Machining for Armament.

But even if you have no special experience of any of this work, you should register. It may be possible to train you. It is certain that as more men join the forces, more women will be wanted to work while they are away. Even if you can work only half of each day, you may be useful.

You can register either by going to a Labour Exchange, or by filling up the form on the back of this, and posting it to the nearest Labour Exchange. If you do not know where the Exchange is you can post the form to the Central Office for Labour Exchanges and Unemployment Insurance, Queen Anne's-chambers, Broadway, S.W. No fees are charged.

Any woman who by working helps to release a man or equip a man for fighting does national War Service. Every woman who can work and is free to work should come forward.

The particulars asked for in the form of registration are thus set out:

(1) Surname, other names; (2) full address; (3) age; (4) married, single, or widow; (5) have you ever done any paid work, and if so, what? (6) if so, when? Giving date as nearly as possible, what kind? Employer's name or names; (7) are you free to work: (a) whole time, (b) part time, (c) to leave your home for work if pay is sufficient and housing satisfactory? (8) is there any other work which you are willing and able to do? (9) if you have never done paid work, what kinds of work are you best suited for? (10) are you prepared to be trained for work which you have not previously done?

Special questions are asked of women willing to do agricultural work:

Have you ever worked at any of the following branches of work: (a) milking, (b) dairy work, (c) care of live stock, (d) light farm work, (e) market gardening, (f) poultry farming, (g) ordinary gardening. If you have not, state which branch you think you would be suited for.

It is felt that if there were a known and ascertained supply of women labour employers in every class of trade might be more ready to encourage their men to enlist. It is known that employers in many trades are discouraging their men from enlisting because they do not know how to supply their places. In agriculture, too, the Board of Trade strongly feel that the farmer ought to use up the available supply of women before he begins to employ the children. The first object of this new and interesting move on the part of the Board of Trade is to get to know exactly what women are willing to accept this war service. In other words, it is a mobilisation of women labour to help the country to win the war. As an official of the Board said to a representative of the Morning Post yesterday: "Until we know what women are to be had it is impossible to approach the employers with any suggestions. What can be done depends directly on the response to this appeal."

The Morning Post,
March 18th. 1915.

663/9

663.

WOMEN LABOUR IN WAR TIME.

Another step has been taken by the Government in the endeavour to utilise to the utmost the full resources of the country, which, as our public men are never tired of pointing out, is the only way of bringing the war to a successful and speedy conclusion. There is already a shortage of labour in many of our most important industries, so that the directors of great manufacturing concerns engaged on Government orders, which they find it impossible to deliver to time, are discouraging enlistment. This shortage will spread to other occupations as more and more men join the fighting line, even if those left behind work to the utmost of their powers. Can it be met to any extent by the increased employment of women? Many manufacturers believe it can; and competent authorities say that work could to-day be found for ten thousand of them if the supply were available. In normal times the idea of engaging women to do men's work would be scouted everywhere; but in a struggle of this magnitude nothing must be neglected to divert every unit of the national strength to the accomplishment of the national task; and as it is necessary for more and still more men to train for the front, the places of these must be taken somehow. So to-day the Board of Trade will issue, broadcast, a circular, with the object of finding out what reserve of female labour exists in the country. It will offer facilities for training, where this be practicable, try to bring the workers so registered and trained into touch with the employers, and help to assist in finding housing accommodation in those cases where it is necessary to move them from the districts in which they live. It is a big scheme; and if it is to be successful the co-operation of every section of our people is necessary. On paper—and the full text of the circular, with its accompanying questions, will be found in another column—it looks simpler, in spite of its magnitude, than is really the case. An initial difficulty, it seems to us, is to get at the people to whom the communication is addressed. They are not of the class who, as a rule, read the notices exhibited at Labour Exchanges or post-offices; and they are but slightly under the influence or supervision of the many Women's Societies. In some measure this obstacle may be overcome if women in other walks of life—especially those who have voluntarily engaged themselves in the many associations which have been called into being by the social and economic circumstances arising out of the war—make themselves acquainted with the circular, and see that it obtains the widest possible publicity. There is another difficulty. The increased provision which has rightly been made for the wives and dependents of our soldiers and sailors has diminished the extent of available labour. There are thousands of women who are better off now than they were before the war; and, in consequence, they have either given up outside employment altogether or work irregularly. We allude to these matters not by way of criticising the action of the Board of Trade, but to emphasise the need of co-operation of endeavour. The Labour Exchanges were of little economic value before the war, and signally failed to justify either the anticipations of their founders or the public money that was expended on them. If they can render assistance now the public will be inclined to forget the previous failures. There are now in the North of England a great many women engaged in the armament factories who, thrown out of employment by the partial stoppage of the pottery trades in Staffordshire, were introduced to this new and highly important national work, largely through the instrumentality of the Labour Exchanges. The occupations especially mentioned in the circular are farm and dairy work, leather-stitching, brush-making, clothing machining, and light machining in armament works. For all these female labour is suitable, and for the majority little preliminary training is necessary. Moreover, they are operations to which women could devote all or part of their time—a not unimportant matter where there may be one or two children or an aged relative to look after. This experiment to relieve the shortage of the labour market deserves, and should have, the support of every patriotic man and woman.

Evening News, March 18th. 1915.

CALL TO WOMEN WORKERS.

Leaders' Views on the State Scheme.

HOW TO HELP.

The Government has to-day taken the initial step in its second great manœuvre in organising English industries to cope with the war needs. A circular has been issued calling on women who are willing to work to release men for the war or equip men who have enlisted, to enrol their names with the Labour Exchanges.

The recipients of the forms are asked to say whether they can give whole or part time, what work they can undertake, and whether they are willing to be trained for work they have not previously done.

The Evening News understands that the Board of Trade is conferring with leaders of the trade unions in connection with this great scheme, registration for which is expected to begin formally next Monday. Notices of vacancies for women will be made known through the Labour Exchanges.

The official notice adds that the object of registration is to find out what reserve of women's labour, trained and untrained, can be made available if required.

MISS MACARTHUR'S VIEWS.

Miss Mary MacArthur, the secretary of the Women's Trade Union League, expressed surprise to-day at the haste with which the Government were acting in a matter of such great social complexity.

"In the banks at the present time women at £2 a week are doing the work of men who were paid £250 a year, and I can name restaurants where women at about 12s. weekly have filled the places of men who earned £2. Unless there is a guarantee that the men shall return to their places men who have families to keep will, after the war, be faced with a serious outlook, should that tendency be widely encouraged.

"The Government talks about women being paid ordinary industrial rates and speaks of pay ranging from 32s. a week, including overtime, in some of the munitions of war factories. I know of a war factory where the girls are working twelve hours a day with a break of only one and a half hours for meals, and the scale of pay is as follows:—

Girls of 17, 8s. a week.
Girls of 18, 9s.
Girls of 19, 10s.
Girls of 20, 11s.

"There is a bonus, which girls lose if they take Sundays off. In another factory making khaki thread girls are working very long hours for under 10s. a week, and their health is suffering from the continual strain.

"As I understand the appeal it is made to women who are not normally wage earners, and knowing as I do that 40,000 women normally wage earners are out of employment I should like some assurance that the possibility of training and using these women has been fully tried before the introduction of new and presumably economically independent women is contemplated.

"The appointment of a representative committee, including a strong proportion of representatives of the working classes, to lay down the conditions of the transference of women from one industry to another or the subsitution of women for men must be insisted upon as an essential feature of the plan."

The following further views have been given to Evening News representatives:—

LADY FRANCES BALFOUR.

I think the Government scheme is admirable. It is good to make use of women citizens as they are making use of men citizens. The women are ready for it, although they have hitherto been steadily discouraged from taking their part.

LADY MUIR MACKENZIE.

It is a great opportunity for women, but I think we must be very careful to safeguard women's interests. Women's trade unions will need to watch that proper wages are paid to women. I understand from the Government scheme that men's wages are to be paid, but women are always cheated in the end, and it is no use trusting to men entirely.

I think there should be a woman on the Central Board to look after women's interests, and I think a great many women factory inspectors must be appointed.

MISS SYLVIA PANKHURST.

I regard the scheme as industrial conscription for women, as I presume that women who sign the register may be called up by the Board of Trade.

We approve of the scheme if it will help women to get the vote. It requires other safeguards—such as equal pay for men's work.

I think a conference of women's societies—political, industrial, and social—should be called on the subject, and with that object in view I am getting into touch with several organisations.

THE COUNTESS OF LIMERICK.

I am perfectly sure that the women of Great Britain will respond to the Government's call. The woman of to-day is a different being from her sister of the Dickens' novel. Her power of endurance is as wonderful as her enthusiasm for work.

To quote one instance. Some West End shopgirls tramped seven miles of London's streets with my shamrocks early yesterday morning before they started work. That is the spirit of woman to-day, and the Government will not call upon her for assistance in vain.

THE HON. MAUDE PAUNCEFOTE.

It is the beginning of a very good idea. Anything that will free the men for service is to be welcomed. Women are very adaptable, and they are suited to many kinds of work hitherto done by men, particularly work which requires skilful fingers.

I do not feel that the new scheme will be any hindrance to our emigration plans. There is room for both. When the men come back, many of them unwilling to do clerical work, they will be glad to join the women who have in their absence settled in the Colonies.

"THE EVENING NEWS" BUREAU.

Those two successful organisations conducted by The Evening News—the Employment Bureau for Soldiers and Sailors and the Lonely Soldiers Guild—will now enlarge their spheres of usefulness in connection with the Board of Trade's appeal for women to take employment.

An enormous number of women—there are 105,000 on the books of the Guild—have written expressing their earnest desire to help in any direction possible, only asking for some outlet for their energies.

One lady wrote from East London, Cape Colony, offering her services "as interpreter and general help in hospital or anywhere I might be of use."

In connection with the Employment Bureau, there are now 800 fighting men who want work, and of these 600 have asked for employment for their wives. These will also be sent to the Board.

As women are wanted to take the place of motor drivers, it is noteworthy that a London motor instructor has offered to teach a limited number selected by The Evening News.

The Daily Telegraph, March. 18th. 1915.

WOMEN AND THE WAR.

Now that the Ministry has seriously addressed itself to the problem of getting the nation's energies organised for war, it is attacking its task with vigour and boldness. The setting up of Government control over the industries capable of providing munitions of war, the straightforward appeal of Lord KITCHENER to the manhood and patriotism of the men engaged upon Government work, have abruptly shattered the much too widespread delusion that Great Britain had, apart from the efforts of her fighting men by land and sea, no particularly strenuous part to play in the carrying on of the war. To-day we announce the first steps in another emergency-measure of an importance that it would be difficult to exaggerate: the enrolment of the women of the country for service in connection with the war. The Board of Trade circular, which we reproduce to-day, makes its appeal to all classes. The plan is to discover, by means of voluntary registration, what reserve force of women's labour, trained and untrained, can be made available wherever and whenever it is required; and to organise the employment of that force. We find the principle of the new measure aptly expressed in the last paragraph of the circular: "Any woman who by working helps to release a man, or to equip a man, for fighting does national war service." This appeal, we need scarcely say, is not made without knowledge of the admirable work which many thousands of women are doing for their country at this moment, or of the many private organisations already existing for the direction of women's energies to tasks directly or indirectly useful in the nation's emergency. What the new departure means, at bottom, is that the carrying on of certain trades and occupations is essential to the well-being of the country in this hour of its fate; and that there are not enough men and women to do the work in those trades and occupations. In the deciding of what most urgently needs to be done, the Government is the only judge. It calls for women recruits to the first-line forces of industry; and the call will surely not be in vain.

In this way the women of Great Britain can do, and will do, what hundreds of thousands of their menfolk have done: put themselves freely at the disposal of their country, and serve, forgetful of all the little distinctions and amenities of peace, where they are called to serve. All who are prepared to take paid employment of any kind, whether with or without previous training, are invited to enter themselves upon the Register of Women for War Service now being prepared by the Board of Trade Labour Exchanges. Any special training a woman may have that can be of use to the country will find due employment; for those without such special training there is work that they can do; and it is also intended to provide training, for those who desire it, in some of the indispensable forms of industry. Many such trades have been seriously hit by the loss of male employés who have enlisted. There are many others in which employers would encourage more of their men to enlist, if they were satisfied that women would be forthcoming who could and would do the work. Above all, there are industries to which the Government is now looking, with "very serious anxiety," for the provision of equipment and munitions of war; industries in which the lack of sufficient labour is a prime difficulty, in which many women are already employed, and in which there is room for thousands more. If the women of the country will make this registration scheme the success it ought to be at the beginning, there are possible further developments which should make it more successful still. There is no reason, for example, why the principle of the so-called "pals' battalions," which have done so much for the new Army, should not be applied in the enrolment of the new reserve-force of women-workers. We earnestly commend the scheme, and the opinions upon it which we publish to-day, to the consideration of women in any and every position of life. It is an indispensable part of that great task of organising the non-combatant effort of the nation which the Government has now undertaken, and of which we see another aspect in yesterday's conference at the Treasury between members of the Imperial Defence Committee and a large body of representatives of organised labour. We are confident that the women's part in this great movement, called forth by the needs of the war and of the world's future, will be taken up with enthusiasm from one end of the country to the other.

The Pall Mall Gazette, March 18th. 1915.

THE CALL TO WOMEN WORKERS.

WHAT THE BOARD OF TRADE IS DOING.

A NATIONAL MOVEMENT.

HELPING THE MEN TO FIGHT.

"P.M.G." Special.

The great Government scheme for the recruiting of the women of the country for war service has three main objects:—

(1) To make good as far as possible the existing shortage of labour in certain trades and industries.

(2) To assist employers to release men for enlistment.

(3) To train untrained women for particular classes of work.

At the present moment there is a big demand for women's labour in the following, among other occupations:—

Farm work	Clothing machining
Dairy work	Light machining for armaments.
Leather stitching
Brush making

What the Board of Trade proposes to do in the first instance is to prepare a register of women who are prepared to accept war service.

THE FORM.

For this purpose the form to be issued, in addition to the usual questions as to name, age, etc., sets out the following:—

Is there any other work which you are willing and able to do?

If you have never done paid work, what kinds of work are you best suited for?

Are you prepared to be trained for work which you have not previously done?

SPECIAL QUESTIONS FOR PERSONS WILLING TO DO AGRICULTURAL WORK.

Have you ever worked at any of the following branches of work?—

(a) Milking.
(b) Dairy work
(c) Care of live stock.
(d) Light farm work.
(e) Market gardening.
(f) Poultry farming.
(g) Ordinary gardening.

If you have not, state which branch you think you would be suited for.

AT THE BOARD OF TRADE.

At the offices of the Board of Trade to-day a representative of the "Pall Mall Gazette" was informed that it was the intention and purpose of the Board to ascertain as exhaustively as possible the occupations in which women have previously been engaged and in which they would be ready to engage again, as well as those in which fresh volunteers could do very well with a little training.

The agricultural colleges have already undertaken to train women in suitable branches of agricultural work. The appeal to wives of soldiers and other women who have ceased to be employed to go back to work is a patriotic appeal which is expected to meet with an enthusiastic response.

Where the question of wages is being discussed some doubts are expressed.

"Will minimum rates be fixed?"

The reply is that the women who register themselves will be free to accept or reject the terms offered by employers. If an employer is in need of women's labour the Board of Trade, through the Labour Exchanges, will be the means of placing him in 663/11 663.

The Star, March 18th. 1915.

CALL TO WOMEN.

Thousands Wanted for War Work.

HUGE LABOUR RESERVE.

State Scheme to Replace Men on Service.

A remarkable step has been taken by the Government in relation to the mobilisation of women's work during the war.

The President of the Board of Trade has issued to-day through the Labour Exchanges an appeal to women who are prepared to undertake paid employment of any kind—industrial, agricultural, or clerical—to enter themselves upon the Register of Women for War Service, which is being prepared.

Occupations Open.

Women are wanted at once to work in the following occupations:—

Farm work.
Dairy work.
Leather stitching.
Brush making.
Clothing machining.
Light machining for armament.

The object of registration is to find out at once what reserve force of women's labour, trained or untrained, can be made available if required.

Questions.

Special questions are asked of women willing to do agricultural work:

Have you ever worked at any of the following branches of work: (a) milking, (b) dairy work, (c) care of live stock, (d) light farm work, (e) market gardening, (f) poultry farming, (g) ordinary gardening? If you have not, state which branch you think you would be suited for.

The next question is how to help, and any woman living in a town where there is a Labour Exchange can register there at once.

Women's Societies to Help.

If she is not near a Labour Exchange she can get a form of registration from the local agency of the Unemployment Fund. Forms for registration will also be sent out through a number of women's societies, and can be obtained by post from the

General Manager,
Board of Trade Labour Exchanges,
Queen Anne's-chambers, Broadway,
Westminster.

The forms to be filled up state what paid work the registering woman has previously done, and at what date. It also asks whether she can accept whole time or part time work.

Government's Anxiety.

Very opportunely on this new development comes the special report of the Fabian Women's Group on unemployment among women wage-earners. It is the more interesting because the report is concerned to insist upon the Government and the local authorities providing work for unemployed women, while to-day's Board of Trade announcement seeks to do that very thing.

So far from shirking the necessity of finding work for women, the Government is onl anxious to obtain more of them to work.

The Toiling Millions.

From the 1911 census it appears that there were 5,854,000 females over ten engaged in "gainful operations" in England and Wales alone. This does not include those engaged in unpaid domestic work in their own homes.

In addition, there are 593,000 working women in Scotland and 430,000 in Ireland, so that by the present year the number of working women and girls in the United Kingdom must be at least 7,000,000.

Great Reserve of Labour.

Here are a few figures which indicate the extent of the reserve of female labour on which the Government hope to draw. The figures are from the 1911 census, and refer only to England and Wales:—

Domestic service (indoors)	1,260,673
Cotton manufacture	372,834
Dressmaking	333,129
Teaching (all branches)	211,183
Local Government (including Police and Poor Law Services)	176,450
Wool and worsted manufacture	127,637
Tailoring	127,527
Drapery	110,955
Inn or hotel service	110,506
Agriculture	94,841
Printing, bookbinding, and stationery	87,609
Grocery	58,935
Boot and shoe making	45,986
Laundry	167,052
Metal trades	101,050
Charwomen	126,061

It was calculated by Mr. Sidney Webb in 1912 that 1,000,000 women were averaging 9s. a week, 1,500,000 more were averaging 13s. a week, and 500,000 averaged 17s. per week.

In addition there were 100,000 casual workers, such as charwomen, who earned an average of 8s. 6d. per week, and 1,300,000 girls whose earnings averaged 7s. 6d. per week.

Not a Remedy.

The Fabian Women's Group urge that the philanthropic ladies who in August, 1914, started workrooms for unemployed women, did absolutely no good to women as a whole.

The work done in these workrooms, whether it consisted of shirts for soldiers or of work for private individuals, was only diverted from the ordinary channels of trade, and during that very month shirtmakers and tailoresses and dressmakers were being discharged all over the country because the usual orders had been greatly reduced.

The Group agree that if women can take up new trades which would make their labour self-supporting, this should be done. They state that it "requires no little ingenuity to discover any new manufacture or service that is both practicable and profitable," and that it is difficult to overcome the inertia and resistance of the ordinary wholesale trader or shopkeeper, and that railway rates make such experiments costly.

Problem of Training.

Here, then, we have met the ideal answer to the riddle that is puzzling the Women's Group. The "inertia" of the wholesaler is already overcome, for the Government will do that, and it will not only find out what lines of service are practicable, but it undertakes to bring the willing woman worker and the raw material together.

As to the question of training women workers, the Group declares that it offers fewer difficulties than the problem with regard to men.

Already the following occupations have been undertaken by women since the war began:—

Bookstall girls at Willings's and Smith's stalls.
Girl clerks in London banks.
Increased number of women in grocers' shops.
Girls as lift attendants.
Girls in Vickers, Maxim's shops.
Increased number of women postal servants.
Women tram conductors in the provinces.

These occupations will soon be added to if the Government registration scheme is responded to by women generally.

The scheme is being taken up enthusiastically by the various organisations of women and by the women themselves.

At the Central Office of the Board of Trade Labour Exchanges at Queen Anne's-gate alone to-day between 30 and 40 women registered themselves, the first calling as early as 9.40 a.m. listment.

(3) To train untrained women for particular classes of work.

At the present moment there is a big demand for women's labour in the following, among other occupations:—

Farm work	Clothing machining
Dairy work	Light machining for armaments.
Leather stitching
Brush making

What the Board of Trade proposes to do in the first instance is to prepare a register of women who are prepared to accept war service.

THE FORM.

For this purpose the form to be issued, in addition to the usual questions as to name, age, etc., sets out the following:—

Is there any other work which you are willing and able to do?

If you have never done paid work, what kinds of work are you best suited for?

Are you prepared to be trained for work which you have not previously done?

SPECIAL QUESTIONS FOR PERSONS WILLING TO DO AGRICULTURAL WORK.

Have you ever worked at any of the following branches of work?—

(a) Milking.
(b) Dairy work
(c) Care of live stock.
(d) Light farm work.
(e) Market gardening.
(f) Poultry farming.
(g) Ordinary gardening.

If you have not, state which branch you think you would be suited for.

AT THE BOARD OF TRADE.

At the offices of the Board of Trade to-day a representative of the "Pall Mall Gazette" was informed that it was the intention and purpose of the Board to ascertain as exhaustively as possible the occupations in which women have previously been engaged and in which they would be ready to engage again, as well as those in which fresh volunteers could do very well with a little training.

The agricultural colleges have already undertaken to train women in suitable branches of agricultural work. The appeal to wives of soldiers and other women who have ceased to be employed to go back to work is a patriotic appeal which is expected to meet with an enthusiastic response.

Where the question of wages is being discussed some doubts are expressed.

"Will minimum rates be fixed?"

The reply is that the women who register themselves will be free to accept or reject the terms offered by employers. If an employer is in need of women's labour the Board of Trade, through the Labour Exchanges, will be the means of placing him in communication with the class of labour required, and it rests with himself whether he obtains it or not.

THE CLASSES OF WORK.

If the wages and conditions are regarded as satisfactory there will be no difficulty; but if they are not then he will not be able to obtain what he needs.

When some preliminary training is essential the conditions may vary. There is at present, it is asserted, an imperative demand for the labour of 10,000 women in connection with the machining of clothing and light armaments. This class of work is readily learned, and while a comparatively low rate of wages may be paid for the first fortnight there is no reason why as much as 28s. per week should not be earned after that period.

In the cotton trade there is a great shortage, and in the lighter forms of agricultural work women are also urgently needed.

The women's organizations of the country have been appealed to without distinction, and many have promised their assistance. Already women are inquiring for full information about the work offered, and to-day, at the central office of the Board of Trade, a number registered during the morning.

is being prepared.

Occupations Open.

Women are wanted at once to work in the following occupations:—

Farm work.
Dairy work.
Leather stitching.
Brush making.
Clothing machining.
Light machining for armament.

The object of registration is to find out at once what reserve force of women's labour, trained or untrained, can be made available if required.

Questions.

Special questions are asked of women willing to do agricultural work:

Have you ever worked at any of the following branches of work: (a) milking, (b) dairy work, (c) care of live stock, (d) light farm work, (e) market gardening, (f) poultry farming, (g) ordinary gardening? If you have not, state which branch you think you would be suited for.

The next question is how to help, and any woman living in a town where there is a Labour Exchange can register there at once.

Women's Societies to Help.

If she is not near a Labour Exchange she can get a form of registration from the local agency of the Unemployment Fund. Forms for registration will also be sent out through a number of women's societies, and can be obtained by post from the

General Manager,
Board of Trade Labour Exchanges,
Queen Anne's-chambers, Broadway,
Westminster.

The forms to be filled up state what paid work the registering woman has previously done, and at what date. It also asks whether she can accept whole time or part time work.

Government's Anxiety.

Very opportunely on this new development comes the special report of the Fabian Women's Group on unemployment among women wage-earners. It is the more interesting because the report is concerned to insist upon the Government and the local authorities providing work for unemployed women, while to-day's Board of Trade announcement seeks to do that very thing.

So far from shirking the necessity of finding work for women, the Government is onl anxious to obtain more of them to work.

The Toiling Millions.

From the 1911 census it appears that there were 5,854,000 females over ten engaged in "gainful operations" in England and Wales alone. This does not in-

In addition there were 100,000 casual workers, such as charwomen, who earned an average of 3s. 6d. per week, and 1,500,000 girls whose earnings averaged 7s. 6d. per week.

Not a Remedy.

The Fabian Women's Group urge that the philanthropic ladies who in August, 1914, started workrooms for unemployed women, did absolutely no good to women as a whole.

The work done in these workrooms, whether it consisted of shirts for soldiers or of work for private individuals, was only diverted from the ordinary channels of trade, and during that very month shirtmakers and tailoresses and dressmakers were being discharged all over the country because the usual orders had been greatly reduced.

The Group agree that if women can take up new trades which would make their labour self-supporting, this should be done. They state that it "requires no little ingenuity to discover any new manufacture or service that is both practicable and profitable," and that it is difficult to overcome the inertia and resistance of the ordinary wholesale trader or shopkeeper, and that railway rates make such experiments costly.

Problem of Training.

Here, then, we have met the ideal answer to the riddle that is puzzling the Women's Group. The "inertia" of the wholesaler is already overcome, for the Government will do that, and it will not only find out what lines of service are practicable, but it undertakes to bring the willing woman worker and the raw material together.

As to the question of training women workers, the Group declares that it offers fewer difficulties than the problem with regard to men.

Already the following occupations have been undertaken by women since the war began:—

Bookstall girls at Willings's and Smith's stalls.
Girl clerks in London banks.
Increased number of women in grocers' shops.
Girls as lift attendants.
Girls in Vickers, Maxim's shops.
Increased number of women postal servants.
Women tram conductors in the provinces.

These occupations will soon be added to if the Government registration scheme is responded to by women generally.

The scheme is being taken up enthusiastically by the various organisations of women and by the women themselves.

At the Central Office of the Board of Trade Labour Exchanges at Queen Anne's-gate alone to-day between 30 and 40 women registered themselves, the first calling as early as 9.40 a.m.

Yorkshire Evening News, March 18th. 1915.

663/12 663

WOMEN AND WAR.

Leeds and the Board of Trade's Proposals.

WHERE LABOUR IS NEEDED.

Views of Employers and Trade Union Officials.

QUESTION OF RATE OF PAYMENT.

("Evening News" Special.)

The urgent appeal contained in the Board of Trade's announcement to-day for women to fit and register themselves ready for taking on men's occupations in order that the latter may be released for active service appears likely to receive the warm support of many Leeds employers.

Trade union officials in the city in the main do not seem disposed to cavil very much at the appeal, although there is the natural objection put forward about the possibility of women transplanting the men permanently.

There are, of course, a great number of occupations where a woman cannot take over a man's work. The heavy trades and the highly-skilled professions are barred to her. The duties that appear most likely to be open to women are those in the warehouse, the shop, and the office. No doubt—as one employer of labour pointed out to the writer—in these directions alone the employment of women would release in this city a great number of young men.

TRADE UNION STANDPOINT.

The main and perfectly legitimate concern of the trade union officials is "What about the men when they come back?" They think matters could be improved if the Board of Trade would extend the scheme when it comes into full working order by issuing some sort of guarantee on the promise of employers to the men whose jobs when they go to the front are taken by female workers.

In making inquiries in Leeds to-day our representative found that several industries engaged on important Government work are actually wanting female employes at the present time.

An engineer who employs a large number of people gave it as his opinion that a large number of clerks in Leeds could be released. "We are working at high pressure for the Government," he said, "and cannot let any of our men go. Their places cannot be taken by women."

WHERE WOMEN ARE EMPLOYED.

Mr. A. Hopper, a director of Messrs. Greenwood and Batley's, who are making ammunition for the Government, expressed himself as in favour of this or any other scheme whereby more labour could be obtained. "We have already 300 to 400 women working for us," he said, "and we shall want a great many more of them before long. Our greatest need is for skilled mechanics."

Mr. Henry Barran, head of the firm of Messrs. John Barran and Sons, Ltd., did not think the scheme would have any effect on clothiers as in the clothing industry female workers formed the bulk of the employees.

POSITION OF SHOP ASSISTANTS.

One of the branches of labour which will likely lend itself to the Board of Trade's scheme is that coming under the supervision of the National Union of Shop Assistants, Warehousemen, and Clerks.

Mr. J. D. Hooper, permanent secretary of the Union in Leeds, told the "Evening News" to-day that the grocery trade would be affected more than any other. Already they were advertising in Leeds for women to take the place of male shop assistants. The Board of Trade's suggestion would enable them to ascertain the position as to what women were available.

If employers introduced women into the grocery trade, or any other trade, they ought to be prepared to pay them the same rate of wages. Then when a man returned after the war the employer would give him his job back more willingly. "The men want to be sure of their jobs," added Mr. Hooper, in an emphatic tone.

A HARD CASE.

He then related an incident which, he said, proved that unless the Government kept a watchful eye on the employers the men would suffer very much. One of the members of his union had been reading a recruiting circular, and coming to the conclusion that he ought to join the army, informed the manager of the shop, who approved of the young man's intentions. The would-be recruit made his way to the recruiting office, but owing to a physical defect was rejected. He returned to the shop, where an inspector of the firm had arrived. The latter inquired if he had got through, and on receiving an answer in the negative said, "Well, we have no further use for you." "Injustices of this kind will have to be stopped," said Mr. Hooper.

BOOT TRADE NOT SUITABLE.

Mr. John Buckle, president of the Boot and Shoe Operatives' Union, said women could not take the place of men in the manufacture of boots. If they attempted it the women would have a physical breakdown. The only department of the trade where women could be employed was that where the boot uppers were closed. Women were already employed in that department, and they wanted more of them.

Speaking of the scheme generally, Mr. Buckle said that if it did only what it appeared it would do on the face of it, it would be all right, but if women were once installed in men's places it would be difficult to remove them. The question of paying the women the same wages as men was a grand ideal, but it would be very difficult to realise it. The physique of the two sexes was incomparable.

The men's positions would want safeguarding against the event of their returning, because once women were properly installed he thought they would be lucky if one man in three got his job back on returning from the front.

QUESTION OF PAY.

Mr. J. T. Crossland, secretary of the National Union of Clerks (Leeds branch), said that although he realised the necessity for the action taken by the Board of Trade he feared there was a danger that after the war many of the women would stick to their work and refuse to go back to their ordinary sphere.

Women who were at present taking the places of men were not being paid at the same rate as the men had been. This was not right, but he thought that many of these women would agree to remain at work for the same wages at the conclusion of the war.

MUST HAVE SAME RATE AS MEN.

Mr. Withey (secretary of the Clothing Operatives in Leeds) thought that at the end of the war a certain number of employers would seek to retain the services of women at a low rate of pay.

"You are only a woman and cannot expect as much as a man," would be the remark used by such employers, said Mr. Withey. He did not think that the scheme could affect the clothing trade, as there was at present a great shortage of female labour in that industry.

The great point was to see that those women who were now employed should receive the same rate of pay as the men.

The Daily Mirror, March 18th. 1915.

BRITAIN'S CALL TO LOYAL WOMEN.

Government Plan to Register Those Ready to Do War Work.

MEN FREED FOR ARMY.

A war service for women!

That, The Daily Mirror learnt yesterday, is the latest Government plan to meet the great shortage of industrial and other labour during the war, and to assist recruiting.

The Board of Trade is to-day to appeal to women to come and work in certain trades, including armament work.

"Any woman," says the Government appeal, "who by working helps to release a man or equip a man for fighting does national war service."

Every woman who can work and is free to work should come forward and have her name entered on the Special Register of Women for War Service which is to be prepared by the Government Labour Exchanges.

For a start 10,000 women are wanted for armament work—light machine and cartridge turning and shellcase filling and fusing. Their work will help the Government to meet the increasing demands for munitions of war.

For this work women need not be specially qualified. They can get two or three weeks' paid training, and then when capable can earn, with overtime pay, from 28s. to 32s. a week.

Women—20,000 at least—are wanted at once to work also in the following, among other, occupations: Farm work, dairy work, leather stitching, brush-making, clothing machining.

THE CALL.

This is the call to women as it will be issued by the Board of Trade to-day:—

The President of the Board of Trade wishes to call attention to the fact that in the present emergency if the full fighting power of the nation is to be put forth on the field of battle the full working power of the nation must be made available to carry on its essential trades.

Already in certain important occupations there are not enough men and women to do the work. This shortage will certainly spread to other occupations as more and more men join the fighting forces.

In order to meet both the present and the future needs of national industry during the war the Government wish to obtain the particulars of the women available, with or without previous training, for paid employment.

Accordingly, they invite all women who are prepared, if needed, to take paid employment of any kind—industrial, agricultural, clerical, etc.—to enter themselves upon the register of women for war service, which is being prepared by the Board of Trade Labour Exchanges.

Any woman living in a town where there is a Labour Exchange can register by going there in person. If she is not near a Labour Exchange she can get a form of registration from the local agency of the Unemployment Fund.

Forms will be also sent out through a number of women's societies. Forms, but not information, can also be obtained from any Post Office.

REGISTER OF WORKERS.

"The object of registration," adds the president, "is to find out what reserve of women's labour, trained or untrained, can be made available if required.

"As from time to time actual openings for employment present themselves notice will be given through the Labour Exchanges, with full details as to the nature of work, conditions and pay, and, so far as special training is necessary, arrangements will, if possible, be made for the purpose."

"It seems to me that this will be the first real practical opportunity which women have been given generally to help the nation," said Mrs. Dacre Fox, of the Women's Social and Political Union, to The Daily Mirror yesterday.

"That they will not fail the country I am convinced. Englishwomen are simply burning with patriotism. They have been waiting only for the chance to prove it, and they will rally to the call as enthusiastically as the men.

"The scheme will have our heartiest co-operation in every way. Wherever we work, wherever we speak, we shall urge women to respond to the call."

Liverpool Evg. Express, March 18th. 1915.

WOMEN WANTED

TO RELEASE MEN WORKERS FOR THE WAR.

GOVERNMENT REGISTER.

AN OPPORTUNITY FOR SOLDIERS' WIVES.

("Express" Special.)

Any woman who by working helps to release a man or to equip a man for fighting does national war service. Every woman should register who is able and willing to take employment.

This is an extract from a striking appeal to the women of the country which has been issued by the Board of Trade. Thus the Government heralds a scheme which will have far-reaching effects in the industrial field, so far as women are concerned.

The full text of what will probably prove to be an historical announcement is as follows:—

G.R.—War Service.

The President of the Board of Trade wishes to call attention to the fact that in the present emergency, if the full fighting power of the nation is to be put forth on the field of battle, the full working power of the nation must be made available to carry on its essential trades at home.

Already in important occupations there are not enough men and women to do the work. This shortage will certainly spread to other occupations as more and more men join the fighting forces.

In order to meet both the present and the future needs of national industry during the war, the Government wish to obtain particulars of the women available, with or without previous training, for paid employment. Accordingly they invite all women who are prepared, if needed, to take paid employment of any kind—industrial, agricultural, clerical, etc.—to enter themselves upon the register of women for war service, which is being prepared by the Board of Trade Labour Exchanges.

Any woman living in a town where there is a Labour Exchange can register by going there in person. If she is not near a Labour Exchange she can get a form of registration from the local agency of the Unemployment Fund. Forms will also be sent out through a number of women's societies, and can be obtained by post from the general manager of the Board of Trade Labour Exchanges at the address below.

The object of the register is to find out what reserve force of women's labour, trained or untrained, can be made available if required, as from time to time actual openings for employment present themselves. Notice will be given through the Labour Exchanges with full details as to the nature of the work, conditions and pay, and so far as special training is necessary arrangements will, if possible, be made for the purpose.

Any woman who by working helps to release a man, or to equip a man for fighting, does national war service. Every woman should register who is able and willing to take employment.

Queen Anne's Chambers,
Broadway, Westminster.

What Class of Work?

There is a double significance in this Government declaration. It may portend a big army development. But one thing it does indicate clearly is that the women of the country are being put upon an entirely new status in the industrial sense. It is woman's opportunity. It remains to be seen whether she will realise it.

It is understood that the Government have suggested certain classes of employment in which they consider women may be useful in this emergency. They include farming, leather stitching, brush making clothing machine work, and light machine work in armament factories.

It may not be generally known that women are being employed at the present time in spheres where they have hitherto been strangers. For instance they have proved themselves very skilful in the making of instruments for field service, such as telephone equipments. It is stated from official sources that the majority of employable women are already at work.

"For whom do you suppose this appeal is intended?" our representati inquired from an official much interested in the woman's movement, and particularly as it concerns labour.

"Well, I should say the Government will prefer women who have had industrial experience," was the answer. "Of course they will have to register women who have had no experience of this character, and in their case they must make some provision for training them. Apparently there is nothing in the statement of the Board of Trade to prevent married women registering. Here, I think, is a great opportunity. Look at the wives of soldiers who have no children. They can by this scheme augment their separation allowances very handsomely, and at the same time by healthy occupation keep themselves cheerful during this time of great anxiety."

Another Industrial Problem.

An employer when questioned by our representative observed that the scheme could scarcely appeal to Liverpool so much as other parts of the country. Liverpool, he said, was not an industrial centre like the great towns, around Manchester or in the Midlands, but was a commercial and distributing centre. Consequently the response might not be very great on the part of Liverpool women. He admitted, however, that of late years the ranks of female labour had enormously increased, and he would not be surprised to find the Government's appeal inducing many other women who had kept out of the industrial arena, now coming forward in a spirit of patriotism to stand shoulder to shoulder with the male worker.

"If they do," he added warningly, "they will not return to domestic life when the war is over. And then we shall be up against another industrial problem."

The Manchester Guardian, March 18th. 1915.

The Demand for Women Workers.

In deciding to compile a register of all the women, trained and untrained, who are willing to do industrial, agricultural, or clerical work at this time the Government have taken the first step on a road that should lead far. Unemployment among men is almost non-existent. Many trades of vital importance to the conduct of the war are short of labour, and at the same time "Business as usual" is being translated into fact only by the retention of eligible recruits who could enlist if their places were filled. With a greater supply of labour it should be possible to draft men from less important work to the manufacture of war material, and to release many others for the army. This organising, irrespective of sex, of all the industry that is available to meet what must be an increasing demand is so obvious a step that it might well have been taken before. No one will seriously contend now that the terms "men's work" and "women's work" are applicable to any save a few employments, or that a city or a business would suffer if it employed women clerks, tramguards, lamp-lighters, telegraph messengers, lift attendants, or even taxi-drivers. But the obvious advantage of asking women to do "men's work" at this time must not blind us to its dangers. A woman who can take a man's place is worth a man's wage. The economic, industrial, and social results of any other view would make a tragedy of a sane policy. Against this the national character of the proposal and the fact that the Labour Exchanges will have it in charge should be a sufficient safeguard. Suffragists will hail Government activity on these lines as a great step forward, for when women have achieved the industrial status which is their due there can be no shred of a reason for continuing to debar them from the political.

663/13 663

Evening News, March 18th. 1915.

Women and War.

The scheme of war service for women which is being inaugurated by the Board of Trade is, we believe, quite new in the history of this country. There are two reasons why this scheme has been put forward, the first being the actual shortage of labour, notably in the agricultural industry, and secondly the desirability of freeing many of those who are at present detained in the Civil Service and in certain industries where women's labour could be advantageously employed.

We welcome this new move for many reasons, but not the least for the effect which it is bound to have on that section of public opinion which has failed to realise the desperate nature of the struggle in which we are engaged.

We need not here repeat what we have already said about the causes of the blindness which seems to affect a good many of us, and which is evinced by that type of optimism which causes a man to say, "The British Army is doing all right; it can do very well without me"; suffice it to say that such large and far-reaching measures as are now being put forward for the employment of women in place of men must do much to convince even the most unimaginative of the true state of the situation and must act as a useful spur to the more sluggishly minded.

As for the women of England who have already given such splendid proofs of their devotion, we cannot doubt that their response to the call will be instant and whole-hearted.

"Any woman who by working helps to release a man or to equip a man for fighting does national war service." The words of the Government manifesto embody a truth which is self-evident, and there is therefore no need to expound it. Our women will, we are sure, be the first to realise the gravity of the crisis which has made this demand upon their services not only advisable but necessary.

We have already our Regular Army and our Territorial Army and our New Army. To these we are about to add the Women's Army, a force which cannot take its part in the trenches or behind the guns, but which none the less will play a notable part in the defeat of the enemy, whose power is yet unbroken and who is straining every nerve to crush us.

In making these demands upon our women folk we are not doing any more than has already been done by Germany and by France. There the agricultural work is largely been done, and will be done, [illegible] goes on, to a still greater extent, by women and young folk. That is because the able-bodied men are all at the war and we have got to realise that that example must be followed unless we are to delay the final success and to waste many

The Manchester Guardian,
March 18th. 1915.

The Demand for Women Workers.

In deciding to compile a register of all the women, trained and untrained, who are willing to do industrial, agricultural, or clerical work at this time the Government have taken the first step on a road that should lead far. Unemployment among men is almost non-existent. Many trades of vital importance to the conduct of the war are short of labour, and at the same time "Business as usual" is being translated into fact only by the retention of eligible recruits who could enlist if their places were filled. With a greater supply of labour it should be possible to draft men from less important work to the manufacture of war material, and to release many others for the army. This organising, irrespective of sex, of all the industry that is available to meet what must be an increasing demand is so obvious a step that it might well have been taken before. No one will seriously contend now that the terms "men's work" and "women's work" are applicable to any save a few employments, or that a city or a business would suffer if it employed women clerks, tramguards, lamp-lighters, telegraph messengers, lift attendants, or even taxi-drivers. But the obvious advantage of asking women to do "men's work" at this time must not blind us to its dangers. A woman who can take a man's place is worth a man's wage. The economic, industrial, and social results of any other view would make a tragedy of a sane policy. Against this the national character of the proposal and the fact that the Labour Exchanges will have it in charge should be a sufficient safeguard. Suffragists will hail Government activity on these lines as a great step forward, for when women have achieved the industrial status which is their due there can be no shred of a reason for continuing to debar them from the political.

G.R.—War Service.

The President of the Board of Trade wishes to call attention to the fact that in the present emergency, if the full fighting power of the nation is to be put forth on the field of battle, the full working power of the nation must be made available to carry on its essential trades at home.

Already in important occupations there are not enough men and women to do the work. This shortage will certainly spread to other occupations as more and more men join the fighting forces.

In order to meet both the present and the future needs of national industry during the war, the Government wish to obtain particulars of the women available, with or without previous training, for paid employment. Accordingly they invite all women who are prepared, if needed, to take paid employment of any kind—industrial, agricultural, clerical, etc.—to enter themselves upon the register of women for war service, which is being prepared by the Board of Trade Labour Exchanges.

Any woman living in a town where there is a Labour Exchange can register by going there in person. If she is not near a Labour Exchange she can get a form of registration from the local agency of the Unemployment Fund. Forms will also be sent out through a number of women's societies, and can be obtained by post from the general manager of the Board of Trade Labour Exchanges at the address below.

The object of the register is to find out what reserve force of women's labour, trained or untrained, can be made available if required, as from time to time actual openings for employment present themselves. Notice will be given through the Labour Exchanges, with full details as to the nature of the work, conditions and pay, and so far as special training is necessary arrangements will, if possible, be made for the purpose.

Any woman who by working helps to release a man, or to equip a man for fighting, does national war service. Every woman should register who is able and willing to take employment.

Queen Anne's Chambers,
Broadway, Westminster.

What Class of Work?

There is a double significance in this Government declaration. It may portend a big army development. But one thing it does indicate clearly is that the women of the country are being put upon an entirely new status in the industrial sense. It is woman's opportunity. It remains to be seen whether she will realise it.

It is understood that the Government have suggested certain classes of employment in which they consider women may be useful in this emergency. They include farming, leather stitching, brush making, clothing machine work, and light machine work in armament factories.

It may not be generally known that women are being employed at the present time in spheres where they have hitherto been strangers. For instance they have proved themselves very skilful in the making of instruments for field service, such as telephone equipments. It is stated from official sources that the majority of employable women are already at work.

"For whom do you suppose this appeal is intended?" our representati inquired from perate nature of the struggle in which we are engaged.

We need not here repeat what we have already said about the causes of the blindness which seems to affect a good many of us, and which is evinced by that type of optimism which causes a man to say, "The British Army is doing all right; it can do very well without me"; suffice it to say that such large and far-reaching measures as are now being put forward for the employment of women in place of men must do much to convince even the most unimaginative of the true state of the situation and must act as a useful spur to the more sluggishly minded.

As for the women of England who have already given such splendid proofs of their devotion, we cannot doubt that their response to the call will be instant and whole-hearted.

"Any woman who by working helps to release a man or to equip a man for fighting does national war service." The words of the Government manifesto embody a truth which is self-evident, and there is therefore no need to expound it. Our women will, we are sure, be the first to realise the gravity of the crisis which has made this demand upon their services not only advisable but necessary.

We have already our Regular Army and our Territorial Army and our New Army. To these we are about to add the Women's Army, a force which cannot take its part in the trenches or behind the guns, but which none the less will play a notable part in the defeat of the enemy, whose power is yet unbroken and who is straining every nerve to crush us.

In making these demands upon our women folk we are not doing any more than has already been done by Germany and by France. There the agricultural work is largely been done, and will be done, me goes on, to a still greater extent, by women and young folk. That is because the able-bodied men are all at the war and we have got to realise that that example must be followed unless we are to delay the final success and to waste many thousands of precious lives as a result of our own slackness.

The women of Britain have already done much, and we have no words in which to express our admiration of those wives and mothers who, with proud hearts and dry eyes, have given their husbands and sons to this cruel war. That is the supreme sacrifice of womanhood, and in what countless instances has it been made nobly and uncomplainingly.

Soldiers' mothers and soldiers' wives are the proudest women in Britain to-day, and nothing can ever wrest that title from them. But there is other work to hand, in which all women can do their part. That it will be done gladly and faithfully we cannot for one moment doubt.

The Daily Chronicle, March 18th. 1915.

WAR SERVICE FOR WOMEN.

APPEAL TO FILL UP WORKERS' RANKS.

RELEASING MORE FIGHTING MEN.

"We desire to form a roll of honour of women who are ready to give their services to the nation."

This was given to our representative yesterday as being, in a word, the policy of the important new step which the Board of Trade is taking to meet the deficiency of labour in certain trades, and to free more men for service with the Army. It is embodied in the following official notice:—

The President of the Board of Trade wishes to call attention to the fact that in the present emergency, if the full fighting power of the nation is to be put forth on the field of battle, the full working power of the nation must be made available to carry on its essential trades at home. Already, in certain important occupations there are not enough men and women to do the work. This shortage will certainly spread to other occupations as more and more men join the fighting forces.

In order to meet both the present and the future needs of national industry during the war, the Government wish to obtain particulars of the women available, with or without previous training, for paid employment. Accordingly, they invite all women who are prepared, if needed, to take paid employment of any kind—industrial, agricultural, clerical, etc.—to enter themselves upon the Register of Women for War Service which is being prepared by the Board of Trade Labour Exchanges.

Any woman living in a town where there is a Labour Exchange can register by going there in person. If she is not near a Labour Exchange she can get a form of registration from the local agency of the Unemployment Fund. Forms will also be sent out through a number of women's societies, and can be obtained by post from the General Manager, Board of Trade Labour Exchanges, at the address below.

The object of registration is to find out what reserve force of women's labour, trained or untrained, can be made available if required. As from time to time actual openings for employment present themselves, notice will be given through the Labour Exchanges, with full details as to the nature of work, conditions and pay, and, so far as special training is necessary, arrangements will, if possible, be made for the purpose.

Any woman who by working helps to release a man or to equip a man for fighting does national war service. Every woman should register who is able and willing to take employment.

HOW WOMEN CAN HELP TO DEFEND THE COUNTRY.

Among the occupations in which there is a demand for women are the following: Farm work.

Dairy work.	Clothing machining.
Leather stitching.	Light machining for
Brush making.	armament.

Great stress is laid upon the last two occupations. It was stated at the Central Labour Exchange yesterday that there will be a still greater demand for women to work in armament factories upon work which is of the utmost importance to the defence of the country. Women can be taught this work in a fortnight, and after a month they can earn from 28s. to 32s. a week.

The invitation of the Board of Trade was warmly welcomed by the secretary of the Girls' Friendly Society, and by Mrs. Falk, the secretary of the War Emergency Corps.

"This is what we have been trying to do ever since the war began," Mrs. Falk said. "We offered 200 trained women as taxi-drivers, but Scotland Yard would not give them licenses. We have women registered who are prepared to take men's places as gardeners, tram or bus conductors, lift attendants, ticket collectors, and carriage cleaners. My committee will be only too glad to do anything they can to help the Board of Trade."

Miss Mary Macarthur, secretary of the Women's Trade Union League, took a more critical view. "While I wish," she said, "to do everything possible for the defence of the country, I think the Government would have been well-advised, before issuing this appeal, to have consulted representatives of organised workers—men and women. The substitution of women for men owing to the shortage of the latter in any particular trade is a difficult and delicate matter, and the advice and co-operation of the organised workers is essential. The circular may give a false impression of the actual industrial situation. I imagine that it has been drafted with a view to possible eventualities.

"I understand the appeal is made to women not normally wage-earners, and even to women who have not previously been wage-earners. There are now 50,000 unemployed women who are normal wage-earners, and I should like an assurance that the absorption of these women has been considered before new, and presumably economically independent, women are introduced."

Daily News & Leader, March 18th. 1915.

WAR SERVICE FOR WOMEN.

Great Scheme of National Registration.

The services which women can render to the nation in war time by helping to carry on essential trades have been a subject of discussion ever since the growing number of recruits began to cause embarrassment to certain industries; and in yesterday's "Daily News" we called attention to the need of co-ordinating and systematising the work which women would gladly perform if the opportunity were given them.

The Government has now taken the matter in hand, and last evening the Board of Trade issued a statement calling attention to the fact that if the full fighting power of the nation is to be put forth on the field of battle, the full working power of the nation must be made available at home. Already in certain important occupations there are not enough men and women to do the work. This shortage will certainly spread to other occupations as more and more men join the fighting forces.

In order to meet both the present and the future needs of national industry during the war, the Government wish to obtain particulars of the women available, with or without previous training, for paid employment. Accordingly, they invite all women who are prepared, if needed, to take paid employment of any kind—industrial, agricultural, clerical, etc.—to enter themselves upon the Register of Women for War Service which is being prepared by the Board of Trade Labour Exchanges.

The object of registration is to find out what reserve force of women's labour, trained or untrained, can be made available if required. As from time to time actual openings for employment present themselves, notice will be given through the Labour Exchanges, with full details as to the nature of work, conditions and pay, and, so far as special training is necessary, arrangements will, if possible, be made for the purpose.

The statement ends with the declaration that any woman who by working helps to release a man or to equip a man for fighting does national war service. Every woman should register who is able and willing to take employment.

Registration can be effected in person at a Labour Exchange, or a form can be obtained by post from the General Manager, Board of Trade Labour Exchanges, Queen Anne's-chambers, Westminster, S.W.

63/14 663.

The Lincolnshire Echo, March 18th. 1915.

HELP FROM WOMEN.

The utmost importance is to be attached to the document just issued by the Board of Trade dealing with the question of the employment of women in place of men who have gone to serve their country. By the natural process of enlistment the great, with the small, industries of the nation have been denuded of their men workers, and it is to be expected in the ordinary course of things that this drain will continue with ever increasing emphasis as long as the deplorable war endures. As a consequence of this, the Government has had to contemplate steps to provide for the continuance of the nation's work, and the scheme just announced is probably the only possible alternative to the attenuation of the trade and supplies of the country. Naturally, the first consideration of the Board is to preserve and indeed increase as much as possible the ability to turn out war material, and the facts illustrate the usefulness of women in some of the lighter work of the manufacture of guns and ammunition. If there is one thing England must not do, if she is to live, it is to fail in her supply of munitions. That would mean an end of our hopes. Thus do we welcome this new departure entailed by the Government scheme, and we may hope that the women of England who have not the responsibilities of a home will respond to the call for help.

The scheme is to be operated through the machinery of the Labour Exchanges, at which applicants for work may register. Women living in towns may apply personally, but those who reside at a distance may obtain a form of registration from the local agency of the Unemployment Fund, or by post from the General Manager of the Board of Trade Labour Exchanges, Queen Anne's Chambers, Broadway, Westminster, London, S.W. The forms will also be sent out through a number of Women's Societies, so that they should obtain wide distribution. The object of registration is to find out what reserve of women's labour, trained or untrained, can be made available if required, and as openings occur the Exchanges will be notified. It should be stated that women are invited to offer their services to release the men from all varieties of occupation—from clerical work to agriculture, and, as before mentioned, the making of war material. For many branches of work training is unnecessary, but where this is imperative the Board will, if possible, arrange for this to be given. It is to be hoped that the scheme will be seriously considered by those whom it affects, and that the response will be adequate.

The Evening Standard, March 18th 1918. 66:15 663.

The Field for Women.

What women can do is less appreciated than what they are anxious to do at a period of stress and strain. The Government is desirous of finding out their capacity, and to this end invites all who are prepared to take paid employment of any kind to register themselves for war service.

As the Board of Trade notice points out, "any woman who by working helps to release a man or to equip a man for fighting does national war service." This is, therefore, a channel by which any woman capable of the work required can help her country.

No doubt there will be a patriotic response to the invitation. Women have shown throughout the war that they are just as eager, and not seldom as competent, as men to carry on where needed. It is in this work of carrying on that they are now provided with their opportunity.

In France and Belgium, to look no farther afield, the work of men in peace has now been taken over, and is being effectively discharged, by women. At the same time, care will no doubt be taken not to displace men who are breadwinners for others.

Daily Graphic, March 18th 1918.

RALLYING THE WOMEN.

Admirable indeed is the step the Board of Trade has taken in addressing to the women of Great Britain a practical variant of the familiar appeal, "Your King and Country need you." Since the war began women have in innumerable ways shown their willingness and capacity to fill some of the vacancies in our economic life left by the enlistment of the men, but to make that willingness and capacity count to its utmost value in these critical days it was necessary to grapple with the question in an organised way. This is happily now to be done, and as the men have come forward in their thousands, so now the women will undoubtedly hasten to enrol themselves as substitutes for the men who have gone or for those who hesitate to enlist because they imagine they are necessary in their present occupation. This war service for women, indeed, removes the last excuse for any masculine neglect of duty, for apart from those skilled trades which are essential to the conduct of the war, and those in which sheer physical strength is necessary, there is an immensely wide field in which female labour can relieve the male worker. In carrying on the vital work of our farms, in shops, in the postal service, in clerical duties, woman, with her intuitive instinct, can readily adapt herself to new conditions and make herself an efficient substitute for the soldier who has taken up arms to defend her from the horrors suffered by her sex in Belgium and France. The Government is to be heartily congratulated on this important departure, for it is a valuable step towards that fuller organisation of the resources of the country for which Mr. Bonar Law has so often appealed.

Aberdeen Journal, March 18th 1918.

LABOUR TROUBLES IN ABERDEEN

BRUSHMAKERS ON STRIKE.

The Aberdeen Trades Council met in the Trades Hall Buildings, Belmont Street, last night—Mr David Palmer, president, in the chair.

A letter was read from Mr Andrew Young, 23 Dick Place, Edinburgh, asking the Council to petition the Government to introduce an agreed measure to prohibit the sale of distilled liquor in Scotland during the continuance of the war.

The Chairman said he knew Mr Young, who had done a lot of useful work in the co-operative and labour movements. He did not know if Mr Young was acting on his own behalf or on behalf of any organisation, but the Executive Committee of the Council thought that if such a measure was good for Scotland it would be equally good for England. (Applause.) They were at a loss to understand why it should be confined to Scotland. The Executive thought that to ask the Government to pass such a measure would be a slight to the large number of men who were mobilised. The military authorities could deal with the drink question if the situation demanded it, and the Executive recommended that the communication lie on the table. He moved accordingly.

Mr Wright (Masons) seconded.

The Chairman said the workers fully recognised the position which the country was in at present, but to ask them to petition in favour of such a measure, when the responsible authorities had indicated that the alarming rumours were without any foundation, was asking too much.

The recommendation was unanimously agreed to.

FEMALE LABOUR.

It was intimated that the brushmakers with a certain Aberdeen firm had been withdrawn from work because the firm, it was alleged, had employed female labour.

The Chairman remarked that they were sorry to learn there had been trouble in the brushmaking trade. The manager, or one of the partners of the firm, had intimated that he was compelled to introduce, or to endeavour to introduce female labour because of the pressure of orders. The Brushmakers' Society had undertaken to provide all the male labour necessary to undertake the work. No agreement had been arrived at, and the men had been withdrawn. The work was not for Government purposes at all, but they could not be too particular. The officials of the union had a strong case. (Applause.) He hoped the dispute would soon be settled. (Applause.)

CARTERS' BONUS.

Mr Fraser (Carters) intimated that the carters had got an increase in wages of 1s per week. At the start one of the firms offered 2s of an increase, but they ultimately agreed to give a bonus of 1s. This firm, however, did not give a single penny of the bonus to a man who failed to complete a week's work. If the full bonus was not paid by to-night, the men employed with the firm would cease work on Friday morning. (Applause.)

The rest of the business

Liverpool Post, Mar. 18th 1918.

LONDON, Wednesday Night.

Mobilising the Women.

Mr. Tennant, when submitting the Army Estimates, made an appeal to the Labour party to help the Government to organise the forces of labour so that where practicable women might replace men who had joined the clours. The suggestion was sympathetically received, the only conditions laid down being that the substitution of female for male labour should not be made either to depress wages or to lengthen the normal hours of employment. The women of the country have given much valuable service, most of it gratuitously, since the war began, but the time has now come to organise this service and utilise it on economic lines in carrying on our essential industries. Accordingly the Board of Trade has taken the first step towards mobilising the women. A register of women for war service is to be opened, and all women who are prepared to take paid employment of any kind are invited to place their names upon it, the object being to ascertain the amount of female labour trained and untrained that is available. The labour exchanges will in due course indicate where employment may be obtained, with full details as to the nature of the work, conditions, and pay; while arrangements will if possible be made for giving special training so far as that may be necessary. The greatest shortage of labour at this moment exists in those industries engaged in the production of munitions of war and military equipment. I am informed that thousands of women can be employed in connection with the manufacture of shells, and that in both the clothing and the leather trades there is room for a vast amount of female labour. Many middle-class women still, no doubt, wish to share in their country's work, and I heard it suggested at the Board of Trade to-day that factory and workshops life would be made more agreeable to them if they formed themselves into "Pals' battalions." They would probably be able to lodge in middle-class homes, and would thus incidentally help to solve the problem of housing accommodation, which has already become acute in the working class districts of those centres where munitions of war are produced. The vacancies for women in clerical employment increase daily, and for the robust and country bred chance of healthy occupation can be found in countless Yorkshire Evg. Post, Mar. 18th.

WOMEN WORKING ON WAR MUNITIONS.

THE GOVERNMENT'S APPEAL.

LIGHT MACHINING AT ENGINEERING WORKS.

"Are you able to work, and free to work, but not working?" This pertinent question, addressed to the women of England, forms the keynote of the appeal which the Board of Trade makes to-day for more women workers to take up duties which will release men for the Army.

This is not the only desideratum. Women are wanted, also, to assist in the ammunition factories. Shells and cartridges are being made in Leeds in large quantities, but the output could (one expert states) be doubled if only there were more hands employed in the machining. Particularly for that work are women required in Leeds. They are wanted in the clothing factories and the woollen mills, but of first importance just now is the turning out of bigger and bigger quantities of war munitions, and women who want to be of service to their country just now could not do better than take employment in the ammunition factories.

As a Government official expressed to a "Yorkshire Evening Post" representative this afternoon, "It is the women who have never done a day's work in their lives whom we would like to appeal to. There are dozens of ways in which they might show their patriotism, but at least it would be something if they registered their names as willing to undertake clerical work."

Women who are prepared to take paid employment are invited at once for the following occupations:—Farm work, dairy work, leather stitching, brush-making, clothing machining and light machining for armaments.

In the appeal, which is made by the Board of Trade, women are urged: "Even if you have no special experience of any of this work, you should register. It may be possible to train you. It is certain that as more men join the forces, more women will be wanted to work while they are away. Even if you can work only half of each day, you may be useful. . . . Any woman who by working helps to release a man or equip a man for fighting does national War Service. Every woman who can work and is free to work should come forward."

THE RESPONSE IN LEEDS

At most of the Labour Exchanges in the city a gratifying response has been made to this morning's appeal. Presumably the women who registered their names will be at once sent to work in localities where there is a pressure of Government orders. For the time being, we understand, the demand for women labour in Leeds is more pronounced in the ammunition shops than in the khaki clothing factories. It is not reasonable to suppose that women could be employed in the ordinary work of the engineering shops, but it has been found that they are peculiarly useful at light machining. Thus, great numbers in Leeds are being increasingly employed in the making of cartridge cases and on parts of shells.

663/16 663.

The Daily Telegraph, March 18th. 1915.

9

WOMEN'S AID IN THE NATIONAL STRUGGLE.

GOVERNMENT'S CALL.

A WAR REGISTER FOR PAID EMPLOYMENT

SETTING MEN FREE.

An important step has been taken by the Government in calling upon women to register themselves for paid employment in the nation's service, to fill up ranks which are at present without sufficient labour, and also to release men for the fighting line.

What is desired at the outset is that workers should be immediately available for the production of armaments. In the manufacture of shells alone thousands more women could be employed.

On the land, too, there is urgent need for labour, and much of the daily work on farms could be performed by women. They might undertake duty in shops where men of fighting age are now detained.

The Government propose to use the Labour Exchanges as a means of bringing women into industrial service in the present emergency. They will thus know what women are available with or without previous training.

This end will be obtained by a Register of Women for War Service. How and where to register is set out below.

The scheme has the warm approval of leaders of the women's movement and representative women whose messages we are able to print.

OFFICIAL SCHEME.

TEXT OF DOCUMENT.

Below is the text of the first document issued by the Board of Trade:

The President of the Board of Trade wishes to call attention to the fact that in the present emergency, if the full fighting power of the nation is to be put forth on the field of battle, the full working power of the nation must be made available to carry on its essential trades at home. Already, in certain important occupations, there are not enough men and women to do the work. This shortage will certainly spread to other occupations as more and more men join the fighting forces.

In order to meet both the pressing

Manchester Guardian, March 19th. 1915.

THE GOVERNMENT AND WOMEN'S LABOUR.

THE NEED FOR SAFEGUARDS.

To the Editor of the Manchester Guardian.

Sir,—The Government's proposal in regard to the registration of women for war service is a most important departure which may develop into a form of industrial conscription for women. I take it that those women who register as willing to perform various services can be called up for service as the men were who filled up the army forms signifying their willingness to enlist. So important is the situation for women that it seems imperative that a national conference of women's trade unions and political organisations should be called at once with a view to formulating demands. Such proposals as the following would be discussed:—

1. That in view of the fact that the Government will at once become overwhelmingly the largest and perhaps eventually almost the sole employer of labour, with more extensive power for controlling labour than any private employer has ever had, it is imperative that the Parliamentary vote should at once be extended to women in order that they may have the same power that men have in influencing the Government which controls their labour. Otherwise the new industrial conscription will be an unjustifiable tyranny where women are concerned.

2. That as the Government proposes that all labour disputes shall be referred to a tribunal nominated by the Government, women shall have strong representation on this tribunal, and in all disputes in regard to women's employment a woman of standing and experience (the nation has many such to draw upon) shall be the chairman of the tribunal, or in the case of the appointment of a sole arbiter be the arbiter of the dispute.

3. That where a woman is employed on work hitherto done by men she shall receive the wage hitherto paid to men in addition to any war bonus or increase in wages which might have been paid for the work now in the case of men employees. That in no case shall an unskilled woman be employed at a lower wage than the current wage of a man unskilled labourer.

4. That proper safeguards in regard to hours, wages, and conditions be arranged in conjunction with representatives of the women concerned, and that no woman shall be compelled to work under conditions which the representative of the organisation to which she belongs reports to be unsatisfactory.

It is vitally important that some such regulations should be adopted by the women's organisations in order that the position of the women concerned may be safeguarded and that the introduction of women into the labour market may not so vitally lower the standard of livelihood for the working classes as to become a national disaster.

It is hoped that the various women's organisations will sink their differences at this juncture and realise that their most patriotic duty as women is to safeguard the interests of the women of the nation.—Yours, &c.,

E. SYLVIA PANKHURST.

To the Editor of the Manchester Guardian.

Sir,—The experiment which the Board of Trade is proposing to inaugurate by asking all able-bodied women to register for war service is one that will have the profoundest effects on women's labour in the future. Women of all classes will rejoice that at last it has been recognised that their King and country need them too. The danger, almost too obvious to be pointed out, is that women of comfortable circumstances, needing little or no wage, will eagerly take such work in order to serve their country, at any salary that may be offered.

Since the war started women's wages have been steadily falling. The Women's Employment Corps has been undertaking an inquiry to find in what trades women could replace men. It has not found a single instance where women's wages have been increased to meet the rise in the cost of living. In the majority of cases a made available to carry on its essential trades at home. Already, in certain important occupations, there are not enough men and women to do the work. This shortage will certainly spread to other occupations as more and more men join the fighting forces.

In order to meet both the present and the future needs of national industry during the war, the Government wish to obtain particulars of the women available, with or without previous training, for paid employment. Accordingly, they invite all women who are prepared, if needed, to take paid employment of any kind—industrial, agricultural, clerical, &c.—to enter themselves upon the Register of Women for War Service which is being prepared by the Board of Trade Labour Exchanges.

Any woman living in a town where there is a Labour Exchange can register by going there in person. If she is not near a Labour Exchange, she can get a form of registration from the local agency of the unemployment fund. Forms will also be sent out through a number of women's societies, and can be obtained by post from the General Manager, Board of Trade Labour Exchanges, at the address below.

The object of registration is to find out what reserve force of women's labour, trained or untrained, can be made available if required. As from time to time actual openings for employment present themselves, notice will be given through the Labour Exchanges, with full details as to the nature of work, conditions and pay, and, so far as special training is necessary, arrangements will, if possible, be made for the purpose.

Any woman who by working helps to release a man or to equip a man for fighting does national war service. Every woman should register who is able and willing to take employment.

Board of Trade, Queen Anne's-chambers, Broadway, Westminster, S.W.

March, 1915.

WAR MUNITIONS.

WHAT WOMEN CAN DO.

It is announced that the King, attended by Earl Kitchener, Secretary of State for War, Major Clive Wigram, and Vice-Admiral Sir Colin Keppel, visited the Royal Gun and Carriage Factories and the Royal Laboratory at Woolwich Arsenal yesterday.

Mr. Asquith had an audience of his Majesty at Buckingham Palace.

In the Royal Arsenal at Woolwich the general feeling concerning the Government's proposals for the employment of women on the simpler processes of the manufacture of ammunition is one of approval. The men recognise that many of the operations can be performed as well by women and girls as by men or boys. In the Arsenal itself practically all the simpler work is already undertaken by boys, and the view has been expressed that the experience which these lads have gained during the past six months should fit them for more important tasks in any new arsenals the Government may establish at the shops of private engineering firms. In this event, it is realised that women and girls might well take their places.

MAKING SHRAPNEL SHELLS.

In Birmingham women are looking after automatic machines and turning out the lighter parts of machine-guns, rifles, and the firing gear even of big guns. They make excellent packers of cartridges. It will surprise many people to learn that women are capable of manufacturing shrapnel shells of all kinds, from the cold steel to the completed missile, and in fact any shell from a three-pounder to a twelve-pounder. They turn the outer shell, make the time and [illegible] fit in the bullets, and complete country, at any salary that may be offered.

Since the war started women's wages have been steadily falling. The Women's Emergency Corps has been undertaking an inquiry to find in what trades women could replace men. It has not found a single instance where women's wages have been increased to meet the rise in the cost of living. In the majority of cases a percentage has been taken off their wages, and the amounts employers are offering for clerks, for instance, is generally about 5s. a week less than the current rates before the war.

The bugbear of the woman worker has always been the subsidised worker, who is the standard excuse for paying the whole class less. Now that so many women are receiving small pensions from the Government the appeal to women's patriotism will further reduce the earnings of women. Government action is the only thing that can keep up the standard rates.—

Yours, &c., L. E. SMITH (Chairman).
E. C. WILKINSON (Secretary).

66, Barton Arcade, Manchester, March 18.

ster by going there in person. If she is not near a Labour Exchange, she can get a form of registration from the local agency of the unemployment fund. Forms will also be sent out through a number of women's societies, and can be obtained by post from the General Manager, Board of Trade Labour Exchanges, at the address below.

The object of registration is to find out what reserve force of women's labour, trained or untrained, can be made available if required. As from time to time actual openings for employment present themselves, notice will be given through the Labour Exchanges, with full details as to the nature of work, conditions and pay, and, so far as special training is necessary, arrangements will, if possible, be made for the purpose.

Any woman who by working helps to release a man or to equip a man for fighting does national war service. Every woman should register who is able and willing to take employment.

Board of Trade, Queen Anne's-chambers, Broadway, Westminster, S.W.

March, 1915.

WAR MUNITIONS.

WHAT WOMEN CAN DO.

It is announced that the King, attended by Earl Kitchener, Secretary of State for War, Major Clive Wigram, and Vice-Admiral Sir Colin Keppel, visited the Royal Gun and Carriage Factories and the Royal Laboratory at Woolwich Arsenal yesterday.

Mr. Asquith had an audience of his Majesty at Buckingham Palace.

In the Royal Arsenal at Woolwich the general feeling concerning the Government's proposals for the employment of women on the simpler processes of the manufacture of ammunition is one of approval. The men recognise that many of the operations can be performed as well by women and girls as by men or boys. In the Arsenal itself practically all the simpler work is already undertaken by boys, and the view has been expressed that the experience which these lads have gained during the past six months should fit them for more important tasks in any new arsenals the Government may establish at the shops of private engineering firms. In this event, it is realised that women and girls might well take their places.

MAKING SHRAPNEL SHELLS.

In Birmingham women are looking after automatic machines and turning out the lighter parts of machine-guns, rifles, and the firing gear even of big guns. They make excellent packers of cartridges. It will surprise many people to learn that women are capable of manufacturing shrapnel shells of all kinds, from the cold steel to the completed missile, and in fact any shell from a three-pounder to a twelve-pounder. They turn the outer shell, make the time and percussion fuses, fill in the bullets, and complete the shell ready to place in the gun. For this class of work women are peculiarly well fitted, their touch being more sensitive than that of men, while, owing to the smallness of their hands, they are able to manipulate small articles.

The operations in which women are engaged in ammunition manufacture involve no danger, and the physical labour is small, as they have not to work the machines—which are auto-

P.T.O.

THE GOVERNMENT AND WOMEN'S LABOUR.
Thursday 19th 1915.
13.
91/279
663

been all used up, and, owing to the action of the trade unions, the employers have not in all cases been allowed to supplement their staffs with women.

WOMEN'S OPINIONS.

MRS. PANKHURST GRATIFIED.

EXAMPLE OF FRANCE.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

GLASGOW, Wednesday Night.

Mrs. Pankhurst is at present fulfilling a series of engagements in Glasgow. When I saw her to-night she was very enthusiastic about the step taken by the Government.

"We have asked that women should be considered a national reserve force," she declared, "prepared to take up any national work if their services were needed. It is a very wise action on the part of the Government, and they can rely upon our co-operation in every possible way to do all we can to assist. Of, course, we are tremendously pleased, as the women are only too anxious to be recruited, as the men are recruited, not for the same purpose, but for purposes equally important. Personally, I feel very keenly that there is a great need for training thousands of women who have never been trained to any calling."

Mrs. Pankhurst was asked what was likely to be the attitude of women generally on the question, and she replied that she was certain there would be a very large response. She knew personally that many women had felt disappointed because the Government had not given them a chance.

"Wherever it is possible for a woman to do work at present being done by a man," she said, "that man ought to be released for fighting purposes. I have been in France a good deal lately, and there saw women tellers in the branch offices of the banks. Women were also on the tramcars, and acting as taxi-cab drivers. Wherever one went in Paris one saw women doing work formerly done by men. In London only recently women who had trained themselves as taxi-cab drivers applied for licenses, but were refused by the Home Office, on the grounds that the public would not have confidence in them. The same argument was used with regard to women conductors on the tramcars in Edinburgh. These views are very interesting to me, because in Paris the women taxi-cab drivers and conductors on the trams have been a great success. By the way, the tram-drivers in Paris are the wives of soldiers."

REPRESENTATIVE VIEWS.

We print below short telegrams received from representative women upon the Government's new scheme:

MISS MARIE CORELLI.

Surely every capable woman in the kingdom will be proud to help in this national crisis by replacing men needed at the front in every kind of necessary labour. A register for such willing workers in all classes should prove an honour to our sex, who can desire nothing [illegible] part in the sustaining and defence of our beloved Empire.

LADY FRANCES BALFOUR.

As I understand the Government's offer, I entirely approve. Many women are ready to help the nation in these ways, and they have trained themselves in various forms of service as citizens capable of the full responsibility of citizenship. The Government recognise that sex is no bar to efficient service.

PRINCIPAL, SWANLEY COLLEGE.

We have arranged special courses under the Board of Agriculture to train women for farm work, and have also special courses for poultry, bees, and fruit-preserving.

MISS MARY MACARTHUR.

Miss Mary Macarthur, of the Central Committee on Women's Employment, was herself in consultation with the Board of Trade yesterday afternoon, and is of opinion that before launching the circular it would have been better to consult the leaders of the women's industrial movement. There are, as she pointed out subsequently, 50,000 unemployed women representing many branches of industry, and it might have been better to have seen first what could be done for them through their various organisations. The whole question she regarded as one of great complexity, and its many difficulties had not, perhaps, been fully considered. But before calling upon women to come forward and train, it would certainly have been desirable to ascertain the extent to which work was needed by women who had habitually to earn their own wages.

FORM OF REGISTRY.

[illegible]

"Wherever it is possible ... do work at present being done by a man," she said, "that man ought to be released for fighting purposes. I have been in France a good deal lately, and there saw women tellers in the branch offices of the banks. Women were also on the tramcars, and acting as taxi-cab drivers. Wherever one went in Paris one saw women doing work formerly done by men. In London only recently women who had trained themselves as taxi-cab drivers applied for licenses, but were refused by the Home Office, on the grounds that the public would not have confidence in them. The same argument was used with regard to women conductors on the tramcars in Edinburgh. These views are very interesting to me, because in Paris the women taxi-cab drivers and conductors on the trams have been a great success. By the way, the tram-drivers in Paris are the wives of soldiers."

REPRESENTATIVE VIEWS.

We print below short telegrams received from representative women upon the Government's new scheme:

MISS MARIE CORELLI.

Surely every capable woman in the kingdom will be proud to help in this national crisis by replacing men needed at the front in every kind of necessary labour. A register for such willing workers in all classes should prove an honour to our sex, who can desire nothing ... part in the sustaining and defence of our beloved Empire.

LADY FRANCES BALFOUR.

As I understand the Government's offer, I entirely approve. Many women are ready to help the nation in these ways, and they have trained themselves in various forms of service as citizens capable of the full responsibility of citizenship. The Government recognise that sex is no bar to efficient service.

PRINCIPAL, SWANLEY COLLEGE.

We have arranged special courses under the Board of Agriculture to train women for farm work, and have also special courses for poultry, bees, and fruit-preserving.

MISS MARY MACARTHUR.

Miss Mary Macarthur, of the Central Committee on Women's Employment, was herself in consultation with the Board of Trade yesterday afternoon, and is of opinion that before launching the circular it would have been better to consult the leaders of the women's industrial movement. There are, as she pointed out subsequently, 50,000 unemployed women representing many branches of industry, and it might have been better to have seen first what could be done for them through their various organisations. The whole question she regarded as one of great complexity, and its many difficulties had not, perhaps, been fully considered. But before calling upon women to come forward and train, it would certainly have been desirable to ascertain the extent to which work was needed by women who had habitually to earn their own wages.

FORM OF REGISTRY.

CLASSES OF EMPLOYMENT.

A form has also been issued which women able to render services are asked to obtain at a Labour Exchange or local agency of the Unemployment Fund, and to fill up. It is as follows:

WAR SERVICE FOR WOMEN.

Are you able to work, and free to work, but not working?

You should have your name entered at once on the Special Register of Women for War Service, which is being prepared by the Government Labour Exchanges.

Women are wanted at once to work in the following (among other) occupations:

Farm work.	Clothing machining.
Dairy work.	Light machining for armament.
Leather stitching.
Brush-making.

But even if you have no special experience of any of this work, you should register. It may be possible to train you. It is certain that as more men join the forces, more women will be wanted to work while they are away. Even if you can work only half of each day you may be useful.

You can register either by going to a Labour Exchange, or by filling up the form on the back of this, and posting it to the nearest Labour Exchange. If you do not know where the Exchange is, you can post the form to the Central Office for Labour Exchanges and Unemployment Insurance, Queen Anne's-chambers, Broadway, S.W. No fees are charged.

Board of Trade, March, 1915.

REGISTER OF WOMEN FOR WAR SERVICE.

(1) Surname .....
Other names .....
(2) Full address .....
(3) Age .....
(4) Married, single, or widow .....
(5) Have you ever done any paid work, and if so, ...

ward and train, it would certainly have been desirable to ascertain the extent to which work was needed by women who had habitually to earn their own wages.

FORM OF REGISTRY.

CLASSES OF EMPLOYMENT.

A form has also been issued which women able to render services are asked to obtain at a Labour Exchange or local agency of the Unemployment Fund, and to fill up. It is as follows:

WAR SERVICE FOR WOMEN.

Are you able to work, and free to work, but not working?

You should have your name entered at once on the Special Register of Women for War Service, which is being prepared by the Government Labour Exchanges.

Women are wanted at once to work in the following (among other) occupations:

Farm work.
Dairy work.
Leather stitching.
Brush-making.
Clothing machining.
Light machining for armament.

But even if you have no special experience of any of this work, you should register. It may be possible to train you. It is certain that as more men join the forces, more women will be wanted to work while they are away. Even if you can work only half of each day you may be useful.

You can register either by going to a Labour Exchange, or by filling up the form on the back of this, and posting it to the nearest Labour Exchange. If you do not know where the Exchange is, you can post the form to the Central Office for Labour Exchanges and Unemployment Insurance, Queen Anne's-chambers, Broadway, S.W. No fees are charged.

Board of Trade, March, 1915.

REGISTER OF WOMEN FOR WAR SERVICE.

(1) Surname .....
Other names .....
(2) Full address .....
(3) Age .....
(4) Married, single, or widow.....
(5) Have you ever done any paid work, and if so, what? .....
(6) If so, when? Giving date as nearly as possible .....
What kind .....
Employer's name or names .....
(7) Are you free to work:
(a) Whole time .....
(b) Part time .....
(c) To leave your home for work if pay is sufficient, and housing satisfactory?.....
(8) Is there any other work which you are willing and able to do? .....
(9) If you have never done paid work, what kinds of work are you best suited for? .....
(10) Are you prepared to be trained for work which you have not previously done? .....

* SPECIAL QUESTIONS FOR PERSONS WILLING TO DO AGRICULTURAL WORK.

Have you ever worked at any of the following branches of work:

(a) Milking .....
(b) Dairy-work .....
(c) Care of live stock .....
(d) Light farm work .....
(e) Market gardening .....
(f) Poultry farming .....
(g) Ordinary gardening .....

If you have not, state which branch you think you would be suited for .....

*Persons answering these questions should, if desiring agricultural work only, fill up Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 7, and 10. Persons willing to take agricultural and other work should fill in all numbers.

The Manchester Guardian, March 19th. 1915.

WOMEN WORKERS.

THE PROSPECT OF THE NEW REGISTER.

TO FILL RECRUITING GAPS.

The announcement by the Board of Trade yesterday respecting the compilation of a special register of women who are willing to accept paid work in order to release men for the army or for the production of munitions of war has aroused great interest among women of all classes. The matter was discussed by officials of various women's organisations, and some of the questions which have been asked suggest that a more detailed explanation of the scheme would be welcomed.

In the first place, it may be pointed out that no immediate transference of men's work to women on a vast scale is contemplated. The object is to ascertain precisely the extent and quality of the women's labour which will be available, but it will only be utilised as the need arises. Judging from preliminary inquiries which were made yesterday it is expected that a very large number of women will register, and probably they will fall into three main classes. These are women workers who are at present wholly or partially unemployed; women who have not hitherto been employed but who possess qualifications which would enable them to do work of some kind satisfactorily; and women who would be willing to be trained for particular kinds of employment. The first class would possibly include a large number of married women who were formerly engaged in industrial or clerical work, and whose present circumstances permit a renewal of employment. The other two classes might be drawn to a considerable extent from the more comfortably-off women who are prepared to make sacrifices for the good of the nation.

The "register for war service" will not be associated in any way with the ordinary women's register of the Labour Exchanges, and it should be clearly understood that no woman who enters her name, or who fills up a form, is under an obligation to accept any post if the character of the work, the hours, or the pay are not satisfactory to her.

In Manchester.

It is not thought likely that many women who are ordinarily engaged in industrial work in the Manchester district will ask to be registered. The officials of nearly all women's trade unions in the city report that since the first week of the war a remarkable decrease in unemployment among their members has been recorded, so that at the present time comparatively few women who are of value industrially are out of work. The Labour Exchange statistics suggest a less favourable condition of things, but owing to special circumstances they do not afford an accurate indication of the state of trade in Manchester. In August and September last many elderly women workers, such as charwomen and office cleaners, were discharged, and very few have been taken back again. There is little prospect of new employment for them, because of their limited capacity, but registration at the Labour Exchange helps them to obtain relief.

All the skilled mechinists who were displaced at the outbreak of the war have now been absorbed in the shirt-making and clothing industries. In offices and shops girls and women have taken the places of men who enlisted, and in rubber and furniture works employment is more regular now than it was two or three months ago. Fancy leather workers are in great demand for the manufacture of belts, pouches, and other leather equipment for war purposes, and only in the shipping trade is women's employment still unsatisfactory. At one time out of 1,300 members of the union of these workers, who chiefly help in packing, 25 per cent were totally, and 50 per cent partially, unemployed.

Registration the Next Step.

It will not be possible to work out any definite scheme for the utilisation of the reserve of women workers until a sufficient number have registered to justify an analysis which will show reliable and representative results. For the reasons outlined above it may be that in districts like Manchester the proportion of women able to undertake manual labour will not be great. It has been suggested that a large number of men in Government, municipal, railway, and commercial offices could be replaced by capable women, but the possibilities in this direction are limited. Women workers in industry will probably be needed more urgently than in offices in order to facilitate the task of increasing the output of munitions of war. It may be necessary to attempt on a considerable ascale a transference of men wrom other industries to the shops in which Government work is being done, and this would only be feasible if women workers were available to take their places. Obviously men who have led sedentary lives in offices could not very well be mobilised for the production of armaments.

All these matters are now occupying the authorities concerned, and it is hoped that within the next few weeks it will be possible to formulate a more definite policy. Other important subjects, such as that of the effect on wages of increased employment of women, and the question of guarantees for the future, are also being discussed by trade union leaders. In this connection it is of interest to note that women employed in the clothing industry in Manchester have just gained—through the unobtrusive effort of their trade union—an increase of piece rates which is equal to 1s. 6d or 2s. a week on the average.

Married Women.

Mrs. H. L. Smith, the secretary of the Women's Employment Sub-committee of the Relief Committee, thinks that one likely result of the registration will be to open avenues to employment for married women. A great many women of the lower middle-class, she said, were earning their own living before they were married, and they would go back to the old employment as efficient as when they left it. If the husbands desired to enlist the wives would then be able to keep the home going. For the wives of men earning £150 to £200 a year to keep themselves and two or three children on the Government separation allowance was impossible. But if they could supplement that allowance with their own earnings they could get along all right, and they would be in a position to pay for the care of their children during the day. According to the present plan there would only be a demand wor women as more men enlisted, but if the Government ever decided to create an additional army for home defence in order to set freeall other men for service abroad, there would b a much larger field for women's work.

GS3/17 663.

The Standard, March 19th. 1915.

TO RELEASE THE MEN.

WAR WORK FOR WOMEN.

IMMEDIATE RESPONSE TO NEW SCHEME.

The Government's appeal to women of all classes who have the whole or part of their time at their disposal to undertake paid work at present performed by men, and to fill gaps which already exist in the army of labour, is meeting with cordial response. There are two primary objectives in this organisation of all the available female working power in the country:—

1. To free gradually as many men as possible for active service with the Forces, by supplying women to take their places in the industries in which they are at present engaged.

2. To train women to assist in such industries as the turning of cartridge-cases, in order that the enormous requirements of the armies in the field in respect of munitions of war may be constantly and fully supplied.

It does not matter whether a woman has been accustomed to work for her living or has never done paid work in her life; whether she is gentle or simple; whether she is young or of a certain age, married or single. The time is almost surely coming when her services for the State—agricultural, industrial, clerical, or however else she may best be useful—will be called for, and compensated at carefully adjusted market rates of wages.

WHAT WOMEN SHOULD DO.

Any woman who is willing to take a man's place, if required, and do his work while he is away fighting, should enter herself upon the Special Register of Women for War Service which is being prepared by the Board of Trade Labour Exchanges for the Government. She can obtain the requisite form at any Labour Exchange, and register there on the spot. In a day or two Post Offices will be supplied with forms, to be issued to applicants. The General Manager, Board of Trade Labour Exchanges, Queen Anne's-chambers, Broadway, Westminster, will post forms on application by letter. The Government wants to find out what reserve of women's labour is available. As openings for employment arise full particulars will be sent to the Labour Exchanges.

There is already an urgent demand for women's labour in the industries of military clothing machining and light machining for armament. Women can be trained for this kind of work even if they have no previous experience, and after a month's tuition can earn steadily from 28s. to 32s. a week. But the first thing for every woman to do is to register.

There are about 50,000 women unemployed at the present time who are normal wage-earners, and unless they are incapacitated by ill-health these women will, of course, be absorbed first into the newly opened fields of female industry. Every patriotic woman who has leisure time available will apply for one of these forms and fill it up, but by doing so she does not bind herself to accept any work offered her.

EARLY APPLICANTS.

At the Central Office of the Board of Trade Labour Exchanges at Queen Anne's Gate, between 30 and 40 women registered themselves yesterday morning, the first calling as early as 9.40. They represented all walks of life—educated ladies who desired clerical and secretarial work, and working women who desired factory employment, and so on. Many expressed their willingness to work in armament factories; one applicant wanted "decorative painting" employment; another applied for "nursing or armament work," and stated that she held a certificate for electrical knowledge; while a third asked to drive a delivery van, as she was "accustomed to horses."

The Board of Trade attaches very great im-

The Star, March 19th. 1915.

THE WOMEN ARE READY.

By LADY FRANCES BALFOUR.

The Government is making plans for a mobilisation of women for industrial work. Emergency labour to take the place of the workers who have enlisted is urgently needed in many important industries, and the nation looks to the women to step into the breach. In this article, Lady Frances Balfour indicates the complete readiness of women to respond to the call.

THE attitude of the mid-Victorian age towards women was the one Punch formulated—"See what baby is doing, and tell her not." Everything that took woman off the sofa, and from a becoming and useless seclusion, was anathema. "Tell her not," and those women who achieved with brain or muscle were called by various names which ranged from blue-stocking to hoyden, and from that to names less polite.

We may cry aloud for vanished types of men and women, but we must take the race as we find it, and we have passed from the dictum of "tell her not" to the question "Why not?" Suddenly we are encompassed by enemies. War has altered our outlook and our world. The men of the Continent and of our Dominions are all called with one great calling. The non-combatants who are left at home are busy asking and answering "Why not?"

In this war, as the first Army went forth, there sprang into line for their aid at home and abroad all the trained women in various professions and services: women doctors, nurses, suffrage organisers, teachers; every profession and craft which has been opened or forced open to women in the last fifty years poured its efficiency into the field. To the women of the country the War Office turned when it wanted clothing, which the manly forethought had never stored, and through trained organisations, and from every home in the country, capable concentrated work was at command of the Army and its office.

Filling the Blanks.

The came, and it will become still more, the question, how to fill the place of the departed men. All sorts of amusing discussions have arisen in the papers. Male editors have gravely advised women to consider the care of the cow as her especial province. Women, trained in every art except that of the dairy, are advised to offer their services—to take their milking-stools, and go forth to tend and milk the cow, and rear the calves. It would be just as reasonable to urge the crossing-sweeper to take his broom and man the trenches. There is no harder work than the efficient care of cowshed and dairy, and those who lightly tell women of all degrees to undertake it speak foolishness. Other occupations have been considered from the point of view of "why not?" and women are suggested for the light work of tram conductors, railway booking clerks, or any of the occupations given up to men. We shall not return to a normal social condition for a generation, and "why not?" will increasingly be urged on the community. When we fall back on our army of occupation—the dwellers at home—we shall find that we must use women who have steadily and surely been preparing themselves for the day, and the emergency.

Chances Missed.

The granting of the right to work, the recognition that women are fitted to work side by side with men, must not be given only in such proportion as men find certain work distasteful to themselves. In the stress of war, women have been used for every department, short of actually handling the rifle and forming part of a marching regiment. They are used in the factories that manufacture the engines of war, that clothe the soldier and feed him. How far better, and more economically to the State, would the soldier have been fed had the cooking arrangements of the camps been placed in the hands of women. We should have heard less about tea boiled in greasy stewpans or the cruel waste of good food. Had the women been called on to organise laundry work we should have heard less of verminous clothing and of avoidable filth. But use and wont have prevailed, and only in such enlightened philanthropic institutions where women have been working in their sphere, beside male fellow workers has the full use been made of their knowledge and special capabilities. For that great influx of refugees which has been welcomed to these shores women have sprung to the front in the organised work of the hospitality necessary to their well-being. The Government invited them over, but the officials of every Government department have turned to the women for the detailed work.

A Scarborough Husband.

It is possible some of that attitude of "better not," some of the teaching that women are too irresponsible to understand "affairs of State," is at the root of the evil of women shirkers who exist in our midst quite as plentifully as men. Women have not had a traditional training as responsible citizens. Even to-day they are left out of the councils of the nation which provides for the population in time of invasion.

When Scarborough was bombarded a member of a volunteer force never stopped his flight till he had reached the safety of London. His wife and children were left alone to cope with the dangers of the situation. They were, as householders, well quit of one coward, but they would have been more strengthened had they shared in such counsel as produced the National Guard, the special constables, and other volunteers. They should have assisted in the deliberations which decided what should be done with the helpless of all ages and sexes should the invader land on our shores. Why not? Women know the conditions of the mass of the population far better than any other class of citizens, and on all the Committees of Defence set up by Lord Lieutenants they should have had a place. And by all accounts the wits of the Lord Lieutenants would have been considerably sharpened by contact with some of the women citizens who reside on the coasts nearest the possible points of invasion.

Consult Them.

Why not consult women in that government which concerns the law and order of the community? Women will respond to the treatment which bids them rise to their doubled responsibilities, but the day is over and done when they can be treated as toys and playthings, or as bonded serfs. Tell the worst woman who ever haunted the camps of the armies of the world that her conduct helps to make or mar the fighting man, and you will appeal to something that never dies in the heart of womanhood, the instinct to serve, to protect and to strengthen—no branding or pillory, no flogging at the cart tail saves society from the drunken prostitute. No police surveillance, or warnings to avoid "women and wine," will serve to strengthen the ideal of comrades in arms against a common foe. Why not try the new and living way, and let the dead past of "tell her not" sink among the things which have ceased to be?

663 18 663

The Daily Sketch, March 19th. 1915.

THE MOBILISATION OF LABOUR.

THE two announcements published yesterday, the first the proceedings of the Board of Trade conference on the organisation of industry, the second the trumpet call to women to rally to the industrial flag, are among the most important developments of this period of stress.

THE Chancellor of the Exchequer in his speech at the Treasury was as frank and open as Lord Kitchener was last Monday. He told his hearers that the position is so serious that the Government has decided to take "absolutely unprecedented action"—to take over factories and organise the national industries for the achievement of the national aims. Good! That he will get the whole-hearted support of the workers is almost an unnecessary assertion.

THERE was only one obstacle in the way of his attaining that co-operation, which is an essential factor in the success of the national plans. It lay in the prospect of employers making exorbitant profits out of the military and naval contracts, and the failure of the men to share in the benefits.

THAT obstacle, which must have continued to result in friction, sabotage and strikes, has been removed by the simple statement that the profits of employers are to be limited. That is to say, the Government is going to hold the balance between labour and capital. Capital is to have its percentage shorn whilst labour is to surrender any of all restrictions on output and overtime, which may tend to check the production of material, without an ample supply of which the Allies are tied to their present positions in the field.

THIS ought to mean a truce, at all events until peace is made, in the class warfare which has been so preached and promulgated of recent years, and which is to a large extent the cause of Lord Kitchener's serious anxiety.

HARDLY less important is the Board of Trade circular inviting the women of England to take a share in helping us out of the present crisis.

THOUSANDS of women can be employed at once in the ammunition, armament, and clothing factories throughout the country. In a short while, when the commandeered factories have been set going, thousands more can be used. The agriculture of this country can be turned over almost entirely to female labour, and the men now engaged in it released for service in the ranks at home or abroad.

IN this country the employment of women is by no means so general as in other countries. The visitor to Scandinavia is astonished at the extent to which the weaker sex has monopolised certain trades, especially in the fields and dairies. We are not advocating the replacement of men, either permanently or generally by women, but we are looking forward to women in these days of national emergency taking up, for the time being, some of the lighter labour which has been hitherto the monopoly of man.

THE present is an ideal occasion for women workers to step out of the sweating shops and gain a fair wage for fair work.

IT is more even than that. If the women of Britain will help the country now, the country will help them. In Finland the women won the vote by the ungrudging sacrifices they made for the country. Our women can do the same.

A GREAT many women, especially wives of men on active service, have stopped would be welcomed.

In the first place, it may be pointed out that no immediate transference of men's work to women on a vast scale is contemplated. The object is to ascertain precisely the extent and quality of the women's labour which will be available, but it will only be utilised as the need arises. Judging from preliminary inquiries which were made yesterday it is expected that a very large number of women will register, and probably they will fall into three main classes. These are women workers who are at present wholly or partially unemployed; women who have not hitherto been employed but who possess qualifications which would enable them to do work of some kind satisfactorily; and women who would be willing to be trained for particular kinds of employment. The first class would possibly include a large number of married women who were formerly engaged in industrial or clerical work, and whose present circumstances permit a renewal of employment. The other two classes might be drawn to a considerable extent from the more comfortably-off women who are prepared to make sacrifices for the good of the nation.

The "register for war service" will not be associated in any way with the ordinary women's register of the Labour Exchanges, and it should be clearly understood that no woman who enters her name, or who fills up a form, is under an obligation to accept any post if the character of the work, the hours, or the pay are not satisfactory to her.

In Manchester.

It is not thought likely that many women who are ordinarily engaged in industrial work in the Manchester district will ask to be registered. The officials of nearly all women's trade unions in the city report that since the first week of the war a remarkable decrease in unemployment among their members has been recorded, so that at the present time comparatively few women who are of value industrially are out of work. The Labour Exchange statistics suggest a less favourable condition of things, but owing to special circumstances they do not afford an accurate indication of the state of trade in Manchester. In August and September last many elderly women workers, such as charwomen and office cleaners, were discharged, and very few have been taken back again. There is little prospect of new employment for them, because of their limited capacity, but registration at the Labour Exchange helps them to obtain relief.

All the skilled mechinists who were displaced at the outbreak of the war have now been be great. It has been suggested that a large number of men in Government, municipal, railway, and commercial offices could be replaced by capable women, but the possibilities in this direction are limited. Women workers in industry will probably be needed more urgently than in offices in order to facilitate the task of increasing the output of munitions of war. It may be necessary to attempt on a considerable ascale a transference of men wrom other industries to the shops in which Government work is being done, and this would only be feasible if women workers were available to take their places. Obviously men who have led sedentary lives in offices could not very well be mobilised for the production of armaments.

All these matters are now occupying the authorities concerned, and it is hoped that within the next few weeks it will be possible to formulate a more definite policy. Other important subjects, such as that of the effect on wages of increased employment of women, and the question of guarantees for the future, are also being discussed by trade union leaders. In this connection it is of interest to note that women employed in the clothing industry in Manchester have just gained—through the unobtrusive effort of their trade union—an increase of piece rates which is equal to 1s. 6d or 2s. a week on the average.

Married Women.

Mrs. H. L. Smith, the secretary of the Women's Employment Sub-committee of the Relief Committee, thinks that one likely result of the registration will be to open avenues to employment for married women. A great many women of the lower middle-class, she said, were earning their own living before they were married, and they would go back to the old employment as efficient as when they left it. If the husbands desired to enlist the wives would then be able to keep the home going. For the wives of men earning £150 to £200 a year to keep themselves and two or three children on the Government separation allowance was impossible. But if they could supplement that allowance with their own earnings they could get along all right, and they would be in a position to pay for the care of their children during the day. According to the present plan there would only be a demand wor women as more men enlisted, but if the Government ever decided to create an additional army for home defence in order to set freeall other men for service abroad, there would b a much larger field for women's work.

country:—

1. To free gradually as many men as possible for active service with the Forces, by supplying women to take their places in the industries in which they are at present engaged.

2. To train women to assist in such industries as the turning of cartridge-cases, in order that the enormous requirements of the armies in the field in respect of munitions of war may be constantly and fully supplied.

It does not matter whether a woman has been accustomed to work for her living or has never done paid work in her life; whether she is gentle or simple; whether she is young or of a certain age, married or single. The time is almost surely coming when her services for the State—agricultural, industrial, clerical, or however else she may best be useful—will be called for, and compensated at carefully adjusted market rates of wages.

WHAT WOMEN SHOULD DO.

Any woman who is willing to take a man's place, if required, and do his work while he is away fighting, should enter herself upon the Special Register of Women for War Service which is being prepared by the Board of Trade Labour Exchanges for the Government. She can obtain the requisite form at any Labour Exchange, and register there on the spot. In a day or two Post Offices will be supplied with forms, to be issued to applicants. The General Manager, Board of Trade Labour Exchanges, Queen Anne's-chambers, Broadway, Westminster, will post forms on application by letter. The Government wants to find out what reserve of women's labour is available. As openings for employment arise full particulars will be sent to the Labour Exchanges.

There is already an urgent demand for women's labour in the industries of military clothing machining and light machining for armament. Women can be trained for this kind of work even if they have no previous experience, and after a month's tuition can earn steadily from 28s. to 32s. a week. But the first thing for every woman to do is to register.

There are about 50,000 women unemployed at the present time who are normal wage-earners, and unless they are incapacitated by ill-health these women will, of course, be absorbed first into the newly opened fields of female industry. Every patriotic woman who has leisure time available will apply for one of these forms and fill it up, but by doing so she does not bind herself to accept any work offered her.

EARLY APPLICANTS.

At the Central Office of the Board of Trade Labour Exchanges at Queen Anne's Gate, between 30 and 40 women registered themselves yesterday morning, the first calling as early as 9.40. They represented all walks of life—educated ladies who desired clerical and secretarial work, and working women who desired factory employment, and so on. Many expressed their willingness to work in armament factories; one applicant wanted "decorative painting" employment; another applied for "nursing or armament work," and stated that she held a certificate for electrical knowledge; while a third asked to drive a delivery van, as she was "accustomed to horses."

The Board of Trade attaches very great importance to the employer undertaking to keep men's places open for them. This has the double effect of encouraging men to enlist and avoiding the permanent displacement of men by women after the war is over. As to the training of women, the view is held that in many cases the employer would be able to train them, as had been done in light armament work. With regard to agriculture, the Board of Agriculture is, with the Board of Trade, arranging for the training. The agricultural colleges are taking one or two women each for this purpose, and although in a modest way something is being done.

that took woman off the sofa, and from a becoming and useless seclusion, was anathema. "Tell her not," and those women who achieved with brain or muscle were called by various names which ranged from blue-stocking to hoyden, and from that to names less polite.

We may cry aloud for vanished types of men and women, but we must take the race as we find it, and we have passed from the dictum of "tell her not" to the question "Why not?" Suddenly we are encompassed by enemies. War has altered our outlook and our world. The men of the Continent and of our Dominions are all called with one great calling. The non-combatants who are left at home are busy asking and answering "Why not?"

In this war, as the first Army went forth, there sprang into line for their aid at home and abroad all the trained women in various professions and services: women doctors, nurses, suffrage organisers, teachers; every profession and craft which has been opened or forced open to women in the last fifty years poured its efficiency into the field. To the women of the country the War Office turned when it wanted clothing, which the manly forethought had never stored, and through trained organisations, and from every home in the country, capable concentrated work was at command of the Army and its office.

Filling the Blanks.

The came, and it will become still more, the question, how to fill the place of the departed men. All sorts of amusing discussions have arisen in the papers. Male editors have gravely advised women to consider the care of the cow as her especial province. Women, trained in every art except that of the dairy, are advised to offer their services—to take their milking-stools, and go forth to tend and milk the cow, and rear the calves. It would be just as reasonable to urge the crossing-sweeper to take his broom and man the trenches. There is no harder work than the efficient care of cowshed and dairy, and those who lightly tell women of all degrees to undertake it speak foolishness. Other occupations have been considered from the point of view of "why not?" and women are suggested for the light work of tram conductors, railway booking clerks, or any of the occupations given up to men. We shall not return to a normal social condition for a generation, and "why not?" will increasingly be urged on the community. When we fall back on our army of occupation—the dwellers at home—we shall find that we must use women who have steadily and surely been preparing themselves for the day, and the emergency.

Chances Missed.

The granting of the right to work, the recognition that women are fitted to work side by side with men, must not be given only in such proportion as men find certain work distasteful to themselves. In the stress of war, women have been used for every department, short of actually of verminous clothing and of avoidable filth. But use and wont have prevailed, and only in such enlightened philanthropic institutions where women have been working in their sphere beside male fellow workers has the full use been made of their knowledge and special capabilities. For that great influx of refugees which has been welcomed to these shores women have sprung to the front in the organised work of the hospitality necessary to their well-being. The Government invited them over, but the officials of every Government department have turned to the women for the detailed work.

A Scarborough Husband.

It is possible some of that attitude of "better not," some of the teaching that women are too irresponsible to understand "affairs of State," is at the root of the evil of women shirkers who exist in our midst quite as plentifully as men. Women have not had a traditional training as responsible citizens. Even to-day they are left out of the councils of the nation which provides for the population in time of invasion.

When Scarborough was bombarded a member of a volunteer force never stopped his flight till he had reached the safety of London. His wife and children were left alone to cope with the dangers of the situation. They were, as householders, well quit of one coward, but they would have been more strengthened had they shared in such counsel as produced the National Guard, the special constables, and other volunteers. They should have assisted in the deliberations which decided what should be done with the helpless of all ages and sexes should the invader land on our shores. Why not? Women know the conditions of the mass of the population far better than any other class of citizens, and on all the Committees of Defence set up by Lord Lieutenants they should have had a place. And by all accounts the wits of the Lord Lieutenants would have been considerably sharpened by contact with some of the women citizens who reside on the coasts nearest the possible points of invasion.

Consult Them.

Why not consult women in that government which concerns the law and order of the community? Women will respond to the treatment which bids them rise to their doubled responsibilities, but the day is over and done when they can be treated as toys and playthings, or as bonded serfs. Tell the worst woman who ever haunted the camps of the armies of the world that her conduct helps to make or mar the fighting man, and you will appeal to something that never dies in the heart of womanhood, the instinct to serve, to protect and to strengthen—no branding of pillory, no flogging at the cart tail saved society from the drunken prostitute. No police surveillance, or warnings to avoid "women and wine," will serve to strengthen the ideal of comrades in arms against a common foe. Why not try the new and living way, and let the dead past of "tell her not" sink among the things which have ceased to be?

speech at the Treasury was as frank and open as Lord Kitchener was last Monday. He told his hearers that the position is so serious that the Government has decided to take "absolutely unprecedented action"—to take over factories and organise the national industries for the achievement of the national aims. Good! That he will get the whole-hearted support of the workers is almost an unnecessary assertion.

THERE was only one obstacle in the way of his attaining that co-operation, which is an essential factor in the success of the national plans. It lay in the prospect of employers making exorbitant profits out of the military and naval contracts, and the failure of the men to share in the benefits.

THAT obstacle, which must have continued to result in friction, sabotage and strikes, has been removed by the simple statement that the profits of employers are to be limited. That is to say, the Government is going to hold the balance between labour and capital. Capital is to have its percentage shorn whilst labour is to surrender any or all restrictions on output and overtime, which may tend to check the production of material, without an ample supply of which the Allies are tied to their present positions in the field.

THIS ought to mean a truce, at all events until peace is made, in the class warfare which has been so preached and promulgated of recent years, and which is to a large extent the cause of Lord Kitchener's serious anxiety.

HARDLY less important is the Board of Trade circular inviting the women of England to take a share in helping us out of the present crisis.

THOUSANDS of women can be employed at once in the ammunition, armament, and clothing factories throughout the country. In a short while, when the commandeered factories have been set going, thousands more can be used. The agriculture of this country can be turned over almost entirely to female labour, and the men now engaged in it released for service in the ranks at home or abroad.

IN this country the employment of women is by no means so general as in other countries. The visitor to Scandinavia is astonished at the extent to which the weaker sex has monopolised certain trades, especially in the fields and dairies. We are not advocating the replacement of men, either permanently or generally by women, but we are looking forward to women in these days of national emergency taking up, for the time being, some of the lighter labour which has been hitherto the monopoly of man.

THE present is an ideal occasion for women workers to step out of the sweating shops and gain a fair wage for fair work.

IT is more even than that. If the women of Britain will help the country now, the country will help them. In Finland the women won the vote by the ungrudging sacrifices they made for the country. Our women can do the same.

A GREAT many women, especially wives of men on active service, have stopped earning money themselves. The Government separation allowances have put them comparatively on "easy street."

THAT'S not a good reason. They must try to do their bit just as well as their man is doing his. What they may earn now will all be to the good, a little stand-by for the rainy days, for the period of depression which must inevitably follow the war, during the readjustment of the world to new conditions.

THE MAN IN THE STREET.

Daily Mail, March 19th 1915.

663/19

663

WHAT THE WOMEN CAN DO.

A NOVELIST'S APPEAL.

By FLORA ANNIE STEEL.

The Board of Trade has initiated a great scheme of State-paid war work for women. The well-known novelist, Mrs. Flora Annie Steel, discusses in the following article some of the work that women can do.

Seven months have passed since August 4, 1914, found us unprepared for war. If this was true of men, it was doubly, trebly so of women. Devoid of all experience of things national, imperial, ignored by the State as a factor in the vast problem that was opening out, women stood at first at the doors of their threatened homes knitting comforters feverishly and telling themselves a trifle wistfully that the whole duty of womanhood in war time was to shed tears in secret and cosset up the fighters in public. The feet of a perplexed male patriot could at least lead him to a recruiting office; woman had no such outlet for her seething desire to help. Some few there were possessed already of necessary qualifications, many more possessed of means, position, influence, who found activity at once as doctors, nurses, organisers; but the ruck sewed and suffered in silence.

Then common sense, never very far distant from woman's practical grip on detail, suggested that the leisure of the whole adult female population ought to be in excess of the needs and nursing of a fraction of the male population, and that there was other, less dilettante, work to be done.

Owing to their already existing organisations the various suffrage societies were the first (outside the purely nursing associations) to enter the field. Setting politics aside definitely, they started various schemes for the relief of distress, and therefore the relief of the rates, for which every citizen should be, and doubtless is, profoundly grateful. Other organisations, such as the Women's Emergency Corps, followed suit so rapidly that now the wonder comes whether the whole world will remain the leagues that have been founded. This plethora of philanthropy is doubtless a mistake and will be rectified as time goes on and we learn to economise even charity. It marks one important phase, however—namely, woman's sudden realisation of her responsibilities for the war. She saw that through, for the sake of protection, she had delegated her duties as an independent human being to man, as principal she was still bound by the acts of her agent. Some of her activities were purely palliative, though the theory that wage and not doles was the objective obtain in all home industries, such as the toy-making industry are constructive, and to the enlargement of these the efforts of some of our most capable women are mainly directed.

* * * * *

One feature, however, pervades all; they are all—even the women's hospitals, which extend from our shores to far Serbia—devoid of any sectarian blessing. The army authorities must keep thousands of women off the rates unless for, if any, contracts for the supply of national needs. In the instance only, when Lord Kitchener's Army was shoeless, an offer to supply 1,000 a week at usual contract rates was made and refused. Doubtless with reason; but there can be no question that the persistent and consistent refusal of help on all sides lay, and still lies, heavy on many a capable woman's heart.

We realise, however, that the next seven months must bring a different policy. For if this hateful war is to end speedily we must have men and still more men. Up till now over a million have been withdrawn from civil life, without much dislocation of "business as usual," and without any call whatever upon the working powers of women; for our ticket collectors, a vast army of shop assistants, and the huge horde of small Government employees are still male. But men continue to go, and the women have at last been taken into the confidence of the State.

"Women," says a recent writer, "have no peers as patriots when once they understand the justice of fighting for an honourable cause."

* * * * *

So there is no cry among us for peace at any price, but peace, and that speedily, we must and will have. The wastage of life which we go down into the shadow of death to bring back for the world must be ended as soon as possible with honour. It is clear that out of every hundred males there are at least sixteen who are neither too old, too young, nor too weakly to try to bring this peace. It is clear also that the colours of our country can only command at present eight out of these sixteen. But if we women claim that England shall have the remaining eight we must be prepared to do more work than woollies! The time for these is indeed almost overpast; the summer of our discontent is at hand. But there will be no lack of work to do, and even if it takes two women to get through the work of one man there are plenty of women available. That much of man's labour is unsuitable for us we cheerfully admit, but a very simple process of levelling up would obviate this.

In some ways, of course, skilled labour stands apart, but the man of forty-five who is digging in a woman's garden would be set free to do quarryman's work if the woman handled the spade. The more, therefore, that we can do for ourselves the better it will be for our country. Let us therefore take up the woman's burden as it was in the beginning of time and be once more the tillers of the ground, the maker of the daily bread. The price we shall be paid for our labours is well worth it. Already this war is bringing about much for which woman in the past has asked in vain. The separation allowances of soldiers as they now stand pave the way for a State endowment of motherhood; the extension of them to other dependents save the monopolised woman—the wife—points the way to a keener recognition of the fact that there are other relations between men and women than those of sex.

* * * * *

It will doubtless be a little disconcerting, a little dislocating to trade union principles to see a woman painting her own house or glazing her own window. But at present it seems, at any rate to the writer of this article, that the greatest need of her country is dislocation. England needs to be roused; she needs to leave the low levels of life. Germany at this moment is sending up to the Great White Throne a spiritual force of lofty self-devotion and pure patriotism almost unequalled in the history of the world. We condemn her policy now, as it will be condemned hereafter. None the less we know that there are many good men and true, many noble women whose hearts' desire is, as ours is, for victory. We cannot afford to say as the old French lady said to her minister's reminder that prayers were also being offered up by the French in the Napoleonic wars, "Hoot awa! The Lord will no be understanding their gibberish."

No! we are face to face with a great national upheaval, a magnificent effort. Unless England can match it she will go under; for the great end of all life of ours is not conquest or country; it is character.

Manchester Courier, March 19th 1915

OUR LONDON LETTER.

FROM

STAFF CORRESPONDENTS.

(BY SPECIAL WIRE.)

69, FLEET STREET, LONDON.
Thursday Night.

Mobilising Women's Labour

Great interest has been aroused by the Government's tentative plans for mobilising women for war service, and employers in particular await the first results of the Labour Exchange registration scheme with curiosity. There are many trades where the services of women could be utilised with great advantage, and it is pretty well known that some of the firms engaged in them are discouraging their employees from enlisting because they do not know how to replace these workers. This applies not only to the manufacturing industries, but to agriculture, where a great shortage of labour already exists. Much has been spoken and written on the question of employing women on the land, and some farming authorities are not altogether favourable to the idea, contending that young boys would be much more suitable for the work. The Board of Trade is strongly of the opinion that the farmer ought to give the preference to women before employing children The general idea is that the object of the scheme is to ascertain approximately how many men can be released for service in the fighting forces, but there are not wanting those who believe that the appeal foreshadows the advent of compulsion in one form or another. Whether or not this is actually the case, it is clear that the Government have at last realised the necessity of taking steps to secure the release of all men of military age not employed on the manufacture of armaments and other essential work of a kind that can only be performed by highly trained artisans and workmen.

Daily Mail, March 19th. 1915.

THE CALL TO WOMEN.

WHERE TO GO TO "ENLIST."

The call to women to enlist in the Industrial Army so that more men may be released for service in the field is the topic of the hour among women. How shall I enlist? What have I to do to register myself? What does it mean? were the questions put repeatedly yesterday to men relatives.

"Enlistment" is a simple process. Any woman who is ready to take up work has only to register herself at the nearest Labour Exchange. If visit to the exchange is not convenient a form for registration can be obtained from a post office. It should be filled up and forwarded to the local Labour Exchange.

On this form "recruits" are invited to give particulars of their age and previous experience as workers. If they have not previously done paid work they are invited to suggest the kind of work for which they feel themselves best suited

The wish is expressed officially that as far as possible women volunteering their services should register personally at the Labour Exchanges.

"WOMEN RECRUITS."

Between thirty and forty women registered yesterday morning at the central office of the Labour Exchanges, Queen Anne's-gate, S.W. One said she held a certificate for electrical knowledge, and another asked that she might drive a van, as she was "accustomed to horses."

At Leeds some 200 women have responded to the Government's appeal, and many of the names registered are those of women who have not worked in a factory before.

663.

The Daily Graphic, March 19th. 1915.

THE WOMEN'S RESPONSE.

Eager to do Definite Work for the Country.

"Sister Susie" is responsible for a fallacy. That celebrated ditty has perpetuated the idea that women at the present time were merely sewing and knitting. Women have, in fact, felt they were not receiving credit from the public for the great variety of national service they were rendering in war-time. Not that they have cried aloud for recognition; but the idea that they were knitting and sewing only has been hard to kill. Now that the Government are inviting all who are prepared to work to come forward, and reminding them that any woman who by working helps to release a man, or to equip a man for fighting, does national war service, it is timely to remind the men that women have already put heart and soul into all sorts of activities. They have worked on relief committees, done an immense amount of temperance work, designed and distributed posters, helped in the recreation entertainments for soldiers, looked after the soldiers' families, rescued little children from Belgium, made and distributed clothes for the refugees, done any amount of nursing and looking after infirmaries, and in a hundred other ways shown their capacity and desire to serve the country. Women have volunteered as 'bus-conductors, as taxi-drivers; to go into shops, for counter-work of any sort; as booking-clerks, dispensers, chemists, couriers, interpreters, teachers, typists. A good many of them will undertake manual work, such as gardeners; while at least two are driving milk-carts, and several are clerks in London banks.

Yet organisation is needed to get further results, and as this organisation can best be done by State machinery the new scheme is warmly welcomed. If women's names are registered, it will be known that they are ready—that is the great gain to be expected from the scheme. "Crowds and crowds of better-to-do women are waiting for an opportunity," says Miss Rosamond Smith, who has been in charge of the Bureau for Voluntary Workers run by the London Society of the National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies. "We have about 2,000 women on our books, who have shown great anxiety to be of use. We have found them ordinary opportunities of social work. But they want something more definitely for the country. Many have told me they would gladly work in the ammunition factories, filling shells. Others can drive a car. They can drive delivery vans or do clerical work. Of course, there must be no lowering of wages. All women must work for wages; those who do not need the money can easily find objects to devote it to."

Problems of the Call.

"The Athenæum has got a few women in as club servants," says another leading lady worker. "Hosts of men could be released for the war if other clubs would follow suit. In preventing waste in the catering for the Home Army, also, capable women in control would be of inestimable value."

There are, broadly, two problems. One is to utilise the reserve of new workers, including those who are in an independent position. The other is to deal with the industrial workers so as to bring their labour into the channel that will be most serviceable for the needs of the crisis. Upon this latter, Miss Rosamond Smith points out, as does everyone whose opinion is worth having, that co-operation among all women who are accustomed to deal with girls will be essential. Working girls are extraordinarily loth to take up a new occupation. An effort has been made to teach dressmakers in London to do khaki work; but frequently a girl will say, after half an hour of it, "Oh, we shall never do this"; or "I've got an 'eadache already." Miss Mary Macarthur, secretary of the Women's Trade Union League, which represents 240,000 organised women workers, says on this point: "Whilst we are, of course, aware that there is a shortage of men in many industries, and even a shortage of women in some industries, it is by no means a simple matter to arrange for the transference of labour with different experiences or in different areas. These difficulties apply to men; but they apply with double force to women, who are naturally less mobile. As I understand the Government's appeal, it is made to women who are not normally wage-earners, and even to women who have not previously been wage-earners. Knowing as I do that at the present moment there are at least 50,000 women who are normal wage-earners unemployed throughout the country, it would be desirable to have some assurance that the possibility of the adaptation of these women has been fully considered before the introduction of new, and presumably economically independent, women is contemplated. There can be no doubt that the trade-union world, even if convinced of the necessity of this innovation, will require a satisfactory guarantee on the various aspects of the proposed substitution."

Miss Sylvia Pankhurst's View.

Miss Macarthur asks in this connection whether the women substitutes are to receive the same wages as men for the same work, and what guarantee is to be given to men that when they return to civil life their situations will be open for them, and that the standard of conditions in their trades remain unimpaired? And she declares that the appointment of a national committee, including a strong representation of industrial interests, to lay down conditions of transference is one of the first safeguards which must be insisted upon. Miss Sylvia Pankhurst, again, who views the new departure as a form of industrial conscription, and presumes that the women who register will be called up to work just as recruits who sign the Parliamentary Recruiting Committee's form are called up to fight, wants a national conference of women summoned to discuss it.

A Colonial lady's opinion on the question of substituting women for men is very interesting. Mrs. Graeme-Smale, the hon. secretary of the War Service Substitutes Bureau, at 125, Pall Mall, holds strongly that there ought to be a scheme to prohibit employers from preventing men joining the Army. According to her observation, banks, accountants' and mercantile offices in London could liberate far more men than they do but for the prejudice against women's work. "I am perfectly certain, if England wanted them, every man would leave the Colonies, and the women would do their work."

It is, in short, the universal view that the organisation of women for war service might have been carried out months ago; and that now it is being tackled the details of the scheme should be settled without delay.

The Times March 19th. 1915.

THE STATE AND WOMEN'S LABOUR.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TIMES.

Sir,—The announcement by the President of the Board of Trade that a register of women for war service is to be opened at the labour exchanges throughout the country will no doubt evoke the same patriotic response to national service which has characterized the attitude of women towards the emergency created by the war. This organized effort on the part of the State to register and employ "the reserve force of women's labour, trained or untrained" will be welcomed by the many women's societies already engaged in this work of classification as an earnest of future co-ordination.

In the official statement setting out the Government scheme we find the following paragraph. "Any woman who by working helps to release a man, or to equip a man, for fighting does national war service. Every woman should register who is able and willing to take employment."

This is in fact an appeal to every able-bodied woman, not bound by family ties, to enlist in industrial war service. That women have forestalled this appeal is shown by the fact that one society alone, the Women's Emergency Corps, received 10,000 offers of personal service during the first two weeks of the war. Women doctors, interpreters, chauffeurs, motor-cyclists, gardeners, omnibus conductors, omnibus and taxi-cab drivers, lift women, &c., were ready to qualify for men's posts during the war, so as to release men for military service. That this service has not been largely utilized up to the present is attributed to the attitude of men workers, and not to the lack of response among women.

Lord Kitchener recently said, "I feel strongly that the men working long hours in the shops by day and by night, week in and week out, are doing their duty for their King and country in a like manner with those who have joined the Army for active service in the field, and I am glad to be able to state that his Majesty has approved that where service in this great work of supplying the munitions of war has been thoroughly, loyally, and continuously rendered, the award of a medal will be granted on the successful termination of the war."

To women workers engaged in war service at home, the cessation of hostilities will bring a grave dislocation of employment, and the sacrifice of their ordinary duties, for work which will necessarily only be temporary, should meet with some public recognition. It would be a cause for satisfaction among women to know that official recognition will not be denied to those women who, in the words of the Board of Trade, "by working, help to release a man, or to equip a man, for fighting." The present emergency and the Government's appeal to women form a propitious occasion for creating a precedent in the bestowal of honours in which other countries have already set us an example. In Russia all honours and decorations are conferred on women doing men's work, even the war medal is conferred on women, and King Albert of Belgium has recently bestowed the Order of Leopold on the women members of one of our field ambulances. In these circumstances it would amount to an invidious distinction were women rendered ineligible for the Industrial War Medal, and an announcement as to the Government's intentions would be welcomed by women in general.

Yours faithfully,
CONSUELO MARLBOROUGH.
Sunderland House, Mayfair, March 18.

The Times, March 19th. 1915.

663/21 663.

WOMEN'S WORK FOR WAR.

A GOOD START.

SEVEN HUNDRED APPLICANTS.

Throughout the country yesterday the Government scheme for ascertaining how the reserve force of woman labour, trained and untrained, can be made available if required aroused the greatest interest and appeared everywhere to be hailed with approval. There is no doubt of the great response that will be made by the women, but what, it is understood, the Board of Trade are not quite sure about is the extent of the response of employers. On them the success of the scheme will ultimately rest. Will they as a body be prepared to consider seriously the duty of substituting, as far as possible, female labour for male in the national interests?

The work of registration was opened yesterday, and a good start was made. The first announcement of the Government scheme appeared in the morning newspapers, and by 20 minutes to 10 o'clock the first applicants for enrolment presented themselves at the Central Labour Exchange, and the stream was steadily maintained throughout the day. By 3 o'clock in the afternoon, according to returns collected from the various districts of London, about 700 women had registered. There were working-class people among them, but the majority appeared to be middle-class people. On the whole, they were reported to be quite a useful class, including a lot of married women, who had done work before marriage and were willing to do it again now.

While there has not yet been time for employers generally to make considered statements about the Government scheme, there was a distinct disposition yesterday to view it favourably. In one quarter it was suggested that the Government themselves might lead the way by releasing the army of second division clerks and copyists.

NEW POSTS FOR WOMEN.

ASPECTS OF THE GOVERNMENT SCHEME.

(FROM A WOMAN CORRESPONDENT.)

There was a considerable stir among working women of all classes yesterday regarding the War Register of Women embodied in the official notice issued by the Board of Trade. The object of registration is stated to be to find out what reserve force of women's labour, trained or untrained, can be made available if required. But the proposed register is likely to achieve something far more than this; it is likely to give the nation at large an idea for the first time of the total amount of work done by women in a way which no census has hitherto revealed, and also to effect a certain mobility in women's industries which has hitherto been lacking.

Many women, already in good posts, have declared their intention of registering. One of the questions to be filled up is—"Is there any other work which you are willing and able to do?" There are plenty of capable women in uncongenial employment whose posts could be filled by other women, and whose talents and inclinations fit them for work other than that which they are doing. The register may succeed in changing women from one employment to another, always with the idea of setting men free for the work in the fighting line.

The proposed register is, of course, open to criticism, and is likely to meet with it. Already one of the suffrage societies is inviting a conference to discuss the questions of wages and political status which the entrance of women into industries or sections of industries, hitherto the province of men, are likely to make vital matters. At one of the women's societies yesterday it was stated that the question of wages would be likely to cause the most discussion. The function of the Labour Exchanges, where the register will be kept, is not to secure the best wages possible for the applicant, but to bring employer and employed together. The women must, in the interest of the men whose place they take, secure the best terms possible.

Developing the question of the substitution of women for men, raised on several occasions recently in The Times, it might be suggested that there is much room at the present time in the Government Departments, particularly in the Local Government Board and the Board of Education, for such a substitution. There is an enormous number of capable women coming down from the universities, employed in settlement work or "devilling" under the title of secretary for members of Parliament and other public men, who could fill such posts usually given to youths from Oxford and Cambridge with none of their experience and love of work. It was suggested incidentally yesterday by a woman educationist that the most generous move in the matter of substitution might be made at the deserted universities of Oxford and Cambridge, where elderly dons wander like shepherds without a flock, while in the women's colleges the prayer for equal academic advantages goes up daily unanswered.

Other opportunities for substitution would be found in the offices of civil engineers, in the houses where butlers and footmen are kept, among commercial travellers (where already women have made a not inconsiderable corner), in theatre box-offices, in inquiry bureaux, in the postal distributing service, as well as in the obvious ones of leather-stitching, light machining for armament and clothing.

To suggest that the many gaps in the ranks of Parliamentarians should be filled by women deputies would be perhaps hoisting the President of the Board of Trade with his own petard. But the experiment, being a temporary one, would have its useful points.

Already there is a woman governor of a prison, and the 1911 Census gives us three women grooms, nine sea pilots, four bricklayers, and one coachman. The suggested course for caterers in The Times yesterday shows one branch of work hitherto a male monopoly which is eminently suitable for women.

Aberdeen Journal, March 19th. 1915.

EMPLOYMENT OF WOMEN IN WAR TIME.

THE VIEWS OF WOMEN.

The Government appeal to women willing to work, and so release men for the war, to register their names with the Labour Exchanges, is having an immediate response. The Board of Trade is conferring with leaders of the trade unions in connection with this great scheme, registration for which is expected to begin formally next Monday.

Miss Mary Macarthur.

Surprise was expressed yesterday by Miss Mary Macarthur, the secretary of the Women's Trade Union League, at the haste with which the Government were acting in a matter of such great social complexity. "In the banks at the present time, she said, women at £2 a week are doing the work of men who were paid £250 a year, and I can name restaurants where women at about 12s weekly have filled the places of men who earned £2. Unless there is a guarantee that the men shall return to their places, men who have families to keep, will, after the war, be faced with a serious outlook should that tendency be widely encouraged. The appointment of a representative committee, including a strong proportion of representatives of the working classes, to lay down the conditions of the transference of women from one industry to another or the substitution of women for men, must be insisted upon as an essential feature of the plan."

Lady Frances Balfour.

"I think the Government scheme," said Lady Frances Balfour, "is admirable. It is good to make use of women citizens as they are making use of men citizens. The women are ready for it, although they have hitherto been steadily discouraged from taking their part."

Lady Muir MacKenzie.

"It is a great opportunity for women, but I think we must be very careful to safeguard women's interests. Women's trade unions will need to watch that proper wages are paid to women. I understand from the Government scheme that men's wages are to be paid, but women are always cheated in the end, and it is no use trusting to men entirely. I think there should be a woman on the Central Board to look after women's interests, and I think a great many women factory inspectors must be appointed."

Miss Sylvia Pankhurst.

I regard the scheme as industrial conscription for women, as I presume that women who sign the register may be called up by the Board of Trade. We approve of the scheme if it will help women to get the vote. It requires other safeguards, such as equal pay for men's work. I think a conference of women's societies—political, industrial, and social—should be called on the subject, and, with that object in view, I am getting into touch with several organisations.

The Countess of Limerick.

I am perfectly sure that the women of Great Britain will respond to the Government's call. The woman of to-day is a different being from her sister of the Dickens' novel. Her power of endurance is as wonderful as her enthusiasm for work.

Leeds Mercury, March 19th. 1915.

WOMEN AND WAR WORK

READY RESPONSE TO APPEAL OF THE GOVERNMENT.

Inquiries made in Leeds yesterday, by our representative, showed that several industries engaged on Government work are rquiring female workers. At Messrs. Greenwood and Batley, of Armley, who are making ammunition for the Government, about 400 women are engaged in the cartridge department. Their work is regarded as partly skilled, but unskilled women are engaged and then trained.

Mr. J. B. Hamilton (Leeds Tramways Manager) did not think women would be suitable for tramway work, but if it came to a necessity they could be used as conductors. Women could also be employed in collecting money, but he expressed the opinion that the scarcity of female labour, owing to the production of war material, was probably greater than the dearth of skilled workmen.

"It is the women who have never done any work in their lives whom we would like to appeal to," remarked a Government official. "There are several ways in which they might show their patriotism. They could be occupied in clerical work, dairy work, farm work, leather stitching, brush making, clothing, machinery, and light machinery for armaments."

There was a good response to the appeal at the Labour Exchanges yesterday, and the people who presented themselves were just the class required. The demand for female labour at the present time appears to be more pronounced in the ammunition shops than in the clothing factories. Although women cannot be employed in the heavy trades and highly-skilled professions, they could be employed in light machinery. It is probable that a great number of women will be found employment in the manufacture of cartridge cases and on parts of shells at a very early date.

THE POSITION AT HALIFAX.

That there is any considerable reserve women labour in Halifax is regarded as doubtful. It has not, as yet, been shown to exist by any rush to register under the Government scheme.

The textile mills in Halifax, if they could only secure them, could provide employment for many more women workers, so busy are they on Government work. Married women figure largely among the workers, and there are no doubt many more married women who, having no exacting home ties, could swell the number, if they could be made to realise the necessity for their labour.

In this way, some few male textile workers might obtain release, but the number of factory hands still eligible is estimated at only a few. Among the engineers there are hundreds who would readily pass the Army doctor, but they are not being accepted for the Army, having regard to their being engaged on the making of war material, and their work, in any case, could not be taken over by women.

The likely openings for any reserve women labour there may be in Halifax are, not in taking the place of men, but in services where they would be an augmentation to the existing employees.

NO SCOPE AT BRADFORD.

From inquiries made by a "Mercury" representative at the Bradford Labour Exchange, last evening, it appears that up to the present there has not yet been any appreciable response. It was not expected that there would be so soon. There has not yet been sufficient time for the women to think the matter over.

As a matter of fact, there is not much scope in Bradford for drawing upon large numbers of women, because the textile industry is already employing women labour up to the full limit.

Trade is so brisk, and enlistments have made such a big demand upon the men of the city, that there is a general shortage of labour, and practically no unemployment exists.

663/2

663.

Daily Citizen,
March 19th 1915.

"MELODRAMATIC."

MISS MACARTHUR ON THE APPEAL TO WOMEN.

Miss Mary R. Macarthur, secretary of the Women's Trade Union League, which represents over 240,000 organised women workers, holds that the Government would have been well advised, before issuing its appeal to women (referred to on Page 5), to have consulted representatives of the trade unions.

Interviewed by a representative of The Daily Citizen yesterday, Miss Macarthur said :—

"The appeal seems to have been hurriedly drafted, and has evidently not been the subject of much consideration. One would agree that in a national crisis the old ideal of 'from each according to his ability and to each according to his needs' ought to apply. That is a good collectivist principle, but it is a very difficult principle to apply to an individualistic system of industry.

"From the point of view of mobilising industry and organising production, the step taken by the Government to take over the armament factories is far more important and likely to have far greater effects than the issuing of this somewhat melodramatic appeal.

"This question of the shortage of men in any particular trade and the substitution of women for them is a most difficult and delicate one, and one in which the advice and co-operation of the organised workers is essential.

"The Board of Trade notice may give a false impression of the actual industrial situation at the moment. I can only imagine that the appeal has been drafted rather with a view to possible eventualities than to deal with a present crisis. While we are, of course, aware that there is a shortage of men in many industries, and even a shortage of women in some districts, it is by no means a simple matter to arrange for the transference of labour from trade to trade or district to district.

50,000 Unemployed Women.

"These difficulties apply to men, but they apply with double force to women, who are naturally less mobile. As I understand this appeal, it is made to women who are not normally wage earners, and even to women who have not previously been wage earners.

"Knowing as I do that at the present moment there are at least 50,000 women who are normal wage earners unemployed throughout the country, it would be desirable to have some assurance that the possibility of the adaptation of these women has been fully considered before the introduction of new and presumably economically untried women is contemplated.

"There can be no doubt that the trade unions, even if convinced of the necessity of this innovation, will require a satisfactory guarantee on the various aspects of the proposed substitution.

"On what conditions are those women to be substituted for men? Are they to receive the same wages for the same work? What guarantee is to be given to men that when they return to civil life their situations will be open for them and that the standard of conditions in their trades remains uninpaired?"

"And if men receive satisfactory guarantees, what is to happen to women who have taken their places when they return if, in the meantime, the women have become self-dependent?

"I notice in some of the daily newspapers this morning a statement that women could be taught ammunition work in a fortnight, and that after a month they could earn from 28s. to 32s. a week.

Past Experience.

"Well, in our league there are thousands of women ammunition workers, and we have yet to meet a woman ammunition worker who has earned 32s. a week. I know women who have been 20 years at the work, and they are lucky if they get 15s. a week. No; under this scheme the wages, I should say, would be more likely to be 12s. a week after the first month.

"In one of the largest munition factories in the country the following rates are paid to girls for a 12-hour day, less 1½ hours for meals :—

Age.	Weekly wage.
17	8s.
18	9s.
19	10s.
20	11s.

"I hear that some patriotic, wealthy women have registered their names as being anxious to work on shell making. I view the experiment with the greatest possible interest, and I am sure that these women will add to their experience and knowledge of industrial conditions in a way which no perusal of Blue Books will ever do.

"The appointment of a national representative committee, including a strong representation of industrial interests, to lay down conditions of transference, is one of the first safeguards which must be insisted upon. The composition of such a committee must be such as to inspire confidence in the minds of the working people.

"Another aspect which will inevitably suggest itself to the minds of working men is the question as to whether this unprecedented step does not imply an official recognition of that sinister form of conscription which is involved in economic pressure, which it is almost impossible to resist. Undisguised conscription would be less objectionable. Then, at least, we should know where we were, and all classes would be on the same footing."

663/23

663

Daily Citizen,
March 19th. 1915.

ANOTHER BLUNDER.

First of all, the necessity for turning out as rapidly as possible the equipment and munitions for this war is urgent. Next, to organise the means of production is advisable. We start from these positions as outside debate, and on that footing we propose to deal with the latest action taken by the Government, including the proposed "War Service for Women." Nobody wants this war to drag on because equipment is not forthcoming. Nobody is going to risk lives for the sake of hard-and-fast regulations. The need of the time is for the practical hand and the local head. So much is axiomatic. But before going farther let us clear up a misconception. When the demand for war equipment and munitions is expanded ten times over it is not reasonable to expect our productive machinery to meet that demand without a large readjustment which is bound to present difficulties. The term "productive machinery," be it observed, includes, first, manufacturing plant and appliances; and, next, labour, skilled and unskilled. After having for eight months left matters in the hands of the contractors, "each carrying on his business in his own way," the Government have wakened up to the fact that this one-horse procedure has left them in the lurch. They have passed an Act to organise the plant and appliances. They now seek to "mobilise," as it has been called, the other part of the productive machinery—the labour.

Put briefly, that is the plain truth of the position, and we hope we have heard the last of the nonsense about the whole cause of the difficulty being Labour and trade union rules. Is it the fault of Labour that matters have been allowed to drift from the outbreak of the war until now? Has Labour made our industrial system the piecemeal and patchwork affair it is? Was it Labour that failed to foresee that ten times the quantity of equipment and munitions would be called for? Manifestly not. So manifestly not, indeed, that only a year ago the Labour Party introduced into the House of Commons a Bill for the creation of a Minister of Labour, which would have given us the very mobilisation now aspired to. It was certainly not the Labour Party which threw that Bill under the table.

Now, if capitalism, entangled in its own devices, comes to Labour to help it out it is evident to anybody that the proposal ought to be fair. Labour is not disposed at a juncture like this to drive a hard bargain. Labour, in fact, is not disposed to trade upon the country's difficulties at all. Most of the present muddle has arisen from capitalism trading on the country's difficulties and being stimulated and encouraged to trade upon them. All that Labour asks is that capitalism will not similarly trade upon Labour's disposition to pull things round. It is a perfectly reasonable condition.

In his speech to the conference which was resumed yesterday Mr. Lloyd George intimated that in the works and factories taken over the Government propose to put a limit on profits. That is a sound proposal. Next, he suggested three alternatives for the rapid settlement of disputes. To those no objection can be taken. If carried out in the right spirit, with a recognition, that is to say, of the case for a readjustment of wages to present conditions, there is no reason why all or any of them should not work well. Finally, he asked for the suspension of any trade union rights which may limit production. As we have pointed out already, that is a large concession, and it is obvious to anybody that if made it renders the case for wages readjustment doubly strong. At the same time there is a distinction between a suspension or modification of trade union rights in a works or shop under Government control and for a special purpose and a like suspension in a works or shop under private management. The concession in the one instance is to the country for the public benefit, in the other to private employers for their private benefit.

This is a thorny subject, for, as we have pointed out in this column before, trade union rights are a hard-won and precious heritage. Nobody can expect the Labour organisation of the country to cancel at a swoop all the huge past expenditure which has bought those rights. While the trade unions recognise a need of concession, it clearly lies upon the Government to assure them that the concession will not involve their injury. In a few days the Government passed an Act to take over works and factories. They can in a few days pass an Act giving trade unions the right to take back these concessions when workshops pass from under Government control and indemnifying any union for losses resulting from refusal. There is no desire to put difficulties in the way, but once for all it ought to be recognised that a man has just as much a property in his labour as in buildings and machinery, if he owns them.

In this connection, and while these efforts are being made, we deeply regret to see that the President of the Board of Trade, already responsible for so much recent muddle, has just perpetrated another blunder. Of all the ill-advised, ill-digested propositions ever made the "War Service for Women" idea is about the worst. In France, owing to the calling up of reserves, a great many women are doing what was men's labour. Without considering differences in circumstances or else ignoring them, Mr. Runciman seeks to "stimulate and encourage" a like state of things here. There is no necessity for it. If there were a necessity we doubt if he would have done anything. Since there is no necessity he is looming. As the Workers' War Emergency Committee point out, there are on the books of Labour Exchanges 60,000 men and 4,000 women in want of work. In face of that the Board of Trade circular is sheer imbecility It is impossible not to look upon it as an attempt to keep down wages and lower conditions, most of all in agriculture.

The Daily Telegraph, March 19th. 1915.

NATION'S CALL FOR WOMEN'S SERVICE

GOVERNMENT PROJECT.

CORDIAL APPROVAL.

A GREAT OPPORTUNITY.

Some days must necessarily pass before it can be known to what extent women are likely to respond to the Government's request that they should register themselves for war service.

Leaders of the women's movement are unanimous in their approval of the scheme. We are able to publish further expressions of opinion this morning.

In large centres of industry the opinion is freely held that there are few departments of work for which women are fitted in which they are not already employed; but it is recognised that the opening of additional factories will necessitate recruiting labour from a wider field.

In preparing munitions of war, in shops, on the land, and to a lesser extent in the clerical work of railways and banks, there are plentiful opportunities for women's employment.

It is anticipated that the demand for women labour that is now springing up will have the effect of raising the standard in regard both to work and wages.

WOMEN'S OWN VIEWS.

MRS. FAWCETT.

Mrs. Fawcett, who is president of the National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies, when seen by a Daily Telegraph representative, said: "The Government are obviously taking a step in the right direction. We have tried to induce them to do something before, but without success; and now they have made a move we shall offer them all the encouragement in our power. The one thing we are anxious to avoid, however, is to supply a cheap form of labour and undercut men. We want to provide really efficient women, who shall be worthy of good wages. With regard to employment in agriculture, there are serious difficulties in the way, on account of living accommodation. In the counties where agricultural wages are lowest the living accommodation is generally very defective, and not at all conducive to a satisfactory state of things. We are therefore not prepared to pledge ourselves definitely to this scheme until we have had an opportunity of looking into the conditions as to both wages and housing.

"But this idea of bringing in women who are ready to do definite work has been in our minds ever since the war began, and we trust that the demand which is now springing up will have the effect of raising the standard for women in regard to both work and wages. We want to introduce trained women; we want to see women efficiently trained for the occupations in which they are fitted to take part. All the experience of this war emphasises the importance of training. It is the trained woman who is now in demand in every department of life. A great many students are applying for admission to the London School of Medicine for Women. The standard there is a high one, and Sir Alfred Keogh, the head of the medical department in the Army, spoke the other day very highly of the work done by women in medicine.

"The interesting feature in the woman's movement at the present time is that the standard for work is being raised everywhere, and we have done our best to encourage it. Among other things we have started a fund, which has been invested, and used to help women in training for sundry occupations. In this matter parents must be prompted to action. Hitherto they have had their sons trained; henceforth they must have their daughters trained also. I think this war has really had a good effect in bringing men and women more together, and, making them rely more upon mutual friendship and co-operation. In these strenuous times we must all do our best to help one another."

MRS. DACRE FOX.

Mrs. Dacre Fox, the well-known official of the Women's Social and Political Union, said:

"We look upon the proposal as our own. Immediately the war broke out we initiated such a scheme as that now put forward by the Board of Trade—with which, let me say at once, we shall loyally and whole-heartedly co-operate—and I had an interview with Mr. Tennant, Under-Secretary for War. I also saw the officials of the Labour Department of the Board of Trade.

"The proposals are admirable. They provide the first practical opportunity by the State to help women.

"Now, more than ever before, it is absolutely necessary for the State to consider (1) how best women can help men in the present terrible conflict, and (2) how best they can help themselves in the new conditions created by the war. To the enormous number of women who, in normal times, have to fend for themselves, this war is going to add many thousands more through the loss of fathers, brothers, and husbands, now gallantly fighting for their country. Apart from immediate dependents—wives and children—there are many others who, through the death of a brother or other relative at the front, may be forced into the labour market How the vast and growing army of women is to be made self-supporting is undoubtedly one of the great problems of the war, and it will become even more insistent after the war.

FIRST IMPORTANCE.

"But of first importance at the moment is the question how women can help to keep certain departments of the nation's business going, so as to release willing men for the firing-line.

"As to their suitability, we believe that women can be employed—that they have already shown themselves to be employable—in almost any capacity of intellectual or physical work. Not only are they suitable for toy-making and flower-growing, and dairy farming, but they would prove efficient as tramway conductors, clerks in railway and tube ticket offices, bank clerks, and as taxi-drivers.

"Both in France and in Germany at the present time women are being employed as tram conductors and railway and tube ticket clerks. Women are also carrying on the agricultural work in rural parts. The only difficulty in the way is that of providing the training which is necessary for certain classes of work. Adaptable as women are in the highest degree, it necessarily takes some time to learn the technique or routine of certain trades, whether brush-making or agriculture. Our view is that, as the matter is a national one, grants might be made from the Prince of Wales's Fund."

Birmingham Post. 19.3.15.

LONDON, Thursday Night.

Women's Work and the War.

The Government's endeavour to mobilise women's work during the war naturally has called forth much comment to-day, but this largely has been limited, according as the feminine critic desired to push some sectional, social, or political idea. If the scheme is subordinated to any one of the three it is bound to fail, but the President of the Board of Trade is a level-headed man, who is not at all likely to be carried away by whimsies. Naturally, those who believe in emigration as the only panacea for the woman's work problem are pressing it forward even now, when the opening for female labour of all kinds—clerical, factory, domestic, and agricultural alike—is greater than has ever been known. It is not to their interest to admit that the demand for female clerks, shop assistants in certain trades, factory hands, domestic servants, and dairymaids cannot effectively be met because of that increased demand, but the Board of Trade is not likely to ignore the very patent fact, and the new scheme may frustrate the "faddists."

6324 062

Evg. Standard & St. James Gazette, March 19th. 1915.

WOMEN'S RESPONSE.

INDUSTRIAL VOLUNTEERS GIVE UP LEISURE.

LONDON REGISTER.

"Evening Standard" Special.

Before many days have passed, the Women's War Register will have assumed considerable proportions. The start given to it yesterday has been well maintained to-day, and the numbers already run into thousands.

That is the report as far as London is concerned. Few statements from the country are available yet, but in several large industrial centres the response has been equally promising.

It is evident that the women of the country realise the importance of the Board of Trade's move. Not merely are they coming forward in good numbers, but many of them belong to a class which does not usually make use of the Labour Exchanges in order to obtain employment. They are ready to work now, however, for no other reason than that the nation has need of their services.

Never Out Before.

Generally, the women do not belong to what is usually termed the working-class. That is the great feature of the registration, which shows that the object of the Government is in fair prospect of realisation.

The Government know, through existing agencies, how many normal wage-earners there are among women. What they did not know was how many women outside their ranks would be willing to work "if pay is sufficient and housing satisfactory."

This is precisely what is being established now. At the Central Labour Exchange one of our representatives learned that a "fair proportion" of those who have signed on for war service state that they have never been out to work of any kind before.

If they were girls starting life as clerks or typists, this would be of comparatively little significance; but they are young or middle-aged women, who have not known the need of employment before.

Well-educated some of them are, and all of them prepared to serve in almost any capacity in order that men may be released to take up arms. Their willingness to be trained for work which they have not previously done is another welcome sign; and the sooner the Government make a start with the training the more speedily will they be able to obtain efficient and qualified workers in those industries which need special preparation.

In Ammunition Factories.

Working women who have registered naturally prefer employment in the trade with which they are familiar. Even so, there are among them many of very adaptable capacity who give a choice of three or four ways in which they can help.

One of the most pressing demands, we have been told both by Lord Kitchener and Mr. Lloyd George, is for a vast increase of the output of war munitions, and it is well known that the big armament firms can find work for ten thousand more women at once. Upon the new list will be found a fair percentage of women ready to go into the armament factories to make shells and other ammunition.

None of them have been so engaged before, though that is not a very serious disadvantage with the class of work they would be required to do. Others again want clerical work, or service on farms, or in grocery stores, or as motor drivers, or in libraries—in short, there is a remarkable diversity of occupations desired.

When the Board of Trade are in possession of the full returns, at the end of a week or so, the task of organisation will be undertaken, after consultation with employers and representative bodies of women.

March 19th. 1915. Daily Mirror, 663/25 663.

Manchester Guardian; March 19th. 1915.

REGISTERING WOMEN FOR WAR SERVICE.

VARIED FIRST APPLICATIONS.

WOMEN WHO WANT TO WORK IN ARMAMENT FACTORIES.

The Government's plan for registering women for work during the war so as to fill the gaps made by recruiting in the ranks of labour seems likely to meet with a ready and large response. Registration began yesterday morning, and at the central office of the Board of Trade Labour Exchanges in the morning alone about 40 women registered themselves. They included a parlourmaid and the widow of an artillery officer Some were women of education who desired clerical and secretarial work. Many expressed their willingness to work in armament factories. One applicant wanted "decorative painting" employment. Another applied for "nursing or armament work," and stated that she held a certificate for electrical knowledge; while yet another asked to drive a delivery van, as she was "accustomed to horses."

The varied nature of the employment sought which was to be found even in this small batch of people supports the views expressed by leaders of women's organisations, that women, provided they are trained, can fill a much larger proportion of the posts ordinarily exclusively filled by men than is generally supposed.

"Woman's Chance to Serve the State."

Mrs. Dacre Fox gave her views on the scheme to a press representative. She said that the Women's Social and Political Union were particularly interested in it, because as long ago as August Mrs. Pankhurst urged that women should be trained so as to take the places at home of men who could be released for the trenches. "We feel that the only difficulty," she said, "is the lack of training amongst women, and we think that, just as raw recruits are licked into shape, so should women be trained for the various kinds of employment in which they are needed. It is the first real chance that women have had to serve the State. We give the scheme our heartiest co-operation. I think you will find that all classes of women will rally to the call, and even those whom we may have thought frivolous, in a sense, will serve the nation, for their patriotism will be aroused. There should be no restrictions to the scheme. There is an enormous amount of work which women can do. They can act as taxi-drivers, as 'bus conductors, on the Underground railways, and so on. They could, too, take the place of men in Government offices. There are numbers of young men, even in the War Office, whose places could be taken by women, if these men were personally able to join the army. The Government ought to be the first to set the example."

Similar views were expressed by the press department of the National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies. "We are very much in favour of women taking up any work that is available for them, especially as women are much harder hit by the war than men are. The important part of the scheme to be remembered is that women who are employed must be properly paid. They must receive the same rate as men. It is absolutely essential that that should be upheld, otherwise one can see that every sort of difficulty will arise. It is important that a training scheme should be initiated. In cases where machines have to be used it would probably be more economical for the firms to give the training, but as the Government has taken over the armament factories there seems no reason why the Government should not start a training scheme. We think women can do almost anything if they are trained, as long as it is not too heavy work. In France women are in charge of the 'Metro,' they drive taxi-cabs, and act as 'bus conductors. They can do all that here. They could also still further take the place of shop assistants."

Avoiding a Permanent Displacement.

The Board of Trade attaches very great importance to the employer undertaking to keep men's places open for them. This has a double effect; it encourages men to enlist and it avoids the permanent displacement of men by women after the war is over. As to the training of women, the view is held that in many cases the employer would be able to train them, as has been done in light armament work. With regard to agriculture, the Board of Agriculture is, with the Board of Trade, arranging for the training. The agricultural colleges are taking one or two women each for this purpose.

No woman is, of course, committed to anything by registering her name. When work is offered her she can decide whether she will take it or not, and it is believed that this safeguard, together with the vigilance of the women's organisations, will prevent women's labour being exploited.

Railwaymen are inclined to look askance upon the suggestion that the employment of women can be considerably increased upon the railways. It is urged that if women are employed

WOMEN READY TO MAKE ARMAMENTS.

Enthusiastic Support for Government's Plan to Overcome Labour Shortage and Release Men for Firing Line.

The Government scheme to mobilise women for war service is being taken up enthusiastically.

The Board of Trade Labour Exchanges in London and the country were yesterday besieged by women "recruits." The scheme, as was outlined in The Daily Mirror yesterday, is an effort to overcome the shortage of industrial labour and also to release more men for the firing line.

At the central office of the Labour Exchange at Queen Anne's-gate women who registered themselves represented all walks of life

Many expressed their willingness to work in armament factories; one applicant wanted "decorative painting" employment; another applied for "nursing or armament work," and stated that she held a certificate for electrical knowledge.

"NOT A SIMPLE MATTER."

"This question of the shortage of men in any particular trade, and the substitution of women for them is a most difficult and delicate one, and one in which the advice and co-operation of the organised workers is essential."

So said Miss Mary Macarthur, secretary of the Women's Trade Union League, to The Daily Mirror, yesterday.

"At the present moment there are at least 60,000 women who are normal wages earners unemployed throughout the country.

"It would be desirable to have some assurance that the possibility of the adaptation of these women has been fully considered before the introduction of new and presumably economically independent women is contemplated.

"There can be no doubt that the trade union world, even if convinced of the necessity of this innovation, will require a satisfactory guarantee with respect to the proposed substitution.

"On what conditions are these women to be substituted for men?

"Are they to receive the same wages for the same work? What guarantee is to be given to men that when they return to civil life their situations will be open for them and that the standard of conditions in their trade remains unimpaired?

"And if the men receive satisfactory guarantees, what is to happen to women who have taken their places when they return, if in the meantime the women have become self-dependent?

"The appointment of a national representative committee, including a strong representation of industrial interests, to lay down conditions of transference, is one of the first safeguards which must be insisted upon."

"There is undoubtedly a great body of both trained and untrained women ready to offer their services on any practical Government scheme of employment," said Mrs. E. Falk, secretary of the Women's Emergency Corps.

"Women are very anxious to serve the State, but they do not want to disorganise male labour. What do the men say to the scheme?"

South Wales Daily News, March 19th. 1915.

Mobilising the Women.

The Government has taken the first step towards mobilising the women of the country, and we may be sure they will respond to the call to join the ranks of labour just as eagerly as their brothers have come forward to take their places in the fighting line. There are many branches of industry in which women can fulfil a useful part. They are especially needed in the cloth and leather trades, and I am informed that thousands can be employed in connection with the manufacturing of shells. These occupations will bring them into direct touch with the actual preparation for war, and they will on this account engage in the work with keen zest. Many middle class women will no doubt wish to share in their country's work, and I heard it suggested at the Board of Trade that factory and workshop life would be made more agreeable to them if they formed themselves into "pals battalions." They would be able to lodge in middle class homes, and would then incidentally help to solve the problem of housing accommodation which has already become acute in the working class districts of those centres where munitions of war and military equipment are produced.

A Comparison of Average Earnings.

When submitting the Army Estimates to the House of Commons Mr Tennant, the Under-Secretary for War, made an appeal to the Labour party to help the Government to organise the forces of Labour, so that where practicable women might replace men who had joined the colours. The suggestion was sympathetically received, the only condition laid down being that the substitution of female for male labour should not be used either to depress wages or to lengthen the normal hours of employment. A pamphlet by the Fabian Women's group dealing with the economic position of women as revealed by the war makes its appearance quite opportunely to-day. This document contains a table prepared by Mr Sidney Webb, showing the estimated earnings of manual workers, male and female, in the United Kingdom. The average of the ten and a half million male workers is £1 5s 3d a week, and of the 4,600,000 female workers 10s 10½d. It is calculated that there are at least seven millions of women and girls working for gain in this country, and the difference between this figure and that given above is made up of those who work as employers or on their own account and those who, though wage earners, are not engaged in manual work.

Daily News & Leader, March 19th. 1915.

WORK IN WAR-TIME.

The Organisation of Labour Reserves.

(To the Editor.)

Sir,—There appear to be two immediate necessities:

1—To provide more labour to meet the growing requirements for munitions of war;

2—To relieve the jaded, overtaxed worker, who is beginning to feel the strain of long hours and work at high pressure.

If properly organised, I believe that adequate labour reserves exist to meet these requirements. I will take as a concrete instance my own works. I have skilled workers, mechanics, etc., in my employ who are only working normal hours, and who would be willing to work two or three hours at night in a factory pressed with Government work.

I have about 200 girls who would be willing to offer their services in the same direction, and I know many business and professional men, who, rather than go home at 5 or 6 o'clock and deplore the length of the war would be prepared to take duty on Government work, and feel a sense of real patriotism in doing so.

These industrial volunteers could be quickly mobilised in the following way:

1—By impressing upon the people generally that the output of munitions is not in any way equal to the necessities of the war, and the immediate need for help. This can be done by following up the work of voluntary recruiting organisations, speakers explaining the necessity for volunteers in the industrial army, and appealing for recruits.

2—The names and addresses of volunteers could be taken, together with their qualifications, and these could be systematised and placed in the hands of the Labour Exchanges.

3—Manufacturers could then notify the Labour Exchanges of their requirements, and an ample supply of labour would be available.

WILFRID HILL.

Chemico Works, Birmingham, Mar. 17.

Daily Express, March 19th 1915.

663/20 663

A CHARTER AND A CHALLENGE.

"SPEEDING-UP" POLICY FOR WOMAN THE WORKER.

NEW EMANCIPATION.

By EMILIE H. MARSHALL.

What can I do? is the question which every woman, rich and poor, old and young, trained and untrained, is asking herself to-day, and on the answer will depend the whole future of English-women in industry for generations to come.

The application of the Government "speeding up" policy to women as well as to men, contained in the appeal of the President of the Board of Trade to all women to enter their names on the Government Register of Women for War Service in order that men, now in employment, may be released for the Army, is at once a Charter and a Challenge to women.

Economic independence has always been, in the mind of the suffragist, the end to which the voting-paper and the ballot-box were but the means. By slow and painful stages, and after much battering at barred doors, the women of yesterday forced their way into the less-well paid branches of industry. To-day a Cabinet Minister holds wide open the doors of the labour market that all women who are ready and able to work for money may enter!

THE NEW FORUM.

Registration forms—fateful "scraps of paper," which in the course of the next day or two women will be asked to fill up with the record of their experience as wage earners, or lack of it, the time they are able to give to paid work, and their willingness to be trained for work which requires workers—will take the place of the voting-paper, and the coming battle of woman's economic independence be fought out on the floor of the labour exchanges instead of the polling booth.

Great changes in our social life have taken place in the last few eventful months, and the Government's call to women to enlist in the industrial war service is significant of these. No arbitrary limitations of age are therein laid down, there is no embargo on marriage, even training is not essential provided the willingness to learn is there. It is a frank appeal to Woman the Worker, a challenge to the women of every class to come forward and prove their worth as co-workers with men in all wage-earning pursuits.

Women are accustomed to demands upon their voluntary services, and to those entailed by war conditions they have responded both generously and efficiently. Will they be able to rise to this strange new call to take up, in the words of the Government manifesto, "Paid employment of any kind, industrial, agricultural, clerical"?

In the national stocktaking of women's attainments which is now beginning in millions of homes as a preliminary to the Government census of the reserve force of women's labour, many unexpected resources will be tapped.

MARRIAGE NO BAR.

In the ranks of the married women are large numbers who followed professional and industrial callings to which marriage put a stop, sometimes by choice, but often compulsorily, as in the case of the Government's own women employees, in the Civil Service—many of whom, by the way, are already being recalled from their homes for emergency duty in the Post Office—and teachers who were compelled by their education committees to choose between husband and schoolroom. Convention, husbands' objections, the removal of the need to earn, home duties, and a woman's own desire, have in other cases led to the renunciation of wage-earning life under the old conditions.

These are the trained women, but their numbers are far exceeded by the great army of housewives, the unpaid workers of the home. Untrained they may be, but who can say they are unskilled, for the capable management of a home calls for organising capacity and applied knowledge of household science which can be profitably employed in the new labour market now opening. In London alone in the great suburban areas are hundreds of thousands of housewives whose day is by no means fully occupied with the care of home, cooking, and house cleaning—or the supervision of these operations—entertaining, shopping, etc.

No one suggests that the calls of the home should be neglected for the call of the State, but the registration forms specifically provide for those women who can only give part time. Many of these women, leading dull and empty lives in their villa homes, find the days all too long and dreary, and would welcome the opportunity now given them of finding an outlet for their surplus energy.

THE WOMAN OF FIFTY.

The woman of fifty and over has come into her own of late. There are no irritating restrictions as to the age of candidates for the Woman's War Service to damp the enthusiasm of those who are no longer young women. The immense volume of effective war emergency work in the voluntary field during the last few months has borne abundant testimony to the value of the services of the matured woman with experience of the world, and the tact which comes of understanding.

Enterprising women who since the war have tried, and failed, to induce employers to utilise their services for work previously done by men, may point to the many difficulties in the way of women who are ready and able to release a man. There are women who would drive taxi-cabs, and become conductors on omnibuses. Others wish to act as clerks in the railway booking offices and as ticket collectors.

The charge of railway bookstalls appeals to some women, others feel quite competent to release male librarians. Very many are eager to work on the land and in the numerous lighter branches of agriculture, such as dairy work, which was once the exclusive prerogative of women, and poultry farming.

Trade union restrictions, Scotland-yard regulations, the use of the personal pronoun "he" in by-laws, old established custom, present prejudice, and all other artificial obstacles to the full utilisation of the services of competent women, will fade away if Woman the Worker responds in such force to the appeal to her patriotism that the Government is able, by means of its new War Service Register, to convince employers that industry will not suffer by the release of men from office and workshop.

THE DAILY MERCURY,

LEICESTER, MARCH 19. 1915.

WOMEN AND THE WAR.

Naturally a good deal of interest is taken in the efforts of the Government to "mobilise" the work of women so that they may render effective help to the country at this juncture. Essential as it is that the ranks at the front should be kept filled, it is not less important that there should be sufficient labour at home to produce the equipment required for the fighting line, keeping in mind always the unprecedented consumption of ammunition in this conflict. But it is pointed out that the work of women might release men from industrial pursuits so that they could join the forces, and thus both contribute to a shortening of the war, and at the same time promote its success. When the nation is subjected to the present strain we have to think not so much of what is ideal in our industrial arrangements, but of the urgent needs of the State; at the same time care must be taken lest we sacrifice too much of the future to the imperative call of the moment. It may be, for instance, that boys will have to be employed in farm work because so many labourers are in the trenches, but the future of the boys must not be ignored; and in regard to women, they may in an emergency be called to occupations in which it would not be desirable they should permanently engage. There must be some thought for the morrow as well as for to-day. Miss Mary Macarthur understands this question, and she is right in pointing to the difficulty and delicacy of substituting women for men where there is a shortage of men Unquestionably there is a deficiency of male workers in some trades. We cannot withdraw three millions of men in the prime of life from industrial occupations without feeling the pressure, but the transference of women to these trades is not an easy matter. Of the women workers to-day many are domestic servants, cotton and woollen operatives, dressmakers, and teachers. To turn these to dairy work, or to employment in clothing warehouses, or ammunition factories, would lead to the dislocation of industry; and if the idea is to employ those who at present are engaged in their own homes, helping in the household duties it is important that these should not enter into competition with women who may be at present unemployed. Miss Macarthur estimates that there are at present 50,000 unemployed women in the country, and it is desirable not to add to that number by introducing practically independent women to the labour market. It would be a mistake for well-to-do women to enter occupations to the detriment of ordinary workers. More than good intention is called for in a matter of this kind; practical knowledge is just as important. That women are anxious to do their part at this crisis is common knowledge, and they can help in many ways. There are employments suited to them just as there are others that are not, and in the organisation of women's work, and the arrangement of wages and hours and conditions it is important to take into council those who know most about these things, so that what is done shall be on right lines for the future as for the present.

ARMAMENT FACTORIES.

The Government's plan for registering women for work during the war so as to fill the gaps made by recruiting in the ranks of labour seems likely to meet with a ready and large response. Registration began yesterday morning, and at the central office of the Board of Trade Labour Exchanges in the morning alone about 40 women registered themselves. They included a parlourmaid and the widow of an artillery officer. Some were women of education who desired clerical and secretarial work. Many expressed their willingness to work in armament factories. One applicant wanted "decorative painting" employment. Another applied for "nursing or armament work," and stated that she held a certificate for electrical knowledge; while yet another asked to drive a delivery van, as she was "accustomed to horses."

The varied nature of the employment sought which was to be found even in this small batch of people supports the views expressed by leaders of women's organisations, that women, provided they are trained, can fill a much larger proportion of the posts ordinarily exclusively filled by men than is generally supposed.

"Woman's Chance to Serve the State."

Mrs. Dacre Fox gave her views on the scheme to a press representative. She said that the Women's Social and Political Union were particularly interested in it, because as long ago as August Mrs. Pankhurst urged that women should be trained so as to take the places at home of men who could be released for the trenches. "We feel that the only difficulty," she said, "is the lack of training amongst women, and we think that, just as raw recruits are licked into shape, so should women be trained for the various kinds of employment in which they are needed. It is the first real chance that women have had to serve the State. We give the scheme our heartiest co-operation. I think you will find that all classes of women will rally to the call, and even those whom we may have thought frivolous, in a sense, will serve the nation, for their patriotism will be aroused. There should be no restrictions to the scheme. There is an enormous amount of work which women can do. They can act as taxi-drivers, as 'bus conductors, on the Underground railways, and so on. They could, too, take the place of men in Government offices. There are numbers of young men, even in the War Office, whose places could be taken by women, if these men were personally able to join the army. The Government ought to be the first to set the example."

Similar views were expressed by the press department of the National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies. "We are very much in favour of women taking up any work that is available for them, especially as women are much harder hit by the war than men are. The important part of the scheme to be remembered is that women who are employed must be properly paid. They must receive the same rate as men. It is absolutely essential that that should be upheld, otherwise one can see that every sort of difficulty will arise. It is important that a training scheme should be initiated. In cases where machines have to be used it would probably be more economical for the firms to give the training, but as the Government has taken over the armament factories there seems no reason why the Government should not start a training scheme. We think women can do almost anything if they are trained, as long as it is not too heavy work. In France women are in charge of the 'Metro,' they drive taxi-cabs, and act as 'bus conductors. They can do all that here. They could also still further take the place of shop assistants."

Avoiding a Permanent Displacement.

The Board of Trade attaches very great importance to the employer undertaking to keep men's places open for them. This has a double effect; it encourages men to enlist and it avoids the permanent displacement of men by women after the war is over. As to the training of women, the view is held that in many cases the employer would be able to train them, as has been done in light armament work. With regard to agriculture, the Board of Agriculture is, with the Board of Trade, arranging for the training. The agricultural colleges are taking one or two women each for this purpose.

No woman is, of course, committed to anything by registering her name. When work is offered her she can decide whether she will take it or not, and it is believed that this safeguard, together with the vigilance of the women's organisations, will prevent women's labour being exploited.

Railwaymen are inclined to look askance upon the suggestion that the employment of women can be considerably increased upon the railways. It is urged that if women are employed it must not be to the prejudice of service conditions, and that steps will have to be taken to secure their membership of the National Union of Railwaymen.

cally.

The Board of Trade Labour Exchanges in London and the country were yesterday besieged by women "recruits." The scheme, as was outlined in The Daily Mirror yesterday, is an effort to overcome the shortage of industrial labour and also to release more men for the firing line.

At the central office of the Labour Exchange at Queen Anne's-gate women who registered themselves represented all walks of life

Many expressed their willingness to work in armament factories; one applicant wanted "decorative painting" employment; another applied for "nursing or armament work," and stated that she held a certificate for electrical knowledge.

"NOT A SIMPLE MATTER."

"This question of the shortage of men in any particular trade, and the substitution of women for them is a most difficult and delicate one, and one in which the advice and co-operation of the organised workers is essential."

So said Miss Mary Macarthur, secretary of the Women's Trade Union League, to The Daily Mirror, yesterday.

"At the present moment there are at least

South Wales Daily News, March 19th. 1918.

Mobilising the Women.

The Government has taken the first step towards mobilising the women of the country, and we may be sure they will respond to the call to join the ranks of labour just as eagerly as their brothers have come forward to take their places in the fighting line. There are many branches of industry in which women can fulfil a useful part. They are especially needed in the cloth and leather trades, and I am informed that thousands can be employed in connection with the manufacturing of shells. These occupations will bring them into direct touch with the actual preparation for war, and they will on this account engage in the work with keen zest. Many middle class women will no doubt wish to share in their country's work, and I heard it suggested at the Board of Trade that factory and workshop life would be made more agreeable to them if they formed themselves into "pals battalions." They would be able to lodge in middle class homes, and would then incidentally help to solve the problem of housing accommodation which has already become acute in the working class districts of those centres where munitions of war and military equipment are produced.

A Comparison of Average Earnings.

When submitting the Army Estimates to the House of Commons Mr Tennant, the Under-Secretary for War, made an appeal to the Labour party to help the Government to organise the forces of Labour, so that where practicable women might replace men who had joined the colours. The suggestion was sympathetically received, the only condition laid down being that the substitution of female for male labour should not be used either to depress wages or to lengthen the normal hours of employment. A pamphlet by the Fabian Women's group dealing with the economic position of women as revealed by the war makes its appearance quite opportunely to-day. This document contains a table prepared by Mr Sidney Webb, showing the estimated earnings of manual workers, male and female, in the United Kingdom. The average of the ten and a half million male workers is £1 5s 3d a week, and of the 4,600,000 female workers 10s 10½d. It is calculated that there are at least seven millions of women and girls working for gain in this country, and the difference between this figure and that given above is made up of those who work as employers or on their own account and those who, though wage earners, are not engaged in manual work.

"It would be desirable to have some assurance that the possibility of the adaptation of these women has been fully considered before the introduction of new and presumably economically independent women is contemplated.

"There can be no doubt that the trade union world, even if convinced of the necessity of this innovation, will require a satisfactory guarantee with respect to the proposed substitution.

"On what conditions are these women to be substituted for men?

"Are they to receive the same wages for the same work? What guarantee is to be given to men that when they return to civil life their situations will be open for them and that the standard of conditions in their trade remains unimpaired?

"And if the men receive satisfactory guarantees, what is to happen to women who have taken their places when they return, if in the meantime the women have become self-dependent?

"The appointment of a national representative committee, including a strong representation of industrial interests, to lay down conditions of transference, is one of the first safeguards which must be insisted upon."

"There is undoubtedly a great body of both trained and untrained women ready to offer their services on any practical Government scheme of employment," said Mrs. E. Falk, secretary of the Women's Emergency Corps.

"Women are very anxious to serve the State, but they do not want to disorganise male labour. What do the men say to the scheme?"

Daily News & Leader, March 19th 1918.

WORK IN WAR-TIME.

The Organisation of Labour Reserves.

(To the Editor.)

Sir,—There appear to be two immediate necessities:

1—To provide more labour to meet the growing requirements for munitions of war;

2—To relieve the jaded, overtaxed worker, who is beginning to feel the strain of long hours and work at high pressure.

If properly organised, I believe that adequate labour reserves exist to meet these requirements. I will take as a concrete instance my own works. I have skilled workers, mechanics, etc., in my employ who are only working normal hours, and who would be willing to work two or three hours at night in a factory pressed with Government work.

I have about 200 girls who would be willing to offer their services in the same direction, and I know many business and professional men, who, rather than go home at 5 or 6 o'clock and deplore the length of the war would be prepared to take duty on Government work, and feel a sense of real patriotism in doing so.

These industrial volunteers could be quickly mobilised in the following way:

1—By impressing upon the people generally that the output of munitions is not in any way equal to the necessities of the war, and the immediate need for help. This can be done by following up the work of voluntary recruiting organisations, speakers explaining the necessity for volunteers in the industrial army, and appealing for recruits.

2—The names and addresses of volunteers could be taken, together with their qualifications, and these could be systematised and placed in the hands of the Labour Exchanges.

3—Manufacturers could then notify the Labour Exchanges of their requirements, and an ample supply of labour would be available.

WILFRID HILL.

Chemico Works, Birmingham, Mar. 17.

Daily Express, March 19th 1915.

663/20

663

A CHARTER AND A CHALLENGE.

"SPEEDING-UP" POLICY FOR WOMAN THE WORKER.

NEW EMANCIPATION.

By EMILIE H. MARSHALL.

What can I do? is the question which every woman, rich and poor, old and young, trained and untrained, is asking herself to-day, and on the answer will depend the whole future of English-women in industry for generations to come.

The application of the Government "speeding up" policy to women as well as to men, contained in the appeal of the President of the Board of Trade to all women to enter their names on the Government Register of Women for War Service in order that men, now in employment, may be released for the Army, is at once a Charter and a Challenge to women.

Economic independence has always been, in the mind of the suffragist, the end to which the voting-paper and the ballot-box were but the means. By slow and painful stages, and after much battering at barred doors, the women of yesterday forced their way into the less-well paid branches of industry. To-day a Cabinet Minister holds wide open the doors of the labour market that all women who are ready and able to work for money may enter!

THE NEW FORUM.

Registration forms—fateful "scraps of paper," which in the course of the next day or two women will be asked to fill up with the record of their experience as wage earners, or lack of it, the time they are able to give to paid work, and their willingness to be trained for work which requires workers—will take the place of the voting-paper, and the coming battle of woman's economic independence be fought out on the floor of the labour exchanges instead of the polling booth.

Great changes in our social life have taken place in the last few eventful months, and the Government's call to women to enlist in the industrial war service is significant of these. No arbitrary limitations of age are therein laid down, there is no embargo on marriage, even training is not essential provided the willingness to learn is there. It is a frank appeal to Woman the Worker, a challenge to the women of every class to come forward and prove their worth as co-workers with men in all wage-earning pursuits.

Women are accustomed to demands upon their voluntary services, and to those entailed by war conditions they have responded both generously and efficiently. Will they be able to rise to this strange new call to take up, in the words of the Government manifesto, "Paid employment of any kind, industrial, agricultural, clerical"?

In the national stocktaking of women's attainments which is now beginning in millions of homes as a preliminary to the Government census of the reserve force of women's labour, many unexpected resources will be tapped.

MARRIAGE NO BAR.

In the ranks of the married women are large numbers who followed professional and industrial callings to which marriage put a stop, sometimes by choice, but often compulsorily, as in the case of the Government's own women employees, in the Civil Service—many of whom, by the way, are already being recalled from their homes for emergency duty in the Post Office—and teachers who were compelled by their education committees to choose between husband and schoolroom. Convention, husbands' objections, the removal of the need to earn, home duties, and a woman's own desire, have in other cases led to the renunciation of wage-earning life under the old conditions.

These are the trained women, but their numbers are far exceeded by the great army of housewives, the unpaid workers of the home. Untrained they may be, but who can say they are unskilled, for the capable management of a home calls for organising capacity and applied knowledge of household science which can be profitably employed in the new labour market now opening. In London alone in the great suburban areas are hundreds of thousands of housewives whose day is by no means fully occupied with the care of home, cooking, and house cleaning—or the supervision of these operations—entertaining, shopping, etc.

No one suggests that the calls of the home should be neglected for the call of the State, but the registration forms specifically provide for those women who can only give part time. Many of these women, leading dull and empty lives in their villa homes, find the days all too long and dreary, and would welcome the opportunity now given them of finding an outlet for their surplus energy.

THE WOMAN OF FIFTY.

The woman of fifty and over has come into her own of late. There are no irritating restrictions as to the age of candidates for the Woman's War Service to damp the enthusiasm of those who are no longer young women. The immense volume of effective war emergency work in the voluntary field during the last few months has borne abundant testimony to the value of the services of the matured woman with experience of the world, and the tact which comes of understanding.

Enterprising women who since the war have tried, and failed, to induce employers to utilise their services for work previously done by men, may point to the many difficulties in the way of women who are ready and able to release a man. There are women who would drive taxi-cabs, and become conductors on omnibuses. Others wish to act as clerks in the railway booking offices and as ticket collectors.

The charge of railway bookstalls appeals to some women, others feel quite competent to release male librarians. Very many are eager to work on the land and in the numerous lighter branches of agriculture, such as dairy work, which was once the exclusive prerogative of women, and poultry farming.

Trade union restrictions, Scotland-yard regulations, the use of the personal pronoun "he" in by-laws, old established custom, present prejudice, and all other artificial obstacles to the full utilisation of the services of competent women, will fade away if Woman the Worker responds in such force to the appeal to her patriotism that the Government is able, by means of its new War Service Register, to convince employers that industry will not suffer by the release of men from office and workshop.

THE DAILY MERCURY,

LEICESTER, MARCH 19, 1915.

WOMEN AND THE WAR.

Naturally a good deal of interest is taken in the efforts of the Government to "mobilise" the work of women so that they may render effective help to the country at this juncture. Essential as it is that the ranks at the front should be kept filled, it is not less important that there should be sufficient labour at home to produce the equipment required for the fighting line, keeping in mind always the unprecedented consumption of ammunition in this conflict. But it is pointed out that the work of women might release men from industrial pursuits so that they could join the forces, and thus both contribute to a shortening of the war, and at the same time promote its success. When the nation is subjected to the present strain we have to think not so much of what is ideal in our industrial arrangements, but of the urgent needs of the State; at the same time care must be taken lest we sacrifice too much of the future to the imperative call of the moment. It may be, for instance, that boys will have to be employed in farm work because so many labourers are in the trenches, but the future of the boys must not be ignored; and in regard to women, they may in an emergency be called to occupations in which it would not be desirable they should permanently engage. There must be some thought for the morrow as well as for to-day. Miss Mary Macarthur understands this question, and she is right in pointing to the difficulty and delicacy of substituting women for men where there is a shortage of men. Unquestionably there is a deficiency of male workers in some trades. We cannot withdraw three millions of men in the prime of life from industrial occupations without feeling the pressure, but the transference of women to these trades is not an easy matter. Of the women workers to-day many are domestic servants, cotton and woollen operatives, dressmakers, and teachers. To turn these to dairy work, or to employment in clothing warehouses, or ammunition factories, would lead to the dislocation of industry; and if the idea is to employ those who at present are engaged in their own homes, helping in the household duties it is important that these should not enter into competition with women who may be at present unemployed. Miss Macarthur estimates that there are at present 50,000 unemployed women in the country, and it is desirable not to add to that number by introducing practically independent women to the labour market. It would be a mistake for well-to-do women to enter occupations to the detriment of ordinary workers. More than good intention is called for in a matter of this kind; practical knowledge is just as important. That women are anxious to do their part at this crisis is common knowledge, and they can help in many ways. There are employments suited to them just as there are others that are not, and in the organisation of women's work, and the arrangement of wages and hours and conditions it is important to take into council those who know most about these things, so that what is done shall be on right lines for the future as for the present.

The Daily Express, March 19th 1915. 663/27 66

WAR WORK IN WHICH WOMEN CAN HELP.

POSITIONS READY ON FARMS AND IN FACTORIES.

NATIONAL PLANS EXPLAINED.

The "Daily Express" plan, inaugurated three weeks ago, for utilising the services of women in place of men who have enlisted, receives the hearty approval of the Board of Trade Labour Exchanges, in connection with the Government scheme announced yesterday.

The Government have now adopted the "Daily Express" scheme on a wider basis, and will organise women's services, not only for agricultural work, but in all industries which are short of labour owing to the vast numbers of men now fighting for their country.

High appreciation of the useful work already performed by this journal was expressed yesterday at the central office of the Board of Trade Labour Exchanges in Queen Anne's Chambers, Broadway, Westminster. The Government scheme, it was explained, need in no way interfere with the "Daily Express" farm register, and the Department would be glad to co-operate with us if that were considered the best way of proceeding in the future.

Mr. J. S. Nicholson, of the Central Office, stated to a "Daily Express" representative:—

"With regard to women and farms, the Board of Agriculture is now arranging in each county for the local Chamber of Agriculture and the county branch of the Farmers' Union to tabulate information showing what farmers want women, how many women they want, for what jobs, and by what date.

"What we wish to do at present is to focus the demand. When we know the size of the need for women's labour on farms and obtain a notion of the number of women ready to do the work we can act.

QUICK TEACHING.

"Meanwhile, training schemes at agricultural colleges are in preparation, and a limited number of women who do not understand farm work will be able to learn it quickly. Experts hold that an intelligent woman can learn to do a great deal of farm work in a month. A woman, it is said by many who know, can learn to milk well in a week.

"No doubt many women from towns could make themselves useful on a farm, fitting in with the conditions and learning quickly. But the chief hope of the farmers is the country woman or girl.

"For instance, a girl who lived in the country formerly, and is now the wife of a town-dwelling man who has gone to the front, would be of great value now if she went back to the country life. There are many thousands of these country-bred town-dwelling women, and they will be very useful on farms.

"Well-to-do women, ladies of refinement, education, culture, and good circumstances should register. We would like them to write in their names for work—farm, factory, or otherwise—in this national need.

"The chief occupations for which women are wanted are five in number:—

Farm work (including dairying).
Leather stitching (for enormous quantities of soldiers' equipments).
Brush making (a particularly heavy demand).
Clothing machining.
Light machining for armament.

"Women should register at the labour exchanges, or a postcard to Queen Anne's Chambers, Broadway, S.W., will bring them a form to fill up."

SPECIAL FORM.

This form is as follows:—

(1) Surname.
Other names.
(2) Full address.
(3) Age.
(4) Married, single, or widow.
(5) Have you ever done any paid work, and if so, what?
(6) If so, when? Giving date as nearly as possible.
What kind.
Employer's name or names.
(7) Are you free to work:—
(a) Whole time.
(b) Part time.
(c) To leave your home for work if pay is sufficient and housing satisfactory?
(8) Is there any other work which you are willing and able to do?
(9) If you have never done paid work, what kinds of work are you best suited for?
(10) Are you prepared to be trained for work which you have not previously done?

SPECIAL QUESTIONS FOR PERSONS WILLING TO DO AGRICULTURAL WORK.

Have you ever worked at any of the following branches of work:—
(a) Milking.
(b) Dairy work.
(c) Care of live stock.
(d) Light farm work.
(e) Market gardening.
(f) Poultry farming.
(g) Ordinary gardening.
If you have not, state which branch you think you would be suited for.

Mr. Nicholson, when asked whether he thought well-to-do women of leisure would be more likely to be willing to go and fill shells and do other factory labour if bands of friends could go together, said he certainly did think so.

"Battalions of Pals," or "War Work Pal-ettes" was one of the suggestions made to the "Daily Express" yesterday. It was urged that if a woman knew she would be accompanied by half a dozen, a dozen, or a score of women friends in a war-work factory she would be much encouraged to go.

With regard to wages, Mr. Nicholson stated that the Board of Trade do not want "amateur workers" to under-cut normal woman labour. He thought the women coming forward should be paid full normal wages.

As to the number of women required, no definite figure can be given now. In one ammunition factory alone it was found some weeks ago that so much woman labour was employed there that as much ammunition was turned out in one day as was produced in normal circumstances in a year.

What is happening is this: the number and size of factories that can make the munitions of war required for our allies and ourselves is being swiftly enlarged. Much of the extra work can be done by women. Very soon the number of additional women for whom there will be room in these works will be something like 10,000, and more and more will be required.

There is not room for that number at this moment. But the work of taking over and enlarging the necessary works is to proceed rapidly, and the women should register at once in order that the Government may know the number available.

Sir George Pragnell, managing partner of Cook, Son, and Co., of St. Paul's Churchyard, believes that in this emergency many leisured women will offer their services.

Sir George brought the question of war-work for women and their use in releasing men for the front before the Queen's Unemployed Women Committee as far back as August. Since the war broke out he has found positions for nearly 1,000 women and has raised 25,000 men for the Army.

IN THE CITY.

"A very large number of women have been engaged to take the place of men in the City of London," he said to a "Daily Express" representative yesterday, "particularly in some of the warehouses, banks, and insurance offices. In one business house alone more than 100 women are employed now, against less than a dozen when the war broke out.

"The reports so far in the City are entirely favourable, but certain banks and business houses might do a great deal more in this direction, thereby releasing more men for the front. Others have already done so much that it is scarcely possible to do any more if their activities—on which thousands may depend for their livelihood—are to be continued.

"Smart boys under Army age are at a premium.

"The extra work done by the men who have not enlisted has been enormous, and has been performed without complaint. Grumblers are silenced—as they should be—and it is generally recognised that more inconveniences and even hardships will have to be borne, for whatever happens Lord Kitchener must have his men.

"There are thousands of women of good position in life who could do some of the war work so necessary to the State. The objection to strong lusty school children in the country helping in farm work is ridiculous in the circumstances, and I believe there are thousands of women and girls who will gladly do almost any kind of work anywhere if called on.

EXPERT HELP NEEDED.

"A difficulty that appeals to me as a business man," added Sir George, "is that the Government are so shy of showing their hand to business men on business subjects, and allowing them to help in more than one direction."

During the time the "Daily Express" farm register has been in operation, we have placed hundreds of women in touch with farmers who require their help on the land, and we have received many enthusiastic letters of thanks for the services which we have gladly rendered. Here are a few typical instances of successful introductions:—

A lady, writing from Bute House, W., wished for a competent woman to manage a poultry farm on her Middlesex estate. She offered 25s. a week and cottage, with a small piece of ground attached. The post was secured through the "Daily Express" register by Miss E. F., of Glen Cottage, New Milton, Hants, who writes:—"Kindly accept my best thanks for obtaining me so good a post."

Mrs. E. J. Mott, of the Homestead, East Horsley, Surrey, who has a small holding of four acres, wrote to say that she kept cows, pigs, and poultry of all kinds, and reared calves; and would like to engage a woman to assist generally. "She need not have had experience," said Mrs. Mott, "but she must be an early riser, and energetic."

A selection of applicants was sent to this lady, and she chose E. S., of Heathfield, 107, St. Helen's-road, Hastings, on terms satisfactory to both parties.

"I have engaged E. S., and thank you very much for all the applications you have sent," Mrs. Mott writes. "If I had advertised in all the papers I could not have met with a person who seems to meet my requirements as E. S. does, and I thank you much for having put me in communication with her."

Mrs. A. H. Churchill, dairy farmer, of Batchworth Heath, near Rickmansworth, asked for "a trustworthy young person as useful help on small grass farm, dairy, and willing to assist with household duties." Half a dozen applicants were referred to Mrs. Churchill, who now writes to thank the "Daily Express," adding that she has engaged Miss M. R., of Chapman Cottage, Greenford, Middlesex.

In addition to the posts actually filled, great numbers of women on our register are now in negotiation with farmers all over the country.

We still want to hear from more farmers, however. They have a wide selection of willing helpers to choose from, and we shall be glad to send a list of bright, cheerful workers—either with or without experience, as may be required—to all farmers who will fill up the form to be found below.

It is possible that women will be employed as booking office clerks at railway stations.

Hundreds of young men are thus employed, and they would certainly be serving their country better by joining the Army. During their absence their work could well be performed by women.

A "Daily Express" representative was informed yesterday at the office of the Railway Companies' Committee that the question of employing women had not yet been discussed, but that there was, of course, a possibility of such a course being taken.

The Star, March 19th. 1918:

663/28

663.

WOMEN'S HELP.

Representative Views on the State's Call.

The State's call to women for war service in the industrial army has been welcomed generally. It is willingly admitted by Labour leaders and sociologists that the national emergency demands extraordinary measures. Old trade rules and social conventions must go. But in discussing the question yesterday representative men and women, while conceding the urgent need, insisted on the necessary safeguards.

All the Board of Trade is aiming at for the moment is to register, as far as possible, the number of women willing to undertake paid labour of any kind, and to assort the qualifications.

According to the 1911 Census there are 5,854,000 females over ten years of age, who are wage-earners, in England and Wales alone. Of these over 1¼ millions are domestic servants. The cotton trade takes 372,834, dressmaking 333,129, and teaching (all branches) 211,183. It is estimated there are seven million working women and girls in the United Kingdom.

As an example of the possibilities in the proposed attempt of the Board of Trade to register female labour and co-ordinate it for service during the war, it may be noted that since Sept. 1 about 4,500 women seeking employment have registered with one London labour exchange alone.

NECESSARY GUARANTEE.

Miss Mary Macarthur Suggests a Representative Committee.

In labour questions in which women are concerned there is no one entitled to speak with greater weight than Miss Mary Macarthur, the Secretary of the Women's Trade Union League.

"This question," she said, "of the shortage of men in any particular trade and the substitution of women for them is a most difficult and delicate one, and one in which the advice and co-operation of the organised workers is essential.

"Whilst we are, of course, aware that there is a shortage of men in many industries, and even a shortage of women in some industries, it is by no means a simple matter to arrange for the transference of labour with different experiences or in different areas. These difficulties apply to men, but they apply with double force to women, who are naturally less mobile.

"Knowing as I do that at the present moment there are at least 50,000 women who are normal wage earners unemployed throughout the country, it would be desirable to have some assurance that the possibility of the adaptation of these women has been fully considered before the introduction of new, and presumably economically independent, women is contemplated.

"There can be no doubt that the trade union world, even if convinced of the necessity of this innovation, will require a satisfactory guarantee on the various aspects of the proposed substitution.

"The appointment of a national representative committee, including a strong representation of industrial interests, to lay down conditions of transference, is one of the first safeguards which must be insisted upon. The composition of such a committee must be such as to inspire confidence in the minds of the working people."

"A GREAT MOVE."

Lady Randolph Churchill Sees a Chance for the Suffragettes.

"It is a most opportune action," said Lady Randolph, "and will be a revelation of what women can do, and how many able-bodied women there are. The women of England are strong and healthy, and full of energy, and now is their great opportunity.

"The suffragettes in particular have their big chance. They have been pleading their right to come into line with the men, and have always maintained that women can do men's work, even to the extent of fighting. Now is the time for them to be up and doing.

"The Government have made a great move, and the women of England will be able to do what the women of France and other countries have already done automatically, without the necessity for a State appeal.

"It has been pointed out that the coming influx of women into the occupations of men will have a detrimental effect on the labour market when the war is over. I do not subscribe to this view. As a result of the war, new industries will be developed, and new markets opened all over the world, owing to the capture of German trade. Furthermore, the development of women's work should lead to fresh ideas, and there should be ample scope for all willing and competent workers.

"Whilst care should be exercised that well-to-do women should not take up occupations to the detriment of those in need of work, they should find plenty to do in other directions, and as a question of principle should accept the proper payment. If they were not in need of the money thus earned, they could devote it to patriotic purposes."

WOMEN'S EMERGENCY CORPS.

"We are delighted to know that the Government are taking up the question of co-ordination in regard to women's work," said the secretary of the Women's Emergency Corps yesterday. "In a measure our corps may be said to have anticipated their ideas.

"We take it that the Government scheme is primarily for the class of women to whom some form of labour or work would be useful as a means of subsistence. We should not like to think that voluntary workers would be permitted to fill berths that would be better occupied. The extent of unemployment among women is not fully realised, and as a first step it should be an instruction to the Labour Exchanges to send official application forms to all the women at present on their lists, in order that they may have preferential treatment."

A READY RESPONSE.

At the Central Office of the Board of Trade Labour Exchanges at Queen Anne's-gate, between 30 and 40 women registered themselves yesterday morning. They represented all walks of life—educated ladies who desired clerical and secretarial work, working women who desired factory employment, and so on.

Many expressed their willingness to work in armament factories; one applicant wanted "decorative painting" employment; another applied for "nursing or armament work," and stated that she held a certificate for electrical knowledge; while a third asked to drive a delivery van, as she was "accustomed to horses."

Applicants ranged from a parlour-maid to the widow of an Artillery officer.

WOMEN AS ROAD WORKERS.

It has been left to the Tiverton (Devon) Rural District Council to find a new outlet for women's labour. At the last meeting of the Council it was proposed by the Rev. E. E. Heathcote, seconded, and carried, that women should be employed in work on the roads.

Aberdeen Journal, March 19th. 1918.

WOMEN FOR WAR-TIME WORK.

When the history of the present war is written in detail, the part which women have taken in helping the cause of their respective countries will form the subject of a very considerable volume. Pope expressed the view that the proper study of mankind was man. Probably if he lived to-day he would courteously add, "and woman." Women in different countries vary in characteristics and in the treatment they receive in a very remarkable way. British treatment of woman may not have hit the golden mean, but at least it is better than the American plan of making her a deity, and than the German course of making her a domestic drudge. In Germany woman, as befits a military nation, has been honoured according to the number of soldiers she has been the means of placing at the disposal of the Fatherland. In France and Britain she has never been accorded honour on this particular ground, and it might have been that we should never have had the present war if the women of Germany had not been imbued in this way with the cult of militarism. In any case the women of Germany as well as the men have done much to foster the spirit which brought about the present war, and on that account there is an appropriateness in the women of all countries coming forward to assist the cause of their separate countries while the men are in the trenches or behind the guns.

The circular just issued by the Board of Trade urging the registration of women who are prepared to do work which will release men for war service is an important step in the way of organising the services of women for industrial purposes. Already young womanhood all over the country, as well as at the front, are in the nurse's garb, but there are others who can take the place of men in the shop, in the counting-house, in the work of the waiter, and on the land, and in this way free the young manhood still remaining in the country to serve in one or other of the forces. Aberdeen has suffered no particular shortage as yet, and is more fortunate than many large centres, but the Government circular now places young women in the same position as young men. There is no young, able-bodied woman now who cannot assist the country in some way. In the first place the mobilising order will naturally apply to young women who need employment. The time may come when every young man will be called on to serve his country. Should that eventuality come about, then the services of every young woman in one capacity or another may be as important at home as the services of the young men in Belgium and in France.

The Daily News & Leader,
March 19th. 1915.

WAR SERVICE FOR WOMEN.

Some Representative Views on the Government Scheme.

NEED OF SAFEGUARDS: THE BOARD OF TRADE'S AIM.

The State's call to women for war service in the industrial army has been welcomed generally. It is willingly admitted by Labour leaders and sociologists that the national emergency demands extraordinary measures. Old trade rules and social conventions must go. But in discussing the question yesterday representative men and women, while conceding the urgent need, insisted on the necessary safeguards.

A "Daily News" representative is informed that all the Board of Trade is aiming at for the moment is to register, as far as possible, the number of women willing to undertake paid labour of any kind, and to assort the qualifications.

According to the 1911 Census there are 5,854,000 females over ten years of age, who are wage-earners, in England and Wales alone. Of these over 1¼ millions are domestic servants. The cotton trade takes 372,834, dressmaking 333,129, and teaching (all branches) 211,183. It is estimated there are seven million working women and girls in the United Kingdom.

As an example of the possibilities in the proposed attempt of the Board of Trade to register female labour and co-ordinate it for service during the war, it may be noted that since Sept. 1 about 4,500 women seeking employment have registered with one London labour exchange alone.

GUARANTEES NEEDED.

Miss Mary Macarthur Suggests a Representative Committee.

In labour questions in which women are concerned there is no one entitled to speak with greater weight than Miss Mary Macarthur, the Secretary of the Women's Trade Union League, representing about 240,000 organised women workers. Miss Macarthur, in an interview with a "Daily News" representative yesterday, expressed the opinion that the Government would have been well advised, before issuing an appeal of this kind, to take into consultation the representatives of the organised trades, both men and women.

Miss Mary Macarthur.
(Photo: C. N.

"This question," she said, "of the shortage of men in any particular trade and the substitution of women for them is a most difficult and delicate one, and one in which the advice and co-operation of the organised workers is essential.

"Whilst we are, of course, aware that there is a shortage of men in many industries, and even a shortage of women in some industries, it is by no means a simple matter to arrange for the transference of labour with different experiences or in different areas. These difficulties apply to men, but they apply with double force to women, who are naturally less mobile.

"Knowing as I do that at the present moment there are at least 50,000 women who are normal wage earners unemployed throughout the country, it would be desirable to have some assurance that the possibility of the adaptation of these women has been fully considered before the introduction of new, and presumably economically independent, women is contemplated.

"There can be no doubt that the trade union world, even if convinced of the necessity of this innovation, will require move, and the women of England will be able to do what the women of France and other countries have already done automatically, without the necessity for a State appeal.

"It has been pointed out that the coming influx of women into the occupations of men will have a detrimental effect on the labour market when the war is over. I do not subscribe to this view. As a result of the war, new industries will be developed, and new markets opened all over the world, owing to the capture of German trade. Furthermore, the development of women's work should lead to fresh ideas, and there should be ample scope for all willing and competent workers.

"Whilst care should be exercised that well-to-do women should not take up occupations to the detriment of those in need of work, they should find plenty to do in other directions, and as a question of principle should accept the proper payment. If they were not in need of the money thus earned, they could devote it to patriotic purposes."

WORKERS FIRST.

Views of Women's Emergency Corps.

"We are delighted to know that the Government are taking up the question of co-ordination in regard to women's work," said the secretary of the Women's Emergency Corps yesterday. "In a measure our corps may be said to have anticipated their ideas.

"We take it that the Government scheme is primarily for the class of women to whom some form of labour or work would be useful as a means of subsistence. We should not like to think that voluntary workers would be permitted to fill berths that would be better occupied. The extent of unemployment among women is not fully realised, and as a first step it should be an instruction to the Labour Exchanges to send official application forms to all the women at present on their lists, in order that they may have preferential treatment."

A READY RESPONSE.

At the Central Office of the Board of Trade Labour Exchanges at Queen Anne's-gate, between 30 and 40 women registered themselves yesterday morning. They represented all walks of life—educated ladies who desired clerical and secretarial work, working women who desired factory employment, and so on.

Many expressed their willingness to work in armament factories; one applicant wanted "decorative painting" employment; another applied for "nursing or armament work," and stated that she held a certificate for electrical knowledge; while a third asked to drive a delivery van, as she was "accustomed to horses."

Applicants ranged from a parlour-maid to the widow of an Artillery officer.

WOMEN AS ROAD WORKERS.

It has been left to the Tiverton (Devon) Rural District Council to find a new outlet for women's labour. At the last meeting of the Council it was proposed by the Rev. E. E. Heathcote, seconded, and carried, that women should be employed in work on the roads.

663/29

663

Yorkshire Post,
March 19th. 1915.

The call of the Government on women to come forward and help in war work has been very well received. The only troubles regarded as likely to arise about it are from men rather than women, and they affect two points—first, wages, and secondly, guarantees that women shall not permanently replace men. The question of wages really matters only in those occupations where day pay rather than piece pay is the rule. In piece work the problem will settle itself. On the question of payment by time some difficulties are regarded as likely to occur, but experience will probably solve them. As to guarantees, the service asked for is temporary, and is intended to attract women whose own occupation has gone, or who have not previously gone out to work; and after the war conditions will be much changed. In the opinion of those most competent to judge, the men need have no fear of any permanently serious effect on the labour market.

The Star,
March 19th. 1915.

The Women's Army.

The mobilisation of the labour of women to fill up the industrial gaps left by the enlistment of men is proceeding apace, and the decision of the Government to utilise the Labour Exchanges to organise it will expedite it. On the face of it it is a good thing that women should be employed industrially to set free a man to fight, or to help to make the equipment or the armament of that man. But it is necessary to remember that the change involves tremendous problems hereafter on which the Government ought to give some light and leading now, before we have gone too far. Take the banks. So many bank clerks have enlisted that the directors cannot carry on business without filling their places, and 25 per cent. of the clerks of London banks are now women. When the war is over and the patriotic bank clerks return with roses, roses all the way, what will happen to the women bank clerks? They will have had six to twelve months' training in their duties, they will be able to accept less salary than a male clerk, because no one will expect them to marry and keep a family, and there will be a great temptation to bank directors to retain them in their service. The salaries of bank clerks are not very extravagant—£120 to £150 a year—but the certain effect of such a change will be to lower them still more. Is that a good thing for anybody but the shareholders of banks? And if that is likely to be the course of events in the banking business, it is still more probable in ammunition-making, leather-stitching, and many other occupations which the God of War now desires to feed with women and girls. All these social changes may be good things, but it is absurd to go on without considering them. The censorship has prevented the Press from discussing most foreign affairs from the Pope of Rome to the Caliph of the Faithful. Let us insist that these domestic questions shall be faced and that the authorities shall abandon their favourite policy—

> Agin to impress on the poppylar mind.
> The comfort and wisdom o' goin' it blind.

If we cannot be trusted as a nation to know the truth about the military situation in Flanders, let us at least be allowed to know the industrial position at home.

[illegible] are domestic servants. The cotton trade takes 372,834, dressmaking 333,129, and teaching (all branches) 211,183. It is estimated there are seven million working women and girls in the United Kingdom.

As an example of the possibilities in the proposed attempt of the Board of Trade to register female labour and co-ordinate it for service during the war, it may be noted that since Sept. 1 about 4,500 women seeking employment have registered with one London labour exchange alone.

GUARANTEES NEEDED.

Miss Mary Macarthur Suggests a Representative Committee.

In labour questions in which women are concerned there is no one entitled to speak with greater weight than Miss Mary Macarthur, the Secretary of the Women's Trade Union League, representing about 240,000 organised women workers. Miss Macarthur, in an interview with a "Daily News" representative yesterday, expressed the opinion that the Government would have been well advised, before issuing an appeal of this kind, to take into consultation the representatives of the organised trades, both men and women.

Miss Mary Macarthur. (Photo: C. N.

"This question," she said, "of the shortage of men in any particular trade and the substitution of women for them is a most difficult and delicate one, and one in which the advice and co-operation of the organised workers is essential.

"Whilst we are, of course, aware that there is a shortage of men in many industries, and even a shortage of women in some industries, it is by no means a simple matter to arrange for the transference of labour with different experiences or in different areas. These difficulties apply to men, but they apply with double force to women, who are naturally less mobile.

"Knowing as I do that at the present moment there are at least 50,000 women who are normal wage earners unemployed throughout the country, it would be desirable to have some assurance that the possibility of the adaptation of these women has been fully considered before the introduction of new, and presumably economically independent, women is contemplated.

"There can be no doubt that the trade union world, even if convinced of the necessity of this innovation, will require a satisfactory guarantee on the various aspects of the proposed substitution. On what conditions are these women to be substituted for men? Are they to receive the same wages for the same work? What guarantee is to be given to men that, when they return to civil life, their situations will be open for them, and that the standard of conditions in their trades remain unimpaired? And if the men receive satisfactory guarantees, what is to happen to women who have taken their places, when they return, if in the meantime the women have become self-dependent?

"The appointment of a national representative committee, including a strong representation of industrial interests, to lay down conditions of transference, is one of the first safeguards which must be insisted upon. The composition of such a committee must be such as to inspire confidence in the minds of the working people."

"A GREAT MOVE."

Lady Randolph Churchill Sees a Chance for the Suffragettes.

Lady Randolph Churchill, who has been doing admirable work in connection with the hospital section of the American Women's War Fund, told a "Daily News" representative yesterday that she was only too pleased to express her views on the Government's appeal to the patriotism of women workers.

Lady Randolph Churchill.

"It is a most opportune action," said Lady Randolph, "and will be a revelation of what women can do, and how many able-bodied women there are. The women of England are strong and healthy, and full of energy, and now is their great opportunity.

"The suffragettes in particular have their big chance. They have been pleading their right to come into line with the men, and have always maintained that women can do men's work, even to the extent of fighting. Now is the time for them to be up and doing.

"The Government have made a great

WORKERS FIRST.

Views of Women's Emergency Corps.

"We are delighted to know that the Government are taking up the question of co-ordination in regard to women's work," said the secretary of the Women's Emergency Corps yesterday. "In a measure our corps may be said to have anticipated their ideas.

"We take it that the Government scheme is primarily for the class of women to whom some form of labour or work would be useful as a means of subsistence. We should not like to think that voluntary workers would be permitted to fill berths that would be better occupied. The extent of unemployment among women is not fully realised, and as a first step it should be an instruction to the Labour Exchanges to send official application forms to all the women at present on their lists, in order that they may have preferential treatment."

A READY RESPONSE.

At the Central Office of the Board of Trade Labour Exchanges at Queen Anne's-gate, between 30 and 40 women registered themselves yesterday morning. They represented all walks of life—educated ladies who desired clerical and secretarial work, working women who desired factory employment, and so on.

Many expressed their willingness to work in armament factories; one applicant wanted "decorative painting" employment; another applied for "nursing or armament work," and stated that she held a certificate for electrical knowledge; while a third asked to drive a delivery van, as she was "accustomed to horses."

Applicants ranged from a parlour-maid to the widow of an Artillery officer.

WOMEN AS ROAD WORKERS.

It has been left to the Tiverton (Devon) Rural District Council to find a new outlet for women's labour. At the last meeting of the Council it was proposed by the Rev. E. E. Heathcote, seconded, and carried, that women should be employed in work on the roads.

[illegible] of the armament of that man. But it is necessary to remember that the change involves tremendous problems hereafter on which the Government ought to give some light and leading now, before we have gone too far. Take the banks. So many bank clerks have enlisted that the directors cannot carry on business without filling their places, and 25 per cent. of the clerks of London banks are now women. When the war is over and the patriotic bank clerks return with roses, roses all the way, what will happen to the women bank clerks? They will have had six to twelve months' training in their duties, they will be able to accept less salary than a male clerk, because no one will expect them to marry and keep a family, and there will be a great temptation to bank directors to retain them in their service. The salaries of bank clerks are not very extravagant—£120 to £150 a year—but the certain effect of such a change will be to lower them still more. Is that a good thing for anybody but the shareholders of banks? And if that is likely to be the course of events in the banking business, it is still more probable in ammunition-making, leather-stitching, and many other occupations which the God of War now desires to feed with women and girls. All these social changes may be good things, but it is absurd to go on without considering them. The censorship has prevented the Press from discussing most foreign affairs from the Pope of Rome to the Caliph of the Faithful. Let us insist that these domestic questions shall be faced and that the authorities shall abandon their favourite policy—

> Agin to impress on the poppylar mind.
> The comfort and wisdom o' goin' it blind.

If we cannot be trusted as a nation to know the truth about the military situation in Flanders, let us at least be allowed to know the industrial position at home.

The Daily Chronicle
March 19th. 1915.

WAR SERVICE FOR WOMEN.

OPINIONS ON BOARD OF TRADE CIRCULAR.

"FIRST FIND WORK FOR 64,000 REGISTERED UNEMPLOYED."

In Labour circles the Board of Trade circular on "War Service for Women" has been received with some suspicion and criticism, but it is probable that the Government purpose will be helped rather than hindered by the practical suggestions now being made.

Several resolutions on the subject were passed yesterday by the Workers' War Emergency Committee, which met at the offices of the Parliamentary Committee of the Trade Union Congress. Mr. R. Smillie, president of the Miners' Federation, was in the chair. The resolutions agreed to were in the following terms:—

The Committee wishes to point out that there are still 60,000 men and boys and 4,000 women on the live register of the Labour Exchanges, for whom the Board of Trade has so far failed to find situations or provide training, whilst many thousands more are working short time.

It further points out that the object of the ciculars appears to be specially directed to obtain women's labour in agriculture, and that absolutely no safeguards are proposed to guarantee good conditions and fair wages.

It is of vital importance to secure that no use should be made of such action to depress the standard of conditions of employment in the various trades, or to stereotype the evil conditions and low wages unfortunately now prevailing in various trades and districts.

The Committee requests the Prime Minister to see that, on any Committee—central or local—that may be formed for obtaining additional labour, for agriculture or any other industry, there should be in all cases a sufficient number of representatives of the organised wage-earners, men and women; and that efforts should be made to find situations for those now on the register before taking steps to bring in fresh supplies of female labour.

The Committee is extremely dissatisfied with the vague and inconclusive statement sent in response to the request of the Committee for specific information as to the amounts spent on the several branches of the National Relief Fund's work, and the names of the places or bodies to which the money has been given. It points out that no information has been given as to expending on civil distress, and requests that such information be supplied, with copies of the fortnightly statements which, it is understood, are compiled.

NEED OF TRAINING FOR NEW OCCUPATIONS.

"There is no need for a man to sell ribbons," said Miss Courtney to a "Daily Chronicle" representative yesterday; "nor any reason why he should serve as a waiter."

Miss Courtney has been collecting information regarding woman's war-time work for the National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies, and in connection with the Government appeal for feminine help she emphasises the necessity for training and trade union wages.

"There is no sphere, except that calling for superior physical strength, in which a woman cannot be trained to work as efficiently as a man. But women must be trained. An employer won't put an untrained woman in the place of a trained man, but he will look very favourably at the trained woman," said Miss Courtney.

"But women who replace men must be paid men's wages, or the trade unions will object to the underselling."

According to Miss Courtney, women's unemployment has decreased considerably of late, but there are still many women to whom work not greatly needed has been given, and the National Union welcomes Board of Trade registration if it means giving these women an opportunity to do work that is genuinely needed.

"I can't see," she continued, "why the Prince of Wales's Fund and the Queen's Work for Women Fund should not be used to train women for definite work, so that they can replace men called to the front. The Government should consider the question of making a grant for the purpose of fitting women for work urgently needed."

DIFFICULTIES OF TRANSFERENCE.

Mr. Mallon, secretary of the Anti-Sweating League, believes that the question is much more difficult than the Board of Trade imagine.

"People are so apt to think that labour is infinitely mobile," he said, "and it isn't. I think the circular is extraordinarily immature. One can't make great changes at a moment's notice. It is possible that from certain slack trades women might be removed and trained for armament work. But the training would be absolutely essential, and the time necessary for it would depend very largely on the work in which the girl had been previously employed.

"There are many trades from which transference could not be made. Take dressmaking. Work is slack, but I should say that it would be impossible to turn a dressmaker into a satisfactory armament worker.

"Then there is the question of class distinction to be considered. Girls who work at armament factories, though very good sorts, are rough in their ways, and the young dressmaker, coming from a more refined class, would greatly resent working with them.

"The slackest trade at the present moment is probably the lace trade. Net-working in Scotland is at a standstill. Glove-making, in a very bad condition at the beginning of the war, has revived a little. It isn't possible to take workers from these trades and place them in other spheres of labour without a preliminary training. And it is in insinuating that this can be done that the Board of Trade circular is so very misleading."

Mr. Mallon added that in his experience, every need for machinists in armament works was not so great as has been represented.

Already in London women are acting as motor drivers, lift attendants, waiters, and bookstall clerks, while the Bank of England is employing women to fill places vacated by men.

"Many wealthy people would be glad to encourage their men servants to enlist," remarked a popular Society woman to a "Daily Chronicle" representative, "but there is always such a shortage of female domestics, and it would be difficult to replace them. It seems to me that if woman's labour could be so organised as to encourage women to take the places of male servants numbers of young men now acting as gamekeepers and grooms and footmen and valets would be asked more eagerly by their employers whether or not they ought to enlist."

In Paris, at the moment, women are employed all over the Metropolitan Railway, while there are several feminine conductors on the buses. In the Civil Service it ought to be possible to give women more work. Many post offices, in the charge of men, could be equally well managed by women. Hundreds of able-bodied young men spend their time posing hats in windows instead of learning how to pose a rifle, while railway ticket clerks would be much more useful at the front.

The crux of the problem, however, is what will be done with the women when the men come back from the war. Labour experts themselves cannot provide a solution.

"INDUSTRIAL CONSCRIPTION."

Miss Sylvia Pankhurst writes that the Government's proposal (registration of women for War Service) may develop into a form of industrial conscription for women. "I take it that those who register can be called up for service as the men who filled up the Army forms signifying their willingness to enlist." She thinks a National Conference of women's trade unions and political and social organisations should be called at once to formulate demands. Proposals to be discussed might include the following:—

1.—As the Government will become overwhelmingly the largest, and perhaps eventually almost the sole employer of labour, the Parliamentary vote should be extended to women, so that they may have the same power as men in influencing the Government. Otherwise, the new industrial conscription will be an unjustifiable tyranny where women are concerned.

2.—Women shall have strong representation on the tribunal for settling labour disputes, and in all disputes in regard to women's employment a woman of experience shall be the chairman.

3.—Women shall receive men's wages for men's work, and any war bonus or increase.

4.—Proper safeguards in regard to hours, wages and conditions.

The Morning Post
March 19th. 1915.

THE WORK FOR WOMEN SCHEME.

AN ORGANISER'S CRITICISM.

The Board of Trade scheme for obtaining women workers in industries where there is a shortage of labour and to take the places of men who desire to be released for military service was keenly discussed yesterday by officials of women's trade societies. The general view taken was that the scheme had been put forward so as to ensure an adequate supply of men for the Army. No exception was taken to what is admitted as a necessary precaution, since no one could say how long the war will last, and it was essential that there should be no lack of fighting men. With the details of the scheme, however, agreement is not general. Some critics hold that the scheme has not been thought out with sufficient care, and that before it was launched the representatives of Trade Unions should have been consulted.

This is the view of Miss Mary R. Macarthur, wife of Mr. W. C. Anderson, M.P., and secretary of the Women's Trade Union League, which comprises 240,000 organised women workers. Discussing the scheme with a representative of the Morning Post yesterday, she said the question of the shortage of men in any particular trade and the substitution of women for them was a most difficult and delicate one, and one in which the advice and co-operation of the organised workers were essential. "I feel that the circular may give a false impression of the actual industrial situation at the moment," she continued, "and I can only imagine that it has been drafted rather with a view to possible eventualities than a present crisis. While we are aware that there is a shortage of men in many industries, and even a shortage of women in some trades, it is by no means a simple matter to arrange for the transference of labour with different experiences or in different areas. These difficulties apply to men, but they apply with double force to women, who are naturally less mobile. As I understand this appeal, it is made to women who are not normally wage-earners, and even to women who have not previously been wage-earners. Knowing as I do that at the present moment there are at least 50,000 women who are normal wage-earners unemployed throughout the country, it would be desirable to have some assurance that the possibility of the adaptation of these women has been fully considered before the introduction of new and presumably economically independent women is contemplated."

Miss Macarthur had no doubt that the Trade Union world, even if convinced of the necessity of this innovation, would require a satisfactory guarantee on the various aspects of the proposed substitution. "On what conditions are these women to be substituted for men?" she asked. "Are they to receive the same wages for the same work? What guarantee is to be given to men that, when they return to civil life, their situations will be open for them and that the standard of conditions in their trades remain unimpaired? And if the men receive satisfactory guarantees, what is to happen to women who have taken their places when they return if in the meantime the women have become self-dependent?"

A way out of the difficulty suggested by her criticism was indicated by Miss Macarthur. She advocated the appointment of a national representative committee, including a strong representation of industrial interests, to lay down conditions of transference. This, she thought, was one of the first safeguards which must be insisted upon. As to the composition of such a committee, it must be such as to inspire confidence in the minds of the working people.

READY RESPONSE TO GOVERNMENT'S APPEAL.

At the Central Office of the Board of Trade Labour Exchanges at Queen Anne's-gate alone between thirty and forty women registered themselves yesterday morning. They represented all walks of life—educated women who desired clerical and secretarial work, working women who desired factory employment, and so on. Many expressed their willingness to work in armament factories; one applicant wanted "decorative painting" employment; another applied for "nursing or armament work," and stated that she held a certificate for electrical knowledge; while a third asked to drive a delivery van, as she was "accustomed to horses." Applicants ranged from a parlourmaid to the widow of an artillery officer.

WOMEN IN RAILWAY OFFICES.

There is certainly one very large industry in which women can greatly extend their sphere walks of life—educated women who desired clerical and secretarial work, working women who desired factory employment, and so on. Many expressed their willingness to work in armament factories; one applicant wanted "decorative painting" employment; another applied for "nursing or armament work," and stated that she held a certificate for electrical knowledge; while a third asked to drive a delivery van, as she was "accustomed to horses." Applicants ranged from a parlourmaid to the widow of an artillery officer.

WOMEN IN RAILWAY OFFICES.

There is certainly one very large industry in which women can greatly extend their sphere of employment, thus releasing men of military age. That is in the railway service. The general public, which comes mainly in contact with outdoor railway workers, does not perhaps realise the enormous amount of clerical work in connection with the running of a great railway company, and there are probably few branches for which women are unfitted. A large proportion of the routine work could, it is quite safe to assert, be done by women accustomed to ordinary office employment, and this holds good of all the indoor departments of a railway. As a matter of fact, there is at least one great English railway company which has employed women clerks in its head goods offices for years.

But, apart from the clerical duties at head offices, there is a considerable scope for the employment of women in such functions as those of booking clerks. The female booking clerk has for years been utilised on the underground railways of Paris and Berlin, and it may be remembered that it was at one time proposed to employ them on the London underground lines, although the proposal, for some reason or other, came to nothing. Still, women have in one way and another so invaded the sphere of railway employment in various countries that there is nothing revolutionary in the idea that their services might be far more widely utilised in this country at a period of national emergency, even although we may not desire to go so far as to have women gate-keepers at level crossings, a common sight on the Continent.

It would be impossible to say at the moment how many men could be released for active service by employing women as substitutes, since the percentage of railwaymen who have already joined the Colours is remarkably high, and we have no definite statistics as to the average ages of those who remain behind. But it is known that a considerable number of railwaymen who desire to enlist have hitherto been obliged to continue in civilian employment because the general needs of the community, in addition to the demands made on the railways by the War Office, have made it necessary in many instances to refuse permission to enlist. A little time ago the railways and the War Office, in conjunction, were understood to have begun to consider a scheme whereby additional men within the age limits could be released, without the efficiency of the railway service being impaired thereby. So far nothing has been made public as to the methods that might be adopted, but the employment of women workers wherever possible should provide a way out of the difficulty. It is quite certain that, if a comprehensive scheme were drawn up for the employment of female work wherever it could be utilised in the railway service, many thousands of men could be released from an industry which employs about 600,000 persons in normal periods. And, in view of the many advantages of the railway service, no one need be anxious that in this sphere women would not have favourable conditions of employment. The reverse is the case, and the industry affords a better outlook for women who are economically hit at the moment than a good many others into which they are crowding.

In view of the great public interest taken in the new Government scheme, under which it is sought to mobilise women's labour for war service, Mr. Percy Alden, M.P., will speak on the subject at a public meeting to be held in His Majesty's Theatre on Tuesday next. The meeting has been arranged by the Women's Emergency Corps. The Duchess of Marlborough will preside.

663/31 663

The Glasgow Herald
March 19th 1918.

Women's War Work.

The appeal by the President of the Board of Trade that the reserve forces of women workers throughout the country, trained and untrained, should forthwith be registered, and then mobilised, was preceded by an announcement, trivial-seeming, perhaps, but really of the deepest significance, as a proof of the utter collapse under the stress of war, of sex-exclusiveness and prejudice against women workers. The Athenæum Club has engaged women to take the place of some of its male servants. Not long after the breaking of the peace a London journal sent out a circular or a reporter to the leading Clubs to ask how they had been affected by the War. This haunt of Bishops and the Elder Statesmen answered, with frigid surprise, that the War had not affected the Athenæum Club in any way whatever; and this reply prompted the irreverent comment that "perhaps the dear old gentlemen had not heard of it yet." It is not unworthy of note that these women servants—whose admission to the Athenæum Club may mark a new epoch in the history of the Feminist Movement—were not engaged by the manager, upon the instructions of the committee, until the members had been formally notified and their consent obtained. No doubt the members yielded under duress; and many of them may console themselves for such a breach with convention and tradition by dismissing it as a merely temporary expedient. But it is by no means unlikely that in the Athenæum Club, as in other and more important spheres of employment now opening up to women, they will not go out when Peace returns. One reason is that the members may not only accustom themselves to endure but even to prefer being waited upon by women; and a second reason is that the War, quite apart from the drain which it makes upon the young manhood of the nation, is likely to reduce the supply of men willing to enter domestic service, as well as other forms of employment in which women have meanwhile established themselves. That, however, is an aspect of the present situation which cannot profitably be discussed at the moment. The need of the hour is that every woman able and willing to take employment should enter herself on the register which is being prepared by the Board of Trade Labour Exchanges.

"Any woman who by working helps to release a man, or to equip a man for fighting, does national war service." That is the gist of the appeal published by the President of the Board of Trade. But the question of registering women for employment is not limited by the present and future demands of Lord Kitchener for more men. There is an actual shortage of labour already in many departments. We may take our own tramway service as an example of shortage, though perhaps hardly as an occupation to which many women can readily adapt themselves. Since August the Tramway Department has lost the services of about 1000 men. At present the Department is about 300 short of its establishment, and in order to maintain facilities some men are working a seven-day week. The proposal to employ women on the tramways, which was mooted in Edinburgh some time ago, and then abandoned, is being considered by the management. The obvious objections are that while the work at both ends of the car is perhaps not more arduous than many tasks at present undertaken by women, the disorderly passenger would be a difficult handful for the woman conductor, while the kind of mistake which a woman driver might make is apt to have serious consequences. However, the woman who can drive her own motor car could no doubt look after one belonging to the Corporation or one of those light commercial vans whose number is steadily increasing. There is a serious shortage of agricultural labour to be made good, and for farm work and dairy work, as well as for leather-stitching, brush-making, the machining of clothing, and light machining for armaments, women without experience of these employments are invited to enrol their names. For one of these occupations, as Mrs Pankhurst reminded her audience yesterday, almost every woman has had some experience at home. For most of the others some training will be necessary. But it will certainly take much less time to teach an intelligent woman even light machining for armaments than it does to turn a promising recruit into an efficient soldier.

Women have been "in business" for so many years that one need merely refer to the fact that there are still thousands of men of military age in every large city who could be released from clerical work by women. The girl who has just left business training classes could not step at once into the place vacated by an insurance clerk who, at the age of 22, let us say, has had four or five years' experience. But she would be ready to take the place of a junior clerk promoted. That is merely one example of many kinds of clerical work from which it will be necessary to release men whose proper place at present is with the colours. There is scope for women as railway-ticket and parcel clerks, in many shop departments at present staffed by men, and even in the production of certain kinds of war material. A few days ago Messrs Armstrong, Whitworth and Company engaged 60 women for their armament factory at Alexandria, and there are already some women at work in certain engineering departments. It will be necessary, as Mr Lloyd George indicated on Wednesday, for Trade Unions here, as in France, to suspend their restrictions upon the employment of unskilled labour; and Trade Unionism, one wishes to believe, is at last realising that every national interest, and especially that of Labour, is bound up in the successful prosecution of this War. Yesterday, though the Board of Trade appeal had just been made public in the morning, there was a considerable response at the Labour Exchanges in the city. We shall be doing the officials there no disservice if we suggest that women should, as far as possible, avoid registering themselves "for any sort of work." They should have some kind of occupation in view, and if possible a preference for some particular occupation, before they fill up a schedule; for the best guarantee for at least some degree of efficiency is to have an interest in one's work. Mrs Pankhurst yesterday offered the sound advice to women of leisure to take up some war work, upon the lines suggested by the Board of Trade, applying the money which they may earn to relief funds or for the technical training of other women. We do not anticipate that the question of wages will be raised in any acute form. Women, like men, will be paid the market value of their work, which is ultimately regulated by the supply of competent labour. No doubt the influx of women into many new employments may raise some more or less anxious problems after the War is over. But we need not try to cross any of these bridges until we come to them, and this appeal by the Board of Trade is based upon a national necessity, which promises to declare itself more, rather than less urgently during the war-months to come.

663/32

663.

The Local Government Journal, March 20th. 1915.

Developments of the Week.

SOME POINTS IN THE NEAR OUTLOOK.

The reorganisation continues of a number of our local services caused by the changed circumstances under which we live, and only an unobserving mind can believe that we have yet nearly reached the limit of these changes. Perhaps the most noteworthy matter that this week denotes developments is the issue by the Board of Trade of an announcement with regard to the preparation of a register of women who can undertake certain forms of employment that have been or are now filled by men. Coupled with that, and of particular interest to ourselves, is a letter of the Local Government Board to some, if not to all local authorities advising the release from employment of employees who "are not absolutely indispensable," and who may desire to enlist, together with the transfer to arsenals or factories engaged on Government work of men fitted for that class of undertaking. We can also link with these matters the conferences held by the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the President of the Board of Trade with leading representatives of trade and labour organisations for similar purposes. On another side, or in the background of the picture there are difficulties for some of the education committees; in great towns where schools have been or are being taken over for hospitals, and thousands of children must, therefore, be largely dispossessed of their daily avocation; in the country, by the demand for youthful labour in spring work on the farms. It seems strange to us who had never been in touch with anything of the like before and who could hardly imagine, much less realise the possibilities of a great continental war which, if not fought on British fields, is still sounding hard on British shores. In our own way, as occasion served, we have endeavoured to keep in touch with forward movements as they affect the various phases of local administration and it seems certain that much will have to be done in that way yet. It is useful now to observe that a much fuller mental and organised account is being taken of the whole situation. It has come, as it was bound to do, with the opening of the new land campaign. And, for the present, it will be better to regard it as of a permanent character. That is, the conditions, so far as we can make them, should be such as will best permit of a return to the usual arrangements of life at some, necessarily now indefinite, period.

Public Schools as Hospitals.

The work of the education committees in this particular should be comparatively easy to arrange. Several prominent educationists, to whom consecutive and systematic school instruction is the be-all of young life are complaining strongly of the action of the Government in taking over school buildings and of the inaction of the Board of Education in permitting country boy labour. Not much less than that could be expected of them, and in a sense their protests may be timely as keeping in the foreground one of the permanent requirements of a useful life. But then, what they say or write must be read in the full light of the circumstances in which the country is placed. We must have hospitals. Some of these advisers say that full school duties should be carried on and hospital buildings be erected in our public parks. But that would be a work of weeks if not months, and the artillery and rifles will not wait. Men are being wounded by the thousand and we cannot let them lie on stretchers while the bricklayers and carpenters and joiners are at work with trowels and hammers on hastily prepared new buildings. The schools are light, airy, and well adapted for their new purpose. And what is more, the defenders of the country have the very first claim to public consideration. The arrangement which has been made by some of the town or city education committees under which there is to be half time occupation by one set of children of schools not taken over, and similar occupation by another set, each child thus obtaining education of half-a-day appears to be the best that could be made in this state of emergency. It will, too, provide reasonable employment for the teachers. It is said that the children may miss the good hygienic conditions of the schools and that they may suffer in health as well as from some want of instruction. In these lighter and brighter days we should not be inclined, bearing in mind all the circumstances of the case, to lay much stress on the former condition. But if it were so, ground is provided for work by the sanitary and health committees. If not immediately, then so soon as opportunity offers these insanitary quarters, scheduled as they might be at once could be made the objects of schemes that can be taken in hand at the first suitable opportunity. It will be a better plan than that of making querulous complaints against the unavoidable. Much the same thing appears to us to be the case with regard to work in the country by boys safeguarded as it undoubtedly ought to be. If care is taken that any children so employed are properly fed and tolerably housed harm may be prevented from coming near them. These, in a sense, are as important matters now as school instruction. Food maintains a marked level which is beyond the resources of low-paid labour, and coal which even with the approach of warmer weather is still a home necessity, is even more difficult to obtain. The Government requires huge quantities, and will require more as they take control of works under the latest Act, and coal, of course, is the foundation of all this kind of manufacture. It will be dearer, the Miners' Federation this week decided to claim an advance of twenty per cent. in wages; but it should not be lessened in the quantity of production, for on Thursday they also agreed on plans by which the Easter holiday may be shortened and coal-getting carried on. But we must remind ourselves that many thousands have joined the forces and are at work in the trenches.

It is not easy to assess the outlook when we come to the employment of women, directed as it is to the replacement of men. It opens out a wide prospect, as to which it would in the highest degree be foolish to attempt to dogmatise. There are, no doubt, a good many posts of different kinds in the civil and local administrative services now filled by men which could be capably held by women. Reason compels us not to deny so much as that, and we need not here go outside of these services to deal with other occupations which are not our own intimate concern. It is, perhaps, true to say that some posts have always been held by men because of a traditional belief that they are "men's work" as distinct from that of women. One difficulty, however, will consist in the discovery of where exactly to begin on the new lines, and then, where to end. According to the Board of Trade all women may enter themselves upon a register of women for war service which is in preparation at the Board of Trade Labour Exchanges if they are prepared if needed to take employment of any kind, industrial, agricultural, clerical and other. The Committee of Imperial Defence in their letter to the Local Government Board published recently suggested themselves when dealing with the "release of men of high physical quality" for service with the Colours and also for participating in the manufacture of war material that there were some posts "in which the employment temporarily of women in place of men" might be practicable. The statement gives rise to more than one cause of inquiry. Primarily there is the question of conditions of employment in whatever class the avocation undertaken by the women may be. We do not want to see introduced, even through the necessities of the war a cheapening of male employment through its supersession by that of women. If a woman can undertake duties formerly undertaken by a man she ought to be employed under the same conditions as the man. But, then, can one woman fulfil duties that have been undertaken by one man "of high physical quality?" This, in public affairs should be a matter of investigation, and it would be well if, besides the Labour Exchanges, local administrative bodies and the Local Government Board were to become concerned in any arrangement made on a considerable scale. On another point in this new system of employment, the extent of which might become of a far reaching character is to be found in a fact which, however deplorable ought not entirely to be ignored. Part of this work is to be carried on to fill the places "temporarily" of men engaged in the war. Unfortunately, it is only too clear that among the men some are destined never to return. Thus, temporary may become permanent employment, and it affords an additional reason why care should be taken at the outset as to regard to the terms. These considerations have probably been taken account of at the conference held by the Chancellor of the Exchequer this sentatives of trade and labour organisations for similar purposes. On another side, or in the background of the picture there are difficulties for some of the education committees; in great towns where schools have been or are being taken over for hospitals, and thousands of children must, therefore, be largely dispossessed of their daily avocation; in the country, by the demand for youthful labour in spring work on the farms. It seems strange to us who had never been in touch with anything of the like before and who could hardly imagine, much less realise the possibilities of a great continental war which, if not fought on British fields, is still sounding hard on British shores. In our own way, as occasion served, we have endeavoured to keep in touch with forward movements as they affect the various phases of local administration and it seems certain that much will have to be done in that way yet. It is useful now to observe that a much fuller mental and organised account is being taken of the whole situation. It has come, as it was bound to do, with the opening of the new land campaign. And, for the present, it will be better to regard it as of a permanent character. That is, the conditions, so far as we can make them, should be such as will best permit of a return to the usual arrangements of life at some, necessarily now indefinite, period.

Public Schools as Hospitals.

The work of the education committees in this particular should be comparatively easy to arrange. Several prominent educationists, to whom consecutive and systematic school instruction is the be-all of young life are complaining strongly of the action of the Government in taking over school buildings and of the inaction of the Board of Education in permitting country boy labour. Not much less than that could be expected of them, and in a sense their protests may be timely as keeping in the foreground one of the permanent requirements of a useful life. But then, what they say or write must be read in the full light of the circumstances in which the country is placed. We must have hospitals. Some of these advisers say that full school duties should be carried on and hospital buildings be erected in our public parks. But that would be a work of weeks if not months, and the artillery and rifles will not wait. Men are being wounded by the thousand and we cannot let them lie on stretchers while the bricklayers and carpenters and joiners are at work with trowels and hammers on hastily prepared new buildings. The schools are light, airy, and well adapted for their new purpose. And what is more, the defenders of the country have the very first claim to public consideration. The arrangement which has been made by some of the town or city education committees under which there is to be half-time occupation by one set of children of schools not taken over, and similar occupation by another set, each child thus obtaining education of half-a-day appears to be the best that could be made in this state of emergency. It will, too, provide is even more difficult to obtain. The Government requires huge quantities, and will require more as they take control of works under the latest Act, and coal, of course, is the foundation of all this kind of manufacture. It will be dearer, the Miners' Federation this week decided to claim an advance of twenty per cent. in wages; but it should not be lessened in the quantity of production, for on Thursday they also agreed on plans by which the Easter holiday may be shortened and coal-getting carried on. But we must remind ourselves that many thousands have joined the forces and are at work in the trenches.

It is not easy to assess the outlook when we come to the employment of women, directed as it is to the replacement of men. It opens out a wide prospect, as to which it would in the highest degree be foolish to attempt to dogmatise. There are, no doubt, a good many posts of different kinds in the civil and local administrative services now filled by men which could be capably held by women. Reason compels us not to deny so much as that, and we need not here go outside of these services to deal with other occupations which are not our own intimate concern. It is, perhaps, true to say that some posts have always been held by men because of a traditional belief that they are "men's work" as distinct from that of women. One difficulty, however, will consist in the discovery of where exactly to begin on the new lines, and then, where to end. According to the Board of Trade all women may enter themselves upon a register of women for war service which is in preparation at the Board of Trade Labour Exchanges if they are prepared if needed to take employment of any kind, industrial, agricultural, clerical and other. The Committee of Imperial Defence in their letter to the Local Government Board published recently suggested themselves when dealing with the "release of men of high physical quality" for service with the Colours and also for participating in the manufacture of war material that there were some posts "in which the employment temporarily of women in place of men" might be practicable. The statement gives rise to more than one cause of inquiry. Primarily there is the question of conditions of employment in whatever class the avocation undertaken by the women may be. We do not want to see introduced, even through the necessities of the war a cheapening of male employment through its supersession by that of women. If a woman can undertake duties formerly undertaken by a man she ought to be employed under the same conditions as the man. But, then, can one woman fulfil duties that have been undertaken by one man "of high physical quality?" This, in public affairs should be a matter of investigation, and it would be well if, besides the Labour Exchanges, local administrative bodies and the Local Government Board were to become concerned in any arrangement made on a considerable scale. On another point in this new system of employment, the extent of which might become of a far-reaching character is to be found in a fact which, however deplorable ought not entirely to be ignored. Part of this work is to be carried on to fill the places "temporarily" of men engaged in the war. Unfortunately, it is only too clear that among the men some are destined never to return. Thus, temporary may become permanent employment, and it affords an additional reason why care should be taken at the outset in regard to the terms. These considerations have probably been taken account of at the conferences held by the Chancellor of the Exchequer this week, but outside of the vast importance which attaches to the successful prosecution of the war they are the most important matters connected with this very interesting situation.

All things considered, it seems to be clear that local administration will in the near future—and we cannot this week go farther than that—have other new features to deal with in an as yet complicated state of things. All the Government departments, it is evident, are working together in a manner which is without precedent, just as it is without precedent for a Government to take control of works in so extensive a manner. The localities, engaged as they have been in recruiting, in hospital work, in market and other arrangements, will have new duties to perform such as the housing of transferred workmen before we can hope to see the full length of these activities.

The Daily Telegraph, March 20th. 1915. 6 3/3 663

Manchester Guardian, March 20th. 1915.

WOMEN'S REGISTER FOR WAR SERVICE

FIRST APPLICATIONS.

LETTERS FROM ALL CLASSES.

An official at the Board of Trade Central Labour Exchange, questioned yesterday afternoon at the offices at Westminster with regard to the Government's scheme of war service for women, said: "It is impossible as yet to give any definite idea as to the extent of the response to the Government circular asking for the help of women in the industrial concerns of the country; but up to this afternoon we have had over 5,000 applications for forms on which to register applications for special war service. This is very gratifying, seeing that the circular was only issued yesterday, and especially so as the applications come from all parts of the country able to reach London by a day's post, including Cornwall, Devonshire, Somerset, Hampshire, Leicestershire, Derbyshire, Bedfordshire, and the Home Counties generally.

"This morning's letters came from applicants in all classes of life—from well-to-do women who have not 'worked' for a livelihood before, to women in comfortable situations in domestic life who offer to go 'back to factory' and loom, or to dairy work, if by so doing they can help to release men for active service in the interests of the State.

"The 'tone' of many of the letters," said this official, "is obviously patriotic. Women of distinct educational abilities write offering to place their services in business houses or shops, to meet the emergency foreshadowed in the circular. Many young women engaged in comfortable domestic work desire to change their occupation, not for the sake of change, but in order to aid the scheme in the national interest. So far, there has been little response on the side of the employers. That may come later In one case, however, a large hotel proprietor expressed his willingness to substitute female for male labour, if it can be found, in order to release his staff for service at the front. A well-qualified teacher says she will work as a shop assistant or in a factory.

WORK ON ARMAMENTS.

"The idea has got about," added the Board of Trade official, "that armament work is very simple, and there will probably be many women who will wish to take up this particular branch of work, because it is remunerative, but there is no desire to boom this need for any but the qualified. It is a skilled operation, and the best positions naturally will have to be filled by trained men. But there is no reason why certain posts may not be filled by women Some towns, again, have already successfully experimented with women tram and taxi drivers.

"It would be well if applicants for employment would state more definitely than many of them have done up to the present, their exact qualifications for work, whether in factory, workshops, trade, or office; in short, that they should state their industrial or business experience. If they have neither, they may easily become proficient in large numbers of occupations, in order to release men, and there is no reason for any to keep back. They should also state whether married or single. The whole scheme is experimental, but there is every reason to believe, from the measure of acceptance already realised, that it will be successful in its object."

RESPONSE IN LEEDS.

In Leeds the response at the Labour Exchanges to the appeal of the Government for women workers has been very gratifying. The women who registered their names will, it is believed, be at once commissioned to work in localities where Government orders are plentiful. The demand for women labourers in and around Leeds is more pronounced in the ammunition shops than in the khâki clothing factories, and it is stated that it will be unreasonable to suppose that women could be employed in the ordinary work of the engineering shops. It is found that they are especially useful in light machine work, and many in Leeds can, it is said, be increasingly employed in the making of cartridge-cases and on parts of shells

A big manufacturer to-day stated that the idea of bringing back all the young married women to work has already been acted upon to the fullest extent, and that is readily endorsed pitals taking serious cases. By this means the patients could be removed directly they were convalescent, and the beds made ready for fresh arrivals.

NURSES' AID

"If these measures were adopted I am confident we should soon have a large addition to the number of competent nurses and a conservation of the resources of the hospitals."

LADY LUGARD'S VIEW.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE DAILY TELEGRAPH."

SIR—I imagine that there is hardly a woman in the British Isles who will not welcome with satisfaction the attempt of the Government to organise female labour with a view not only of setting male labour free for the front, but also of helping to provide our soldiers at the front with all that they need of munitions of war. It gives to women an opportunity unique in history of taking an ordered place in the public activities of a nation on trial. "Any woman who by working helps to relieve a man or to equip a man for fighting does national war service." Women in the great sieges of history have stood behind men in the fortifications, have loaded rifles, have carried food, and, so doing, have turned the scale of victory.

So, I believe, the women of England now wish to stand behind their men. The instinct of every sound-hearted woman is to "do her bit." The majority do not want to occupy themselves with changed fashions, nor with other distractions. They don't want to be distracted. They want to give the whole of their hearts and minds to the vital struggle in which the Empire is engaged.

For the first time in their lives many have felt that they would like to fight. They don't know how! They want to work. Of a large and relatively idle class it may be also said that they don't know how! It is to this class that the opportunity is given. The Government has made them a big offer. It proposes to organise their labour, and to show them how to throw the whole of their energies into the great fight. Labouring women are already at work. It is to the great body of the unemployed middle-class that the appeal must be made, and it will be profoundly interesting to watch the result. The same class is giving its men as recruits to the Army. Will its women come forward as the men have done, and offer themselves for training as recruits in a national labour reserve? If they do, and if the Government fulfil their promise of organising and training such a body, it will be an experiment worthy of the crisis.—Yours faithfully,

March 19. FLORA L. LUGARD.

WOMEN'S FREEDOM LEAGUE.

THREE GUARANTEES.

In a manifesto issued yesterday the Women's Freedom League state that they are glad to note the tardy recognition by the Government of the value of women's work brought before the country in their scheme of war service for women. They demand three guarantees:

That no trained woman employed in men's work be given less pay than that given to men.

That some consideration be given when the war is over to the women who during the war have carried on this necessary work.

That, in case of training being required, proper maintenance be given to the woman or girl while that training is going on.

Every woman should now resolutely refuse to undertake any branch of work except for equal wages with men. The men who are serving their country in the field should be safeguarded on their return from any undercutting by women. Finally, this is an opportune moment for the Government to guarantee that before they leave office they will bring before the House of Commons a measure for the political enfranchisement of women.

LAUNDRY WORKERS.

In conversation with the secretary of the Launderers' Association yesterday, a representative of The Daily Telegraph was informed that the new scheme suggested by the Government would not affect laundries. As men are only engaged in washhouses, where the work is of a very arduous nature, looking after the machines and lifting heavy loads of wet linen, it would be absolutely impossible to employ women to take the places of those who have joined the colours, so far as the South of England is concerned. Women, said the secretary, are not strong enough for this class of work, and, even if a sufficient number could be obtained, it would entail a heavy expenditure, as one man would do as much work as two or three women. In the North, it is true, female labour is employed in wash houses, but in these factory towns women are physically much stronger than those in London and other parts of the province.

To illustrate the difficulties laundry proprietors have to face at present the secretary said that some members of his association had been prevented from attending meetings of the society owing to the fact that they had to take the place of some of their

---

...women all power.

The Mobilisation of Women.

The Board of Trade circular calling upon women to register themselves as willing to do men's work to set the men free to join the army has excited much discussion. It is quite possible that the Board of Trade may have had this idea of an industrial mobilisation of women and have carried it out without consulting other Government Departments, and it would be very interesting to know if this is the case. The result is rather unfortunate. Representative trade unionists are frankly alarmed by it. Their War Emergency Committee have decided to ask the Prime Minister to receive a deputation, and I believe it is likely that they may ask for the formation of a national tribunal, representing labour as well as employers, to control the administration and conditions of the scheme if it is to be gone on with. It is easy to understand the anxiety of the trade unionists as to what the scheme may portend immediately, and still more when the war is over and the tremendous industrial readjustment has to take place. The idea of the Board of Trade does not seem to be to fill vacancies already existing, but rather to replace employed men so that they can join the army. I hear that many well-to-do women are taking the circular as a patriotic appeal, and are registering themselves as willing to do all kinds of arduous and disagreeable work. If they are taken at their word it will have at any rate one advantage—that knowledge of the conditions of women's labour will be much more widespread among the leisured classes after the war than it is now.

Some Difficulties of the Scheme.

Miss Mary McArthur (Mrs. W. C. Anderson) has already pointed out in yesterday's papers some of the difficulties of the scheme and some of the objections which will have to be met by the Board of Trade or the Government if they are to have organised labour with them in carrying it out. Are the women, for instance, to have a man's wage for a man's work? What is to be done with them when the men they have replaced come back from the war? Or, alternatively, what guarantees can be given to the men who surrender their jobs that they will be reinstated at the old standard of wages and conditions? I may add that so far I have heard no answer to this last question. What guarantees can the Government possibly give which will bind employers when the war is over not to go on using women's labour—by that time trained to the tasks—at a lower price than men's labour? In conversation with me Miss McArthur raised a further consideration which certainly ought to be discussed. "Another aspect," she said, "which will inevitably suggest itself to the minds of the working men is as to whether this unprecedented step does not imply an official recognition of that sinister form of conscription which is involved in economic pressure which it is almost impossible to resist. Undisguised conscription would be less objectionable than that. Then at least we should know where we were, and all classes would be on the same footing." It would certainly be very unfortunate if either employers or employed misinterpreted the circular as an invitation to sack their men in order to make them enlist.

The Margin of Unemployed Women's Labour.

I have discussed the Government plan for registering women for war service to-day with men and women who are engaged in the organisation of women's labour. I gather that there is no hostility to any scheme for enlarging the avenues of women's employment, but there is some doubt whether circumstances have arisen to make the new scheme necessary. It is pointed out that in some trades men who are not available for military service are not fully employed at present, and that the object of the Government might be met to some extent by a transference of men's labour. My informants are sceptical as to whether there is much margin of unemployed women's labour at present, and it is doubted whether many women could be taken into war trades without stopping the supply of women's labour to the normal channels. The opinion is expressed that the absorption of women into new factories, and it is stated that it will be unreasonable to suppose that women could be employed in the ordinary work of the engineering shops. It is found that they are especially useful in light machine work, and many in Leeds can, it is said, be increasingly employed in the making of cartridge-cases and on parts of shells.

A big manufacturer to-day stated that the idea of bringing back all the young married women to work has already been acted upon to the fullest extent, and that is readily endorsed.

SUPPLY OF NURSES.

REMEDYING THE SHORTAGE.

PROBATIONERS WANTED.

Much attention is being given at present to the provision of an adequate supply of nurses for our sick and wounded soldiers in hospitals abroad and at home. Necessarily there is not a sufficiency of fully-qualified nurses to meet the emergency created by the war, and the problem, which is likely to become more acute, is receiving serious consideration in many quarters.

Viscount Knutsford, whose position as chairman of the London Hospital enables him to speak with authority, was interviewed on the subject yesterday by a representative of The Daily Telegraph. He has given a close study to the question of the training of nurses, and spoke particularly of what has been done at the London Hospital.

"We foresaw," he said, "the demand that would take place, and at the London Hospital we have taken in seventy short-time probationers. Some have been six months with us, some only three, but they will be of great value when working in new hospitals under trained supervision. There can be no doubt that the idea of nursing soldiers only by fully-trained nurses must be abandoned. Civilians in time of peace have never been so nursed. In all voluntary hospitals untrained probationers are always to be found working under trained nurses.

"In the case of the London Hospital we have a staff of 517, of whom 335 have not yet gained their certificates. Many are very near that happy day, but until the certificates are granted the nurses may be described as untrained. That, of course, does not mean that the patients are not properly nursed, because all the untrained nurses are under trained supervision.

OPPORTUNITY FOR WOMEN.

"Now that there is so much pressure on nursing staffs, the same system will have to be introduced into hospitals where soldiers are received. In order to meet the growing need, as many women as possible should endeavour to get some hospital training, and hospital authorities should lay themselves out to assist. Women have a splendid opportunity of helping which they should not neglect. No doubt there may be difficulties of accommodation at certain hospitals, but each one should devise means to overcome them. Probationers might be allowed to go home, or lodgings might be taken close to the hospital. Neither of these plans is the ideal, but the matter is one of such urgency that we must do what is practicable. I would urge all hospital authorities to set to work at once in order to increase the nursing strength of the nation.

"There is another matter on which I think a word is advisable. It is curious how many nurses desire to nurse abroad. I would advise them to stick to the less exciting work at home.

"I should very much like also to see a better system of classification of ill and wounded soldiers at the point of debarkation. Nothing can exceed the splendid way in which the War Office is dealing with the wounded as they arrive, but I would prefer that soldiers suffering from lumbago, rheumatism, and minor ailments were not sent to hospitals fully equipped for serious cases. Hospitals taking in minor cases might be staffed by those who have retired from active nursing for some years, assisted by probationers and voluntary aid detachment members. By this means nurses whose training is up to date would be set free for hospitals taking serious cases, and here also the assistance of probationers would be useful.

"There are difficulties, I know, in securing a proper classification of patients as they come off ship, but I think they could be overcome. Certainly such a classification would husband the resources of the hospitals. Then I should is concerned. Women, said the secretary, are not strong enough for this class of work, and, even if a sufficient number could be obtained, it would entail a heavy expenditure, as one man would do as much work as two or three women. In the North, it is true, female labour is employed in wash-houses, but in those factory towns women are physically much stronger than those in London and other parts of the provinces.

To illustrate the difficulties laundry proprietors have to face at present the secretary said that some members of his association had been prevented from attending meetings of the society owing to the fact that they had to take the place of some of their men in the wash-house whose positions they were unable to fill since they had enlisted.

"INDUSTRIAL CONSCRIPTION."

MISS S. PANKHURST'S LETTER.

To the Editor of "The Daily Telegraph."

Sir—The Government's proposal is regard to the registration of women for war service is a most important departure, which may develop into a form of industrial conscription for women. I take it that those women who register as willing to perform various services can be called up for service as the men were who filled up the Army forms signifying their willingness to enlist. So important is the situation for women that it seems imperative that a national conference of women's trade unions and political and social organisations should be called at once with a view to formulating demands; such proposals as the following would be discussed:

1. That in view of the fact that the Government will at once become overwhelmingly the largest and, perhaps, eventually almost the sole employer of labour, with more extensive power for controlling labour than any private employer has ever had, it is imperative that the Parliamentary vote should at once be extended to women, in order that they may have the same power that men have in influencing the Government which controls their labour; otherwise the new industrial conscription will be an unjustifiable tyranny where women are concerned.

2. That as the Government proposes that all labour disputes shall be referred to a tribunal nominated by the Government, women shall have strong representation on this tribunal, and in all disputes in regard to women's employment a woman of standing and experience (the nation has many such to draw upon) shall be the chairman of the tribunal, or in the case of the appointment of a sole arbiter, a woman shall be the arbiter of the dispute.

3. That where a woman is employed on work hitherto done by men she shall receive the wage hitherto paid to men, in addition to any war bonus or increase in wages which might have been paid for the work now in the case of men employés. That in no case shall an unskilled woman be employed at a lower wage than the current wage of a man unskilled labourer.

4. That proper safeguards in regard to hours, wages, and conditions be arranged in conjunction with representatives of the women concerned, and that no woman shall be compelled to work under conditions which the representative of the organisation to which she belongs reports to be unsatisfactory.

It is vitally important that some such regulations should be adopted by the women's organisations, in order that the position of the women concerned may be safeguarded, and that the introduction of women into the labour market may not so vitally lower the standard of livelihood for the working classes as to become a national disaster.

It is hoped that the various women's organisations will sink their differences at this juncture and realise that their most patriotic duty as women is to safeguard the interests of the women of the nation.—Yours, &c. E. SYLVIA PANKHURST.

USEFUL WORK WELCOMED.

To the Editor of "The Daily Telegraph."

Sir—Having read the Government scheme carefully, I feel sure there will be a hearty response from all classes of women. Thousands of middle-class girls volunteered for Red Cross work at the beginning of the war, because it seemed the only thing they could do, and many of these will welcome useful work for which they are more fitted. We are here training girls for work in gardening, dairy, and poultry keeping, and are also working three days a week on a commercial fruit farm. Two of my students can, and probably will register, and also a number of old students, but those in training are certainly better employed in finishing their training than undertaking emergency work. As long as the Government sees that the women are properly paid and housed there will be no lack of workers.—Yours truly,

J. S. TURNER.

Country and Colonial Training School, Arlesey House, Arlesey, Beds.

scheme necessary. It is pointed out that in some trades men who are not available for military service are not fully employed at present, and that the object of the Government might be met to some extent by a transference of men's labour. My informants are sceptical as to whether there is much margin of unemployed women's labour at present, and it is doubted whether many women could be taken into war trades without stopping the supply of women's labour to the normal channels. The opinion is expressed that the absorption of women into new avenues of employment since the war began has probably gone as far as is practicable for the time. In the woollen mills of Yorkshire, for example, a great many married women are known to have returned to work since the war to fill the places of men who have enlisted.

Glasgow Herald, March 20th. 1915.

663/34

663.

WOMEN AND WAR SERVICE.

GLASGOW'S POSSIBILITIES.

WORK IN ARMAMENT FACTORIES.

The registration of women who are prepared to take up "war service" by working in industries or occupations in which the labour supply is inadequate proceeded very briskly yesterday at all the Labour Exchanges in Glasgow. With the wider publicity which the appeal of the Board of Trade received the number of women who offered themselves was much larger than on the previous day, though on that occasion also the response was considered very satisfactory. In addition to the actual enrolments there was a large number of applications for the forms which require to be filled up, indicating that in all probability there will be a greater influx of volunteers at the beginning of the week. Letters are now coming in from women resident outside the city, and as time passes it is expected that the offers received in this way will increase largely. The Labour Exchange officials state that they will probably be in a position to give figures on Tuesday or Wednesday showing the progress made in registration up till that time.

A proportion of the women who applied during the first two days of registration are of the working class, desirous of obtaining employment for the sake of the livelihood it will afford, but the great majority are women whose activities have been confined hitherto to household duties and whose circumstances make it unnecessary for them to take part in industrial work. They have offered themselves purely from patriotic motives. It is really surprising, the officials state, how many young women of middle-class and well-to-do families have come forward, prepared to sacrifice the leisure they have previously enjoyed in order to take part in any work which may be to the advantage of the nation in the present crisis. These women, it is said, have no delusions as to the nature of the obligations which they are undertaking. They have not pledged themselves in any frivolous spirit. Some of them are animated no doubt by the prospect of novelty and adventure in the life, but generally they have shown that they fully realise that they may be asked to work at tiresome, mechanical, monotonous labour. They are in "deadly earnest," said one of the officials. He quoted as an example of the spirit prevailing among the volunteers the case of a woman who offered herself for office work—the business for which she considered she was best suited—but who added that she would readily go into an armament factory, if her work there would be of greater service. It should be pointed out that while many of the women have been offering to do "any sort of work" they are asked to state in the registration form—If they have ever done paid work before; if so, what; if not, what kind of work they are best suited for. They are asked also if they are prepared to be trained for work which they have not previously done; and, further, if they are free to work whole time or only part time, and to leave their homes for work if the pay is sufficient and the housing satisfactory.

WORK FOR A THOUSAND WOMEN.

If the women are available it is anticipated that they can easily be placed in employment, without prejudicing the position of the male operatives. The purpose of the scheme is double-edged—to make up for the loss of male labour caused by enlistments, and to meet the exceptional demand created by the war. There is a great dearth of machinists in shirtmaking factories, while there is also a demand for women for office work. These are occupations in which women could be placed immediately. The scarcity of labour, however, is most acutely felt in Glasgow in the engineering and armament works in which munitions of war are being turned out. Increased production in these factories could undoubtedly be brought about if women were engaged, and it is understood that a large proportion of the women who are now registering in Glasgow will be asked to undertake light machining work in these armament factories. A number of women are already employed in engineering works where shells and other explosives are being manufactured. The work allotted to them is usually to operate a turning lathe or other light machine, and they can become expert with very little training. It is stated that some of the women now employed were very adept at the work after only a fortnight's experience. It has been found that under the supervision of a few trained male mechanics they can turn out work very rapidly and very efficiently. Practically all the work in the making of a shrapnel shell can be done by women, while they can also assist very materially in the processes required to complete the heavier explosives used by howitzers. One large armament firm in the city, who have never previously employed women, have indicated to the Labour Exchange within the past few days that they are now prepared to engage women. The firm have found that it is practically impossible to get male labour to overtake the work for which the Government is pressing them in common with other manufacturers of war munitions. Two or three engineering firms intimated yesterday to the Labour Exchange that they would be willing to take on a considerable number of women, and it is believed that to begin with over a thousand women could be employed in engineering and armament works alone. Steps are being taken with a view to ascertaining from the employers the number of women for whom it is possible that engagements might be found in local industries.

WOMEN LIBERALS AND THE SCHEME.

A statement with regard to the Government's scheme of war service for women was made at the annual meeting of the Scottish Women's Liberal Federation, which was held yesterday in the Charing Cross Hall, Glasgow. Miss Alice Younger, organiser of women's work under the Labour Exchanges in Scotland, said the Board of Trade wished to ask all the organisations of women in the country to co-operate in the promotion of the scheme, the object of which was to enable women to give the best service in the present national emergency. She had been asked to deliver to them a message from the Board. In view of the shortage existing and anticipated it was proposed to form a special register of women for war service, i.e., women able and free to take paid employment of any kind if called upon. It was hoped to find by this means women who had previously worked and had retired, or women capable of work, but not previously having worked. The Board of Trade requested the co-operation of the Scottish Women's Liberal Federation in the distribution of the forms for registration, and in any other way possible. In the form of registration which had been issued it was explained that women were wanted at once to work in the following, among other, occupations:—Farm work, dairy work, leather stitching, brush-making, clothing machining, and light machining for armament. Even if women had no special experience of this work they might register, as it might be possible to train them. It was further pointed out that as more men joined the forces more women would be required to work while they were away. It would be observed, Miss Younger added, that it was paid employment that was proposed. Although perhaps women did not all wish to be earning more money, they could use the money they earned in any way they liked, while one important point that must be borne in mind was that women registering did not for that reason oblige themselves to accept employment. They would be free to refuse the work offered if its nature and the pay and conditions were not considered satisfactory by them. Some people feared that more leisured women were being called upon to take work for which there were sufficient industrial women already. That, however, was not in the least intended. There were the registers at the Labour Exchange, and these registers would be used first. What was proposed was to obtain a reserve register for needs that would grow greater as time went on.

THE DEMAND FOR WORK.

Miss Irwin, of the Scottish Council for Women's Trades, in discussing the Government scheme, said that it appealed to her for three reasons. It gave women an opportunity to share in the service of the nation; it would tend to break down artificial barriers which had kept women out of employments and departments of employment for which they were not disqualified by nature; and she welcomed whatever would give women a healthier ideal in life and provide the discipline of serious training. They must, however, guard against the danger of flooding the labour market with half-trained, inefficient women. There was a double danger in this, for the circumstances of many women might enable them to take work at a lower rate of remuneration than the woman who was actually depending on her own earnings for her livelihood could afford to do. The half-trained dilettante woman might have also a serious effect in lowering the standard of national industrial efficiency.

At present there were over 1000 applications for employment from women and girls in Glasgow registered officially, and every day the Scottish Council for Women's Trades were receiving applications from women, many of whom were in destitute circumstances, and for whom no work could at present be found. The council's emergency workrooms were full continuously, and there was a long list of waiting applicants. The cases were brought to their notice by the Distress Committee. At present they were giving employment to 165 women, none of the cases arising out of the war. In addition there were large numbers of unemployed women who did not register officially. They would certainly insist on work being found for these women before posts were given to voluntary workers. Miss Irwin stated also that there were certain occupations in which there was what might be described as an abnormal shortage of labour at present, agriculture standing out conspicuously in the list. While certain branches of machining were enjoying what was undoubtedly a temporary abnormal activity, a serious situation might arise at the end of the present boom through over-stocking. Careful consideration would have to be given to the relative rates of the existing

The Standard, March 20th. 1915.

TO RELEASE THE MEN.

WOMEN SEEK WAR WORK.

APPLICANTS NUMBER THOUSANDS.

The Government's appeal to women to enrol themselves upon the special registers of women available for war service, to take the places in various industries o. men who enlist, is being very cordially responded to by women throughout the United Kingdom, but is looked at somewhat askance by employers and by men's labour organisations. At the central office of the Board of Trade Labour Exchange at Queen Anne's-gate, Westminster, were received yesterday morning more than 4000 letters from women asking for enrolment forms. A large number of women applied there in person, and from the particulars they supplied the following applications may be cited as showing the ages of those who have come forward and the variety of occupations for which they offer themselves:—Married: aged 24, qualified for omnibus conductor; aged 20, to learn motor-driving; aged 30, kinema actress; single: aged 22, aged 31, to learn motor-driving; aged 17, lift attendant; aged 27, bank clerk (previously teaching).

All these women, and most of the personal applicants at the central office, were women of education.

WHERE WOMEN MAY APPLY.

Miss Robinson, assistant secretary of the London Society for Women's Suffrage, 58, Victoria-street, Westminster, told a Standard representative that her society was about to open a special register for women of the middle class who "would not care to join a queue at a Labour Exchange." This society has provided work for several thousands of voluntary women helpers, and paid work for about 100, and is very glad that the Government has made this appeal. "We have had a register for voluntary workers since the war began," said Miss Robinson, "and we may say that fully 99 per cent. of the women whose names have been placed upon it have proved really useful workers. I met a girl yesterday who was enthusiastic about the Government scheme, but I know she is not the kind of girl who would care to go personally to a Labour Exchange. We want women to understand that in registering here they are not binding themselves to perform any kind of paid work which may be offered them. Nor are they to expect paid work at once. Women who want immediate employment can only be sent to the Labour Exchanges."

Women who want posts as "lap-dog combers" must not assume that the Government means to provide any woman who asks for it with well-paid employment. In very many industries preliminary training will be necessary; milkmaids are needed now, but amateur milkmaids would drive any farmer crazy. Middle-class women prepared to go anywhere in Great Britain, and do any work for which they are fitted, will be highly appreciated in two or three months' time if another million men or so are enlisted—that is the plain truth of the position.

Lady Askwith, wife of Sir George Askwith, has publicly announced her intention to register for war service. Women can quickly learn to turn cartridge-cases, a branch of the "munitions of war" industry, which is at the moment short of labour. In every branch of agriculture trained women's labour can be utilised. Women need not necessarily go to Labour Exchanges to enrol. About 250,000 forms will shortly be sent to the post offices for distribution to applicants.

In compliance with a request received from the Board of Trade Labour Exchange the executive committee of the National League for Opposing Woman Suffrage has consented to co-operate with the board in obtaining the services of women for war work and to urge the league's branches throughout the country to give their assistance.

The Women's Freedom League, while noting the "tardy recognition" by the Government of the value of women's work, demands that no trained woman employed in men's work be given less pay than that given to men; that some consideration be given when the war is over to the women who during the war have carried on this necessary work, and that, in case of training being required proper maintenance be given to the woman or girl while

A proportion of the women who applied during the first two days of registration are of the working class, desirous of obtaining employment for the sake of the livelihood it will afford, but the great majority are women whose activities have been confined hitherto to household duties and whose circumstances make it unnecessary for them to take part in industrial work. They have offered themselves purely from patriotic motives. It is really surprising, the officials state, how many young women of middle-class and well-to-do families have come forward, prepared to sacrifice the leisure they have previously enjoyed in order to take part in any work which may be to the advantage of the nation in the present crisis. These women, it is said, have no delusions as to the nature of the obligations which they are undertaking. They have not pledged themselves in any frivolous spirit. Some of them are animated no doubt by the prospect of novelty and adventure in the life, but generally they have shown that they fully realise that they may be asked to work at tiresome, mechanical, monotonous labour. They are in "deadly earnest," said one of the officials. He quoted as an example of the spirit prevailing among the volunteers the case of a woman who offered herself for office work—the business for which she considered she was best suited—but who added that she would readily go into an armament factory, if her work there would be of greater service. It should be pointed out that while many of the women have been offering to do "any sort of work" they are asked to state in the registration form—If they have ever done paid work before; if so, what; if not, what kind of work they are best suited for. They are asked also if they are prepared to be trained for work which they have not previously done; and, further, if they are free to work whole time or only part time, and to leave their homes for work if the pay is sufficient and the housing satisfactory.

WORK FOR A THOUSAND WOMEN.

If the women are available it is anticipated that they can easily be placed in employment, without prejudicing the position of the male operatives. The purpose of the scheme is double-edged—to make up for the loss of male labour caused by enlistments, and to meet the exceptional demand created by the war. There is a great dearth of machinists in shirtmaking factories, while there is also a demand for women for office work. These are occupations in which women could be placed immediately. The scarcity of labour, however, is most acutely felt in Glasgow in the engineering and armament works in which munitions of war are being turned out. Increased production in these factories could undoubtedly be brought about if women were engaged, and it is understood that a large proportion of the women who are now registering in Glasgow will be asked to undertake light machining work in those armament factories. A number of women are already employed in engineering works where shells and other explosives are being manufactured. The work allotted to them is usually to operate a turning lathe or other light machine, and they can become expert with very little training. It is stated that some of the women now employed were very adept at the work after only a fortnight's experience. It has been found that under the supervision of a few trained male mechanics they can turn out work very rapidly and very efficiently. Practically all the work in the making of a shrapnel shell can be done by women, while they can also assist very materially in the processes required to complete the heavier explosives used by howitzers. One large armament firm in the city, who have never previously employed women, have indicated from the Board. In view of the shortage existing and anticipated it was proposed to form a special register of women for war service, i.e., women able and free to take paid employment of any kind if called upon. It was hoped to find by this means women who had previously worked and had retired, or women capable of work, but not previously having worked. The Board of Trade requested the co-operation of the Scottish Women's Liberal Federation in the distribution of the forms for registration, and in any other way possible. In the form of registration which had been issued it was explained that women were wanted at once to work in the following, among other, occupations:—Farm work, dairy work, leather stitching, brush-making, clothing machining, and light machining for armament. Even if women had no special experience of this work they might register, as it might be possible to train them. It was further pointed out that as more men joined the forces more women would be required to work while they were away. It would be observed, Miss Younger added, that it was paid employment that was proposed. Although perhaps women did not all wish to be earning more money, they could use the money they earned in any way they liked, while one important point that must be borne in mind was that women registering did not for that reason oblige themselves to accept employment. They would be free to refuse the work offered if its nature and the pay and conditions were not considered satisfactory by them. Some people feared that more leisured women were being called upon to take work for which there were sufficient industrial women already. That, however, was not in the least intended. There were the registers at the Labour Exchange, and these registers would be used first. What was proposed was to obtain a reserve register for needs that would grow greater as time went on.

THE DEMAND FOR WORK.

Miss Irwin, of the Scottish Council for Women's Trades, in discussing the Government scheme, said that it appealed to her for three reasons. It gave women an opportunity to share in the service of the nation; it would tend to break down artificial barriers which had kept women out of employments and departments of employment for which they were not disqualified by nature; and she welcomed whatever would give women a healthier ideal in life and provide the discipline of serious training. They must, however, guard against the danger of flooding the labour market with half-trained, inefficient women. There was a double danger in this, for the circumstances of many women might enable them to take work at a lower rate of remuneration than the woman who was actually depending on her own earnings for her livelihood could afford to do. The half-trained dilettante woman might have also a serious effect in lowering the standard of national industrial efficiency.

At present there were over 1000 applications for employment from women and girls in Glasgow registered officially, and every day the Scottish Council for Women's Trades were receiving applications from women, many of whom were in destitute circumstances, and for whom no work could at present be found. The council's emergency workrooms were full continuously, and there was a long list of waiting applicants. The cases were brought to their notice by the Distress Committee. At present they were giving employment to 165 women, none of the cases arising out of the war. In addition there were large numbers of unemployed women who did not register officially. They would certainly insist on work being found for these women before posts were given to voluntary workers. Miss Irwin stated also that there were certain occupations in which there was what might be described as an abnormal shortage of labour at present, agriculture standing out conspicuously in the list. While certain branches of machining were enjoying what was undoubtedly a temporary abnormal activity, a serious situation might arise at the end of the present boom through over-staffing. Careful consideration would have to be given to the relative value of the existing activity compared with normal conditions.

[illegible] enrolment forms. A large number of women applied there in person, and from the particulars they supplied the following applications may be cited as showing the ages of those who have come forward and the variety of occupations for which they offer themselves:—Married: aged 24, qualified for omnibus conductor; aged 20, to learn motor-driving; aged 30, kinema actress; single: aged 22, aged 31, to learn motor-driving; aged 17, lift attendant; aged 27, bank clerk (previously teaching).

All these women, and most of the personal applicants at the central office, were women of education.

WHERE WOMEN MAY APPLY.

Miss Robinson, assistant secretary of the London Society for Women's Suffrage, 58, Victoria-street, Westminster, told a Standard representative that her society was about to open a special register for women of the middle class who "would not care to join a queue at a Labour Exchange." This society has provided work for several thousands of voluntary women helpers, and paid work for about 100, and is very glad that the Government has made this appeal. "We have had a register for volúntary workers since the war began," said Miss Robinson, "and we may say that fully 99 per cent. of the women whose names have been placed upon it have proved really useful workers. I met a girl yesterday who was enthusiastic about the Government scheme, but I know she is not the kind of girl who would care to go personally to a Labour Exchange. We want women to understand that in registering here they are not binding themselves to perform any kind of paid work which may be offered them. Nor are they to expect paid work at once. Women who want immediate employment can only be sent to the Labour Exchanges."

Women who want posts as "lap-dog combers" must not assume that the Government means to provide any woman who asks for it with well-paid employment. In very many industries preliminary training will be necessary; milkmaids are needed now, but amateur milkmaids would drive any farmer crazy. Middle-class women prepared to go anywhere in Great Britain, and do any work for which they are fitted, will be highly appreciated in two or three months' time if another million men or so are enlisted—that is the plain truth of the position.

Lady Askwith, wife of Sir George Askwith, has publicly announced her intention to register for war service. Women can quickly learn to turn cartridge-cases, a branch of the "munitions of war" industry, which is at the moment short of labour. In every branch of agriculture trained women's labour can be utilised. Women need not necessarily go to Labour Exchanges to enrol. About 250,000 forms will shortly be sent to the post offices for distribution to applicants.

In compliance with a request received from the Board of Trade Labour Exchange the executive committee of the National League for Opposing Woman Suffrage has consented to co-operate with the board in obtaining the services of women for war work and to urge the league's branches throughout the country to give their assistance.

The Women's Freedom League, while noting the "tardy recognition" by the Government of the value of women's work, demands that no trained woman employed in men's work be given less pay than that given to men; that some consideration be given when the war is over to the women who during the war have carried on this necessary work, and that, in case of training being required proper maintenance be given to the woman or girl while that training is going on.

The Standard,
March 20th. 1915.

7

WORKERS AND THE WAR.

NO STOPPAGE THROUGH DISPUTES.

ARBITRATION.

FULL AGREEMENT WITH TRADE UNIONS.

PROTECTION FOR MEN.

The conference between the representatives of the Government and the trade unions for the mobilisation of industrial work with a view to increasing the output of war munitions was resumed yesterday, and last night an important statement was issued by the Board of Trade, containing a memorandum of proposals to which the workmen's representatives had agreed

The following trades were represented:—Ironfounders, steel smelters, engineers, engineering, shipbuilding, electrical trades, blacksmiths, ironmoulders, cabinetmakers, steam engine makers, carpenters and joiners, patternmakers, transport workers, textile workers, boilermakers, shipconstructors, shipwrights, plumbers, gasworkers, general labourers, machine workers, woodcutting machinists, toolmakers, furnishing trades, house and ship painters and decorators, railwaymen, boot and shoe operatives, braziers and sheet metal workers, Scottish painters, light platers, and the Shipbuilding Trades Agreement Committee, the General Federation of Trade Unions, and the Parliamentary Committee of the Trade Union Congress.

THE PROPOSALS.

The proposals are as follows:—

1. During the war period there shall in no case be any stoppage of work upon munitions and equipments of war or other work required for a satisfactory completion of the war. All differences on wages or conditions of employment arising out of the war shall be dealt with without stoppage, in accordance with paragraph (2). Questions not arising out of the war should not be made the cause of stoppage during the war period.

2. Subject to any existing agreements or methods now prevailing for the settlement of disputes, differences of a purely individual or local character shall, unless mutually arranged, be the subject of a deputation to the firm representing the workmen concerned, and differences of a general character affecting wages and conditions of employment arising out of the war shall be the subject of conferences between the parties.

COMPULSORY ARBITRATION

In all cases of failure to reach a settlement of disputes by the parties directly concerned, or their representatives, or under existing agreements, the matter in dispute shall be dealt with under any one of the three following alternatives, as may be mutually agreed, or, in default of agreement, settled by the Board of Trade:—

(a) The Committee on Production.

(b) A single arbitrator agreed upon by the parties or appointed by the Board of Trade.

(c) A court of arbitration upon which labour is represented equally with the employers.

3. An Advisory Committee representative of the organised workers engaged in production for Government requirements shall be appointed by the Government for the purpose of facilitating the carrying out of these recommendations and for consultation by the Government on [illegible]

The New Statesman
March 20th. 1915.

The appeal of the Board of Trade to the unoccupied women of the middle and upper classes—for that is what it really amounts to—to enrol themselves for paid employment, in order both to increase the output of war supplies and to release men for enlistment, is in some ways the most striking development of the crisis. We have in this country probably a larger proportion of women without productive occupation—daughters in comfortable homes, spinsters on independent incomes, childless wives controlling domestic service in which they do not really share—than in any other nation in the world. It would be all to the good, now that both men and women of the manual working class are, with certain exceptions, once more fully employed, if, under patriotic impulse, these millions of unoccupied women could find opportunities for useful work, whether in manufacturing or in distribution, in professional nursing or in food production. But the difficulties are great. These unoccupied women know nothing of the Labour Exchanges. A universal census of available unoccupied women, on the lines of that successfully carried out for men by the Parliamentary Recruiting Committee, would probably be a more effective way of getting hold of them. And then they will need training. The Board of Trade must see to it that they get proper wages, quick technical education, and all the direction that is possible. Any direct substitution of women for men is a ticklish business—employers will be quick to jump at cheap labour. Moreover, there are still some forty or fifty thousand wage-earning women out of work, who must have the first claim to vacancies and to any training that is offered. Still, the women to whom society has hitherto denied an opportunity have also their rights. It is a splendid chance for daughters eating their hearts out at home, who have been so far unable to overcome the prejudices of parental gentility.

Eastern Daily Press, Mar: 20th 1915

THE CALL TO WOMEN.

To the Editor.

Dear Sir—I was very glad to see the appeal made by the Board of Trade to all women—skilled and unskilled—desirous of helping their country in her need.

I hope the response will be instant and great. Are we women doing our share? Nobly and ungrudgingly we are giving our men-folk. Can we not turn to and set other men, that our soldiers' lives may not be sacrificed simply owing to the fewness of their numbers? Had I my way, there should be—as long as the war lasts—no men in shops except those unfit for service, few in rural railway stations, banks, and offices.

The postman who calls here is, in appearance at least, fit for military service; so are the baker's, butcher's, and grocer's representatives. Why not substitute women for them, and let them do their duty when and where most wanted?

There would be dislocation at first, of course, confusion, and on the part of selfish people great complaint; but if by so doing we could bring the successful issue of the war but a few days nearer, in my opinion it would be worth while.

I believe the last census showed an excess of some three million females. The next will probably show a greater, and it is no time for women, whether old, young, rich, or poor, to consider their pride, comfort, the conventions or any thing else, if they can do the least thing to help their country.

Very many are helping grandly, but there are more than a few even now who think because they sit in their comfortable homes and knit mufflers or fare forth once a week on light duties at the nearest Red Cross Hospital, they are doing all that could be required of them. They are not. It is time they awoke to the fact.—Yours truly,

A NORFOLK WOMAN.

March 18th.

parties or appointed by the Board of Trade.

(c) A court of arbitration upon which labour is represented equally with the employers.

3. An Advisory Committee representative of the organised workers engaged in production for Government requirements shall be appointed by the Government for the purpose of facilitating the carrying out of these recommendations and for consultation by the Government or by the workmen concerned.

4. Provided that the conditions set out in paragraph 5 are accepted by the Government as applicable to all contracts for the execution of war munitions and equipments, the workmen's representatives at the conference are of opinion that during the war period the relaxation of the present practices is imperative, and that each union be recommended to take into favourable consideration such changes in working conditions or trade customs as may be necessary with a view to accelerating the output of war munitions or equipments.

UNIONS PROTECTED.

5. The recommendations contained in paragraph (4) are conditional on Government requiring all contractors and subcontractors engaged on munitions and equipments of war or other work required for the satisfactory completion of the war to give an undertaking to the following effect:—

Any departure during the war from the practices ruling in our workshops, shipyards, and other industries prior to the war shall only be for the period of the war. No change in practice made during the war shall be allowed to prejudice the position of the workpeople in our employment or of their trade unions in regard to the resumption and maintenance after the war of any rules or customs existing prior to the war. In any readjustment of staff which may have to be effected after the war priority of employment will be given to workmen in our employment at the beginning of the war who are serving with the colours or who are now in our employment.

Where the custom of a shop is changed during the war by the introduction of semi-skilled men to perform work hitherto performed by a class of workmen of higher skill the rates paid shall be the usual rates of the district for that class of work.

FEMALE LABOUR.

The relaxation of existing demarcation restrictions or admission of semi-skilled or female labour shall not affect adversely the rates customarily paid for the job. In cases where men who ordinarily do the work are adversely affected thereby the necessary readjustments shall be made so that they can maintain their previous earnings.

A record of the nature of the departure from the conditions prevailing before the date of this undertaking shall be kept, and shall be open for inspection by the authorised representative of the Government.

P.T.O.

Due notice shall be given to the workmen concerned wherever practicable of any change of working conditions which it is desired to introduce as the result of this arrangement and opportunity of local consultation with men or their representatives shall be given if desired. All differences with our workmen engaged on Government work arising out of changes so introduced, or with regard to wages or conditions of employment arising out of the war, shall be settled without stoppage of work in accordance with the procedure laid down in paragraph (2).

It is clearly understood that, except as expressly provided in the fourth paragraph of Clause 5, nothing in this undertaking is to prejudice the position of employers or employees after the war. (Signed)

D. LLOYD GEORGE,
WALTER RUNCIMAN,
ARTHUR HENDERSON
(Chairman of Workmen's Representatives),
WILLIAM MOSSES
(Secretary of Workmen's Representatives).

SLACKERS TO SUFFER.

The district secretaries of all unions embraced in the Engineering and Shipbuilding Trades Federation have been advised from their head offices to keep a close watch on the records of individual members, with a view to drastic measures being taken against those who wilfully neglect work, and so disorganise production in shipbuilding or engineering establishments.

For the convenience of the workmen engaged at Woolwich Arsenal and Dockyard the London County Council is to provide additional trailer cars on the Woolwich route of their tramway system.

LONDON DOCK STRIKE.

MANY SHIPS FOR OVERSEAS DETAINED.

The principal feature of the dispute between certain London shipping firms and the stevedores yesterday was the consent of the Canadian Pacific Railway to accept the men's agreement with the Master Stevedores' Association. The stevedores believe the decision of the Canadian Pacific Railway will speedily induce the other companies to come to a similar decision. On the other hand, the stevedores employed by the Ellerman Line were informed that the company would not continue to pay the bonus. About 50 men thereupon ceased work. Altogether over 1500 stevedores are on strike.

A meeting of shipowners affected by the stevedores' strike was held yesterday, and adjourned without coming to a decision. A conference is to be held at the Board of Trade Offices to-day.

About a dozen ships are held up in the Victoria and Albert Docks. Most of them are outward bound, and the cargoes they are ready to load are of a general description for export to the Oversea Dominions. There was considerable congestion at the docks before this dispute, but matters have now become far worse, and a great deal of inconvenience is being caused.

There is no development in the dockers' dispute with the Port of London Authority. The Dockers' Union have written to the authority asking them if they are prepared to submit the question of the war bonus to arbitration. The authority are now paying a bonus of 6d a day, but the men demand 2d an hour. Shipping companies and wharfingers have agreed to fall into line if the matter is arbitrated upon. The men complain that the P.L.A.'s toria and Albert Docks. Most of the outward bound, and the cargoes they are ready to load are of a general description for export to the Oversea Dominions. There was considerable congestion at the docks before this dispute, but matters have now become far worse, and a great deal of inconvenience is being caused.

There is no development in the dockers' dispute with the Port of London Authority. The Dockers' Union have written to the authority asking them if they are prepared to submit the question of the war bonus to arbitration. The authority are now paying a bonus of 6d a day, but the men demand 2d. an hour. Shipping companies and wharfingers have agreed to fall into line if the matter is arbitrated upon. The men complain that the P.L.A.'s bonus is smaller than that being paid by any other port authority in the country.

INDUSTRY'S NEW BASIS.

A conference arranged by the Institute of Industry and Science of Great Britain and Ireland is to be held at the Mansion House on Thursday "to discuss the working conditions in which British industry at present operates" and consider a new basis. Among those who have accepted invitations to be present are the Earl of Portsmouth, Lord Kinnaird, Sir Boverton Redwood, Sir James Heath, Sir Philip Magnus, M.P., Sir Alexander Pedler, Lieut.-Colonel Sir D. Prain, Sir Charles Behrens, Sir John Brickwood, Sir John Taverner, Hon. Sir John McCall, M.D. (Agent-General for Tasmania), Hon. T. Mackenzie (High Commissioner for New Zealand), Hon. John Howard (Agent-General for Nova Scotia), Hon. E. H. Turnbull (Agent-General for New Brunswick), Hon. Richard Reid (Agent-General for Ontario), and Lieut.-Colonel P. Pelletier (Agent-General for Quebec).

The Birmingham Distress Committee proposes to provide for 600 more Belgian skilled gunmakers. The movement, it was stated at a meeting of the committee yesterday, has the support of the Government and Labour Bureau.

FIGHTING IN MEXICO.

BRITISH PROTEST AGAINST WAR LEVY.

WASHINGTON, March 18.

The British Embassy has asked the State Department to protest against General Villa's levy of £100,000 on foreigners in Monterey. The Light Power Company there, which is owned by British capital, is taxed £3500.

Fighting started yesterday at Bano, an important oil centre west of Tampico. General Villa's forces outnumbered those of General Carranza, although the latter were strongly entrenched.—Reuter.

HUN ATROCITIES.

(From the Official Press Bureau.)

It has been brought to the notice of his Majesty's Government that a statement has appeared in the Press of a neutral country to the effect that the American Ambassador in London has been informed by his Majesty's Government that the accounts given by Belgian refugees with regard to atrocities committed by German soldiers must be attributed to hysteria or preconceived ideas. It is further alleged that the American Ambassador has sent a report to Washington on the subject. His Majesty's Government desire, after communication with the American Ambassador, to place on record that there is no truth in the statements in question.

Sir Arthur Conan Doyle is to give a lecture entitled "Great Battles of the War, Told in Detail for the First Time," in the Queen's Hall this afternoon. The Lord Chancellor will preside.

Manchester Guardian, March 20th. 1915.

663/36

663

WAR SERVICE FOR WOMEN

REPLY TO THE GOVERNMENT'S APPEAL.

"THE ONE THING CLEAR."

LONDON, FRIDAY NIGHT.

The Government's proposal for registering the available women workers has met with a varying response, but the one thing clear in the minds of all women one meets (writes a London representative of the "Manchester Guardian") is that if women are to do men's work they must be paid men's wages. Another impression one gets is that the suggestion is not taken very seriously, but is regarded as tentative rather than as immediately practical, and in one quarter at least it was suggested that it was merely put forward to spur the men to greater diligence.

One of the societies most deeply interested is the Women's Emergency Corps. "The Government is eight months behind us," said Mrs. Falk, the secretary. "Within the first fortnight after war was declared we had registered the names of ten thousand women anxious for voluntary or paid work, and had classified their qualifications. They were ready then to step into employments, and so set men free to serve, and they would have helped in any other way. There was nothing they would not have attempted. It is not very clear what the Government wants now. The number of factory workers unemployed is fairly stable, and the Government knows it. What the Government does not know and we do is the extent of the reserve—the former workers who have married and the women who have never worked for money but are willing to do so. We would like to see all the women of the country employed in all sorts of work, but always at men's wages. We can supply women for any post, but we will not supply any voluntary worker for what should be paid posts or any women for under-paid work. There is an enormous number of women who would take the place of taxi-drivers or drivers of other vehicles. They are ready for rough work, too, and if the need arose would go into factories; but I think there would then be class trouble with the ordinary factory hands, and probably our women would be more successful with the lighter forms of farm work. My opinion is that these women would do their best work as independent units. They have initiative and intelligence, and could do good work without supervision. There are battalions of such women ready to come forward. We hear of them from all parts of the kingdom."

Women Want to Fill Shells.

The Emergency Corps runs a Board of Trade Labour Exchange, where ever since September 1 paid workers have registered themselves. There I was told that a number of applications had been received in answer to the Government's statement, and, curiously, the majority of women, whether clerks or nurses or factory girls, wanted employment in ammunition factories. They had evidently been deeply impressed by Lord Kitchener's statement, and thought this the best way to serve their country. Two ladies engaged in social work were anxious to give their services in some ammunition factory, and an inquiry had been received from one mistress whose maid was anxious to fill cartridges of shrapnel shells. "If you think she is really needed," said the mistress anxiously, "I'll let her go, but she is the only maid I have." There has been some idea that the women registering their names would by that act virtually enlist, and that they might be called up at any moment to go to any part of the country, an idea that probably appealed very strongly to the patriotic; but, of course, the fact of registering does not commit them to taking any work. The question of wages is never settled by the Labour Exchanges. It is a matter for the employer to decide. But it is supposed that women will receive the same wages as the men whose places they fill.

Three points of interest were these—that few working women in London offer for agricultural work, that women up to 50 years of age or more are offering their services and will be accepted, and that the conditions of women's employment have improved immensely since Christmas. Old workshops are reopening and trade is recovering its normal tone.

Continuance of Employment.

Miss Eva Gore-Booth found the new proposal very amusing. The men had always said that women were not physically strong enough to do men's work, and now, to prove how little they had really believed it, they were asking women to come forward and take the places of the fittest men. The idea on the whole was good. She had always wanted the many new occupations for which they were perfectly well fitted to be thrown open to women, and it was to be hoped that this would result in permanent benefit. But it would take time. Women could not be trained in a minute for new work. It was essential that they should receive the same wages as men, and it was to be hoped the trade unions would see to that. Also it was desirable that they should be guaranteed continuance of occupation. The dislocation of industry would in any case be enormous, but it would be pitiable if women were to be thrown out of work at the end of the war. At the same time Miss Gore-Booth hoped that the fact that women could efficiently fill men's places would not be used to force men to enlist.

Inquiries at the Central Bureau for the Employment of Women seemed to indicate that women of the professional classes will not be affected much by the Government's plans, but that these will chiefly concern the clients of the Labour Exchanges. At the beginning of the war hundreds of trained professional workers were unemployed, and were available for new employment, but since Christmas there has been an increasing demand for their services, and, though if it were a case of real emergency many of these would do any sort of work the country demanded, they will probably remain content with private employment.

A GREAT OPPORTUNITY.

WOMEN SUFFRAGISTS AND THE SCHEME.

Amongst the somewhat suspicious Labour view of the drafting of women into men's occupations, it must be said that women suffragists are inclined to welcome it as a great opportunity for women. In conversation with a representative of the "Manchester Guardian" Mrs. Fawcett, President of the National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies, presented this view very clearly.

"This step," she said, "was urged on the Government by the National Union quite early in the war, and our only regret is that it was not taken sooner so that women could have had more training and more preparation. We hope that the Government will make a great effort to be fair, and will open not only industrial occupations but also Civil Service appointments to women. We must be firm about asking for proper pay for women. They must not undercut the men. This measure will make a great difference to women in industrial and professional employment."

Our representative put to Mrs. Fawcett some of the objections which had been raised by organised Labour. She agreed that guarantees of reinstatement for the men after the war would be very dijcult to carry out. "But," she said, "from the national point of view, if you increase the productive power of the nation you increase the wealth of the nation. It cannot pay to keep half the nation unproductive, although," she said by way of qualification, "it would not be accurate to describe the household work of working-class women as unproductive, although it is unpaid."

A Comparison with France.

Mrrs. Fawcett made a very interesting comparison between the work of women in England and France, where, according to some observers, the slaughter of men in the Napoleonic wars made large openings for women that had before been exclusively men's work. "In France," she said, "there are a great number of women employed both in agriculture and business. I have been told that that dates from the Napoleonic wars. After those wars France was so drained of men that she had no choice but to encourage the employment of women. Many of the largest French businesses are now in the hands of women.

"The points we are particularly insisting upon in this matter," continued Mrs. Fawcett, "are good pay, education, training, and, in the case of agricultural employment, very great care as to housing.

"I feel personally that there are many departments of army work, what one may call the domestic departments of the army administration, which could be much better managed by women, or at all events with the assistance of women. There is the waste of food and clothing in the camps, and the often faulty arrangements for billeting. Such work could be better done not perhaps entirely by women, but with the advice and assistance of women."

Reverting to the criticisms of the trade unions on the Board of Trade's scheme, Mrs. Fawcett said: "This is such an exceptionally important crisis in the history of the nation that we are bound to utilise every kind of national strength that we have. And, after all, men have the self-protection which the franchise gives, and we have not. I think it will bring it home to the nation that if women are capable of rendering this national service they ought also to have the protection which comes from the Parliamentary vote."

Morning Post, March 20th 1915.

WORK FOR WOMEN SCHEME.

THE TRAINING PROBLEM.

The Board of Trade Scheme for employing women in industries where the number of workmen has been depleted by the war and in trades where men could be released for military service has created considerable interest throughout the country. Information which has reached the Central Labour Exchange offices, Queen Anne's Chambers, Westminster, show that numerous inquiries are being made at the Labour Exchanges throughout the country. Yesterday morning four thousand applications for the forms to be filled in by those desiring employment were received by the first post at the Central Offices. About a thousand women in London have already applied for forms. It is not yet possible to indicate the nature of the employment the women desire, as the applications have not yet been classified. The Board of Trade will not make a statement as to the result of the appeal until the lapse of a fortnight. By that time the department will be in a position to indicate the number of women who are available for war service and the nature of the employment they would like to obtain.

It is obvious that for the scheme to be successful employers must come forward with their demands, and women must undergo a certain amount of training to fit them for the work offered. The co-operation of employers is essential, otherwise it would be impossible for the Board of Trade to know what the anticipated demand for labour is likely to be. It is pointed out that the scheme for utilising women to do the work of men could be assisted if employers who expected large contracts informed the Board of Trade. The department might then endeavour to find women with suitable experience, and it is possible that they could be trained so that they could be ready when they were wanted. As to training, there are two courses open. Employers themselves might undertake to train women for certain kinds of work, or the Board of Trade might find it necessary to apply to the Treasury for a grant for this purpose. In certain branches of commerce in France the problem of employing women has been solved. Women who are the wives of men and the mothers of sons now at the front have taken their places in grocers' shops. Similar arrangements are being made in the restaurants and cafés, where women are taking the places of their husbands and sons.

THE TRADE UNION ATTITUDE.

Several Trade Union leaders have taken up a critical attitude towards the scheme. It is not that they object to women doing men's work during a national crisis. They realise that if the Germans are to be beaten adequate forces of fighting men must be raised in this country, and that Labour must make sacrifices. What they fear is that once women are trained to do work hitherto done by men employers may not re-engage the men when the war is over. They suggest that men who enlist, and whose places are filled by women, should be given a guarantee that they can go back to their old positions after they are discharged from military service. Any difficulty of this sort could be avoided by a definite understanding among the three parties concerned—the employer, the woman who has agreed to work for him, and the man who, released from work, has gone to fight for his country.

WOMEN AND FARM LABOUR.

A deputation of the Workers' War Emergency Committee, a central body representing the whole of the Trade Union bodies, has waited upon Sir Harry Verney (Parliamentary Secretary of the Board of Agriculture) and Sir Sydney Olivier (Permanent Secretary) in connection with the work for women scheme. The Board of Agriculture accepts joint responsibility with the Board of Trade for the scheme. A series of consultations has been arranged between the local branches of the Farmers' Union and the local Chambers of Agriculture. Board of Trade officials will attend these conferences and furnish the farmers with detailed information as to the available supplies of female labour registered at the Labour Exchanges. The official view is that the employment of women is the only alternative to child labour on farms.

In compliance with a request received from the Board of Trade Labour Exchange, the Executive Committee of the National League for Opposing Woman Suffrage has consented to co-operate with the Board of Trade in obtaining the services of women for war work and to urge the League's branches throughout the country to give their assistance.

The Times,
March 20th 1915.

WOMEN'S WORK FOR WAR.

NEW INDUSTRIAL ARMY.

OVER 6,300 APPLICANTS.

There was a gratifying accession yesterday to the ranks of the women who are ready to enrol for war service. The first day brought some 700 applicants to the Central Labour Exchange. The first post yesterday brought the number up to 4,000, and succeeding posts delivered letters in batches varying from 50 to 250, till before the close of the day the figures had risen to about 5,000. In addition 1,300 applications were registered at the district exchanges of London. This does not take account of the applications made to the 400 labour exchanges in the country, of which no returns have yet been received.

Throughout the day, as on the first day, there was a steady procession of callers. They were all sorts and conditions of women, although the great majority appeared to be ladies in a comfortable position of life, all animated by the one desire to be of service. The letters were from women of almost all ranks. One was from Queen's-gate, and another was dated from a country manor house. A number were from rectories and vicarages; others came from officers' widows, and wives of officers at the front. Many women had been engaged in teaching, while others had followed humbler vocations. Quite a number of the writers failed to state whether they were married women or spinsters, but it appeared nevertheless that a large proportion of the applications, probably 50 per cent., were from married women. Another interesting feature was the number of women who, while ready to be of service, wanted direction as to the kind of work which they should perform. Others, however, had very definite ideas.

To a considerable number of women the call of the land for labour had made eloquent appeal. In some cases these said they had had previous agricultural experience. A larger number had not done such work before, but being interested in gardening, offered their services. The Central Labour Exchange have had requests for female gardeners to replace male gardeners. It is stated that there will be no difficulty in complying with that request. There was quite a satisfactory proportion of girls who wanted to go into armament works.

The exchange have had a few inquiries from employers, but so far only a few, hotel-keepers and the like. It is obvious that the department will have to take in hand the problem of classifying the women, together with the more serious question of training, and then take steps to bring the scheme in some direct and systematic way before employers. As has been formerly stated, everything depends on the spirit in which it is taken up by them.

WOMEN FOR FARM WORK.

THE CUSTOM IN SCOTTISH COUNTIES.

The progress of the Board of Trade scheme for mobilizing women workers is being followed with interest in rural districts. The response to the promise of employment has been encouraging as far as numbers are concerned. In all probability not more than a small proportion have had previous experience of the work they will be asked to undertake, but willing learners will readily adapt themselves to the duties required of them.

In her letter to The Times of January 19 Lady Castlereagh (now Lady Londonderry) referred to the Lowlands of Scotland for an example of the efficient employment of women on the land. It might assist the progress of the movement instituted by the Board of Trade, as well as that mentioned by the Duchess of Marlborough in The Times of yesterday, if inquiries were made into the conditions under which women work in the Lothians and the Border counties of Scotland, particular attention being paid to the nature of the work, which, of course, would vary with the season, earnings, and modes of living. The standard where regular employment obtains

Daily News & Leader,
March 20th 1915.

WAR WORK FOR WOMEN.

Labour Disputes, Hours and Wages.

(To the Editor.)

Sir,—The Government's proposal in regard to the registration of women for War Service is a most important departure which may develop into a form of industrial conscription for women. I take it that those women who register as willing to perform various services can be called up for service, as the men were who filled up the army forms signifying their willingness to enlist. So important is the situation for women that it seems imperative that a National Conference of women's Trade Unions and political and social organisations should be called at once with a view to formulating demands. Such proposals as the following would be discussed:

1. That in view of the fact that the Government will at once become overwhelmingly the largest and perhaps eventually almost the sole employer of labour, with more extensive power for controlling labour than any private employer has ever had, it is imperative that the Parliamentary vote should at once be extended to women, in order that they may have the same power that men have in influencing the Government which controls their labour; otherwise the new industrial conscription will be an unjustifiable tyranny where women are concerned.

2. That as the Government proposes that all Labour disputes shall be referred to a tribunal nominated by the Government, women shall have strong representation on this tribunal, and in all disputes in regard to women's employment a woman of standing and experience (the nation has many such to draw upon) shall be the chairman of the tribunal, or in the case of the appointment of a sole arbiter, a woman shall be the arbiter of the dispute.

3. That where a woman is employed on work hitherto done by men, she shall receive the wage hitherto paid to men, in addition to any war bonus or increase in wages which might have been paid for the work now, in the case of men employees. That in no case shall an unskilled woman be employed at a lower wage than the current wage of a man unskilled labourer.

4. That proper safeguards in regard to hours, wages, and conditions be arranged in conjunction with representatives of the women concerned, and that no woman shall be compelled to work under conditions which the representative of the organisation to which she belongs reports to be unsatisfactory.

It is vitally important that some such regulations should be adopted by the women's organisations in order that the position of the women concerned may be safeguarded, and that the introduction of women into the labour market may not so vitally lower the standard of livelihood for the working classes as to become a national disaster.

It is hoped that the various women's organisations will sink their differences at this juncture and realise that their most patriotic duty as women is to safeguard the interests of the women of the nation.

E. SYLVIA PANKHURST.

March 18.

663/37 663.

Morning Post,
March 20th. 1915.

WOMEN AND THE WAR.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE MORNING POST.

SIR,—In this great national emergency the Government has called upon the women of this country to state whether they are willing to be employed in such a manner as will set men free to fight or set them free for labour which is necessarily male labour and essential for the highest efficiency of the industrial service of the country in time of war.

Now, there must be thousands and tens of thousands of women like myself who, through a labyrinth of custom and helplessness and ignorance, are trying to see their way clearly to their duty to their country. Picture for a moment such towns as Cheltenham, Bath, Bedford, Southsea. These are non-manufacturing centres, and in the miles and miles of villas there are thousands of women employed in ministering to the comforts of a few hundred women and children. There is hearty, healthy material in those domestic servants, but they are extraordinarily hard to rouse to unselfish effort for their country. If the Labour Exchanges could obtain even one-half the women employed in polishing silver, making beds, and brushing their mistress's clothes they would have large numbers of skilful hands for "light machine work for armaments," and the countless villas would hold busier women, but women who represented economy of labour instead of its wastage. Yet I venture to think that in nine cases out of ten the mistress of a house would read the Board of Trade appeal to deaf ears.

We know that all classes of men are represented in the New Army, and it follows that all classes of women should be represented in the forces of labour which the Government wishes to organise. Gentlewomen are giving a vast amount of voluntary work at present; no one can be ignorant of this fact who knows something of what is being done for soldiers' and sailors' wives and families, and for Belgians, and for all who are destitute and distressed, but in most towns there are still scores of strong young Englishwomen whose energy overflows into hockey and golf. Girls who have health to play hockey and golf and leisure to give to such games have health and strength and leisure that might well be organised and employed now with a view to the pressure that is coming presently with regard to agricultural work. Not willingly would we of the educated classes see our girls go forth to rough it, leaving the home circle and its safeguards, to be billeted in villages, but the fact remains that necessity knows no law, and if strong, healthy, and intelligent though unskilled labour is necessary this summer for our harvest the material is to be found in its thousands among the class I have indicated.

The mothers of every class are tied to their homes for various reasons, but where there are means to keep up a large establishment there is no valid reason why the accommodation and resources of such an establishment should not be commandeered for crèches, where little children might be left during working hours, provided that the Labour Exchange guaranteed the bona fides employment of their natural guardians in national emergency service. Nor, indeed, is there any reason why at a pinch the kitchen of a big country house should not be the kitchen of a community in harvest time, if such economy of domestic labour should prove a valuable aid in agricultural crisis.

Then take my own case: a married woman, without children, whose husband is on service. Handicapped by delicate health, and restricted by small means, and obliged to live where I have a cottage in a country district, how am I to answer the questions of the Board of Trade? Alas for feminine pretensions, we are the lesser sex when it comes to adaptability! While from every profession and trade men are joining the Army I remain in the restricted sphere of domestic and literary work. There must be a million like me.

But, nevertheless, I would advise all women to answer the questions set forth and leave the selection of the fittest to authority. And I would fain urge upon them to abstain from volunteering unpaid labour in this matter. Let all subject themselves to the test of being worthy of their hire.—Yours, &c.,

March 19. AN AUTHOR.

East Anglian Times, March 20th. 1915.

WAR WORK FOR WOMEN.

NO DEMAND YET IN SUFFOLK.

To assist their effort to secure more men for the fighting line and for the production of munitions of war, the Government have issued an appeal to the women of the country to register themselves as willing to take up such work as they can do, but which, up to the present, has remained outside their sphere. By doing this they will enable more men to be drafted into the more direct service of the State. Men will still be required for the bulk of the work attaching to the manufacture of munitions of war, but there are many phases even of this manufacture that are well within the ability of women to carry out.

With regard to the important matter of food supply, it is acknowledged that women can make themselves of the greatest possible use. To give a few instances of farming operations in which women can be of service, there is stone picking, singling roots, weeding all kinds of corn in season, pea-picking, strawberry and small fruit picking, cabbage planting, assisting in haysel and harvest work, milking and tending stock, etc. Then again women could well take the places of many men at present engaged in shops or offices. It is true that in many cases some training would be necessary, but this could be as easily got over as it has already been done in connection with light armament work. There are ways almost innumerable in which women can help their country by releasing men for other work.

It is estimated that there are 7,000,000 working women and girls in the United Kingdom. According to the last census in 1911 there were 5,854,000 females over ten years af age who are wage earners in England and Wales alone. Of them over 1,250,000 are domestic servants, 372,834 in the cotton trade, 333,129 in dressmaking, and 211,183 in the teaching profession.

What the Board of Trade is aiming at now is to register as far as possible the number of women willing to undertake paid labour of any kind and to assort the qualifications. No woman is, of course, committed to anything by registering her name. When work is offered to her she can decide whether she will take it or not, and it is hoped that this, with the vigilance of women's organisations, will prevent women being exploited by being paid low wages. The Board of Trade attaches very great importance to the employer undertaking to keep men's places open for them. This will have the double effect of encouraging men to enlist and avoid the permanent displacement of men by women after the war is over.

Already large numbers of women all over the country have registered. At the Ipswich Exchange a number of women, many of them in employment, have intimated their willingness to assist, the majority of them machinists, willing to tend any machine they are capable of looking after. As yet, however, the new scheme has not become sufficiently known, but when it has there is no doubt the Government will have plenty of offers of assistance from the women of Suffolk, who are quite eager to do their share in this great emergency. So far Suffolk employers have not been asking for female labour, but with the shortage of labour that is bound to come sooner or later they will have in the present scheme a valuable source from which to draw.

The Leicester Post, March 20th. 1915.

THE MOBILISATION OF WOMEN'S LABOUR.

Mr. Percy Alden is to explain the Government proposals for mobilising women's labour at the meeting which the Women's Emergency Corps is holding at His Majesty's Theatre on Tuesday. The meeting was arranged some time ago in aid of the funds for a canteen at the front and the multiform activities of the Corps at home; but the new development will, I am told, receive most attention from the speakers, who include Lord Charles Beresford, Prebendary Carlisle, Miss Compton, and Miss Decima Moore, the Duchess of Marlborough presiding. On the whole, the tendency among the women's organisations is to welcome the Board of Trade circular as a recognition of the status of women in the industrial field, but misgivings are entertained on some of the details. It is not quite certain to what extent it is proposed to introduce into the labour market women who are not ordinarily wage-earners. According to Miss Macarthur, there are at least fifty thousand unemployed women workers in the country, and it is felt that every effort should be made to utilise their labour before calling on the economically independent. The question of the wages to be paid is exciting interest in the trade unions.

The Cambrian, March 20th. 1915.

WORK FOR WOMEN.

IMPORTANT GOVERNMENT SCHEME

TO RELEASE MEN FOR ACTIVE SERVICE.

The Board of Trade, on behalf of the Government, have been at work on the problem of women's help in the war, and have now framed a scheme with a view to dealing with it. The scope and character of it is set out in the following official statement:—

War Service for Women.

The President of the Board of Trade wishes to call attention to the fact that in the present emergency, if the full fighting power of the nation is to be put forth on the field of battle, the full working power of the nation must be made available to carry on its essential trades at home. Already, in certain important occupations there are not enough men and women to do the work. This shortage will shortly spread to other occupations as more and more men join the fighting forces.

In order to meet both the present and the future needs of national industry during the war, the Government wish to obtain particulars of the women available, with or without previous training, for paid employment. Accordingly, they invite all women who are prepared, if needed, to Take paid employment of any kind —industrial, agricultural, clerical, etc.—to enter themselves upon the Register of Women for War Service which is being prepared by the Board of Trade Labour Exchanges.

Any woman living in a town where there is a Labour Exchange can register by going there in person. If she is not near a Labour Exchange she can get a form of registration from the local agency of the Unemployment Fund. Forms will also be sent out through a number of women's societies.

The object of registration is to find out what reserve force of women's labour, trained or untrained, can be made available if required. As from time to time actual openings for employment present themselves, notice will be given through the Labour Exchanges, with full details as to the nature of work, conditions, and pay, and, so far as special training is necessary, arrangements will, if possible, be made for the purpose.

Any woman who by working

Helps to release a man or to equip a man for fighting does national war service. Every woman should register who is willing to take employment.

Daily News & Leader, March 20th. 1915.

WOMEN'S WAR SERVICE.

Suffragists Ask for Guarantees and the Vote.

The Women's Freedom League, in welcoming the recognition of women's work given by the Government in their registration scheme, demand the following guarantees:

That no trained woman employed in men's work be given less pay than that given to men.

That some consideration be given when the war is over to the women who, during the war, have carried on this necessary work.

That, in case of training being required, proper maintenance be given to the woman or girl while that training is going on.

This is an opportune moment, they declare, for the Government to guarantee that, before they leave office, they will bring before the House of Commons a measure for the political enfranchisement of women.

The United Suffragists also call upon the Government to pass a non-party measure of woman suffrage at the earliest possible opportunity, and insist that every woman who responds to this national appeal and [illegible] work shall be paid a [illegible]

663/38 663.

Daily Chronicle, March 20th. 1915.

"WAR SERVICE FOR WOMEN."

To the Editor Daily Chronicle.

Sir,—As a woman who has volunteered for any service in which a knowledge of metal work may be of use, may I be allowed to protest against the remarks of Mr. Mallon, of the Anti-Sweating League, in your issue of to-day? Mr. Mallon does not seem to realise that these are not ordinary times. To talk of "class distinctions" now, and to say that the "refined dressmaker" would greatly resent working with the armament girl because, though a "good sort," she is "rough in her ways" is surely too absurd in these days when the Harrow boy and the roughest Tommy are united in the closest bonds of brotherhood against our common foe. Women are learning many lessons nowadays, and every thinking woman must rejoice if the Government realises that we too can actively serve our country. Let educated women leave knitting and shirt making to the "refined dressmakers," and train to be of some special use in this national emergency. The recent experiment at Toynbee Hall in training unemployed and even elderly men in the furniture trades to earn good wages at rivetting and leather work, shows that much can be done even with a few weeks training at a new trade.

March 19, 1915. WOMAN WORKER.

"WOMEN WAR WORKERS."

To the Editor Daily Chronicle.

Sir,—The advertisement of the President of the Board of Trade in to day's public Press makes interesting reading So interesting indeed that I have to-day been moved to write to him on the subject, though, doubtless, my letter will meet with the fate of thousands of its fellows on the same subject.

Women war workers are wanted. Good. The President of the Board of Trade should obtain from the War Office the number of firms who have been asked to tender for women's work, and the number of firms to whom contracts have been allocated. He should then compare the figures, through a trades directory, with the number of firms who, despite repeated applications made through every possible channel, have been given no opportun ty of tendering, and all of whom have skilled labour ready and willing. His directory would also inform him of the number of firms or individuals who have obtained contracts, but who have no workshop. These contractors have, of course, sublet the work, or else have put it out to the East End at sweated rates.

Surely, besides being instructive, the result will give us a good idea of the business capacities of the men at the helm. BUSINESS.

Hither Green, S.E., March 18, 1915.

The Yorkshire Post, March 20th. 1915.

The women's societies favourable to the Government's scheme for establishing an industrial reserve of women workers will require to be on their guard against the plan being hedged in with restrictions in the interests of the great trade unions that have the ear of the Ministry. The national Labour leaders are inclined to regard the scheme as an attempt to force down men's wages, and the anti-militarists fear that it may bring about something like compulsory military service by hastening the discharge from employment of all men of age for the Army. These two sections are combining to make representations against any scheme so ambitious as that outlined by the President of the Board of Trade, and if the Government are desired to make a stand against this alliance, it is necessary that they should have immediate indications of the extent to which they can rely on the support of representative organisations anxious to have the scheme worked free from the restrictions desired by trade unions.

The Liverpool Post
March 20th. 1915.

WOMEN'S WORK FOR WAR.

MANY ANXIOUS TO HELP IN LIVERPOOL.

The Government's call to women to help has led to many inquiries in Liverpool. Women of all classes have been anxious to hear what they can do, and they are willing temporarily to forsake the domestic circle either to help in the manufacture of war necessities, or to release men workers for the Army.

So far it would appear that the scheme is merely in an experimental stage. A Governmental official visited the city the other day and made a preliminary survey of the possible demand for the supply of these industrial volunteers, with what result is not known.

Labour exchanges have been furnished with forms, on which applicants for these duties have to give particulars about themselves, but this represents all that has been done up to the present.

From inquiries one gathers that the project is welcomed amongst Liverpool women workers, and especially do they commend the virtual offer of the authorities to train inexperienced women, especially for such diverse duties as agriculture and military clothing. Whether there are Liverpool concerns which need their assistance is not clear, but it is probable that the city can enrol a small force of women willing to go to some town where their services would be valued, provided the pay and the conditions were satisfactory.

The Government's call is not merely to the woman who is ordinarily in employment; what is wanted is women who can widen the source of supply, and this will be done chiefly by the volunteering of married women, and more especially those who were in works or offices before they took up management on their own account—in the home.

Women are urged to come forward even if they can work for half-days only. Every little will help in the great task of finding men and material for the front.

No doubt these openings will appeal particularly to the soldiers' and sailors' wives, who will thus be able to add a useful supplement to their separation allowances, and also have an interest which may serve to relieve them of anxiety and too much brooding.

The Northern Echo,
March 20th. 1915.

Women Workers.

Already in Newcastle many women are at work on distinct war service. Other work opened as emergency employment for women does not keep them long. We are assured that the superior pay enjoyed by the women who go to work in the ammunition works is a greater attraction than toy-making and other employments organised to afford remuneration for girls and women thrown out of work in other quarters. Girls who have been in domestic service, and others who have been engaged in clerical work, and as typists, have found their way to the shell works at Elswick. The special appeal which is made for assistance in agriculture requires, however, a different class of women, and is not likely to be responded to in any great numbers by women brought up in the city. The Women's Emergency Corps has, however, been steadily at work recruiting for just such a call those who can drive motor cars or perform other duties at present filled by men. Girls have also taken the places of clerks who have joined the colours and are now engaged in eagerly getting themselves fit for work at the front.

Manchester Guardian,
March 30th. 1915.

WAR SERVICE FOR WOMEN.

WOMEN'S FREEDOM LEAGUE ASK FOR GUARANTEES.

The Women's Freedom League are glad to note the tardy recognition by the Government of the value of women's work brought before the country in their scheme of war service for women. We demand from the Government, however, certain guarantees.

Firstly, that no trained woman employed in men's work be given less pay than that given to men.

Secondly, that some consideration be given when the war is over to the women who during the war have carried on this necessary work.

Thirdly, that in case of training being required proper maintenance be given to the woman or girl while that training is going on.

Recognising that the Government's scheme offers a splendid opportunity for raising the status of women in industry, we urge that every woman should now resolutely refuse to undertake any branch of work except for equal wages with men. By accepting less than this women would be showing themselves disloyal to one another, and to the men who are serving their country in the field. These men should certainly be safeguarded on their return from any undercutting by women.

Finally, seeing that the Government are now making a direct appeal to women to come forward and help in the defence of their country, and that fresh responsibilities are being thrust upon them—thousands through the loss of their husband being left to perform the duties of both father and mother—we feel that this is an opportune moment for the Government to guarantee that before they leave office they will bring before the House of Commons a measure for the political enfranchisement of women.

We urge all suffragists to support us in this demand now.

(Signed) C. DESPARD, President; E. KNIGHT, Hon. Treas.; F. A. UNDERWOOD, Secretary.

Sunday Pictorial · 21.3.15.

MOBILISING WOMEN FOR WAR WORK.

CHANCE FOR WHICH THEY HAVE LONG WAITED.

EFFECT ON YOUNG MEN.

(By MRS. E. PANKHURST.)

History is in the making in the State call to women for war service, and women the kingdom all over will welcome it with all their hearts. It is the chance they have long been waiting for.

The Government's decision to mobilise the [illegible] hope that the spring will see the Russians

[illegible] timism is absurd, there is every reason to

[illegible] invaded, and, although exaggerated op-

[illegible] vince" of East Prussia is to be again

[illegible] clear that the Kaiser's precious "own pro

[illegible] carry out her own designs. It is quite [illegible] vances, is merely using him as a tool to

[illegible] from being terrorised by Hindenburg's ad

[illegible] exhaustible and that our splendid Ally, far

[illegible] shows that the Russian resources are in [illegible] Russians have penetrated into Mehrel. I

[illegible] terday was the German admission that the [illegible] certainly the most significant news pas

RUSSIA REAPPEARS.

[illegible] turned back

[illegible] disaction the latter part of [illegible] and

[illegible] on sighting the patrol boat the latter [illegible]

[illegible] aeroplanes also took part in the "raid," but [illegible] An Admiralty patrol boat. Three other

[illegible] He made great his escape when sighted by

[illegible] rowly missed hitting two neutral vessels

[illegible] dropped several bombs into the sea and nar proved himself a sorry bungler, for he

Reynolds's Newspaper,
March 21st. 1915.

MOBILIZING THE WOMEN.

Criticism of the Proposal of the Government.

(Special to "Reynolds's.")

The Government's proposal to mobilize woman in the national service, and to establish a special registry for them under the Board of Trade, has been rather critically received in Trade Union circles. Interviewed by a "Reynolds's" representative, Miss Mary R. MacArthur, the secretary of the Women's Trade Union League (which represents 240,000 women wage earners), gave expression to the general feeling. She characterized the appeal to women to take the places of the men at the front as "melodramatic," and thought it had been hurriedly drafted.

Miss M. MacArthur.

"It is," she said, "a partial application of the sound communist motto, 'from each according to his abilities and to each according to his needs,' but it is impossible to apply it to a state of society such as ours. You cannot make it go on all fours.

If we were going to adopt collectivism all round, well and good; but this is the wrong end to begin. The mobilization of industry for productive work, as instanced by the Government taking over the armament factories, is far more important, and likely to be productive of far more good.

"In view of the actual position, I can only suppose that the appeal has been drafted with a view to possible future eventualities, for at present there are at least 50,000 women, normally wage-earners, who are unemployed. They should be reabsorbed, and their possibilities of adaptation to the new requirements should be tested before there is any thought of flooding the Labour market with women who are not there to earn a living, and who would be taking the bread out of the mouths of workers who would otherwise be doing the work they are appealed to to undertake. There is a shortage of men, it is true, and of women, too, in some districts, but it is by no means a simple matter to arrange for the transference of female labour from district to district or trade to trade, for women are naturally less mobile than men.

"There can be no doubt that the Trade Union world, even if convinced of the necessity of this innovation, will require a satisfactory guarantee on the various aspects of the proposed substitution.

"On what conditions are these women to be substituted for men? Are they to receive the same wages for the same work? What guarantee is to be given to men that, when they return to civil life, their situations will be open for them, and that the standard of conditions in their trades remain unimpaired?

"And if the men receive satisfactory guarantees, what is to happen to women who have taken their places when they return, if in the meantime the women have become self-depen-

Reynolds's Newspaper,
March 21st. 1915.

The Appeal to Women.

The Government, deciding to make a register of all women trained and untrained willing to work, have taken a step that may have great consequences. It certainly has great dangers. A woman who can do a man's work is worth a man's wage. But if, after the war, we find a large number of industries staffed with underpaid female labour, it will be a supreme industrial tragedy. The enrolment of women in greater numbers in the industrial ranks may be necessary in this national crisis, but the occasion should be used as a lever for placing women workers in a sound economic position.

Lloyds Weekly News, March 21st. 1915.

WOMEN'S PART IN THE WAR: Government Plan to Use Their Services.

The Government have taken an important step by calling upon women to register themselves for paid employment in the nation's service, so that they may not only fill up gaps in the ranks of men caused by the departure of so many workers to the war, but also release other men for the fighting line.

According to the official announcement, it is intended to use the Labour Exchanges as the basis for a Register of Women for War Service, and it is expected in this way to obtain a complete list of women, with or without previous training, who are available for certain kinds of work.

There is work in connection with the making of armaments that women are doing now, and at which many more could be employed; while, on the land and in shops and factories, they could take the place of men of fighting age, who might thus be at liberty to join one or other of the Imperial Forces.

That is the scheme as outlined in the Board of Trade circular, but, of course, there are difficulties, chiefly owing to the existence of some 50,000 unemployed women, whose position towards the Government scheme—assuming that they are suitable for the work required—does not seem clear.

WOMEN have done noble service in the present war. In days of old, when knights went forth to battle, their ladies stayed at home and weaved and spun and sang ballads of fighting. Many of them, however, were capable of deeds of great valour, and Boadicea, the Warrior Queen, was not the only representative of her sex who showed courage and a martial spirit when the occasion required the display of these qualities. War service of that kind, however, has never been required of women, and it is enough that they give us of their best as nurses in war time. That, in itself, demands no ordinary sacrifice and even great risk, as the death roll among nurses in the South African War so lamentably proved.

The present war had not been many weeks old before women showed not only their eagerness and desire, but their great capacity to help. The opening sentence in the official handbook of the "Women's Defence Relief Corps" reads almost like an intelligent anticipation of the Government's idea. It is as follows: "The Women's Defence Relief Corps has been formed to undertake civil or semi-military work, which will enable more men to go to the front." Then there was the "Women's Volunteer Reserve," which had the enthusiastic support of Lady Jellicoe, wife of the Admiral in command of the North Sea Fleet. The object of this organisation is practically the same as that of the Relief Corps: "to set every man free for the fighting line."

The "Women's Emergency Corps" is another body that has done splendid work for the nation. This corps was started within two days of the declaration of war with the object of organising women's help, and within two weeks over 10,000 offers of personal service had been received and dealt with.

This does not pretend to be by any means an exhaustive list of the many agencies that owe their origin to the zeal and capacity of women to help in the war. From the moment Germany started on her mad-dog campaign the women of Great Britain have shown a noble spirit, not merely in sorrow and suffering, but in service. A mere list of some of the new occupations they have taken up is sufficient to show that, in organising a war service for women, the Government is knocking at an open door. Here are a few of these new callings:—

Railway clerical work
Carriage cleaning
Grocery
Engineering
Lift attendants
Fur-making Architectural drawing
Mail collecting
Motor driving
Banking accountancy

MISS MARY MACARTHUR,

The leading authority on women's work.

LADY ST. HELIER.

scheme, but it was a very present help to the nation in a time of emergency.

To come now to what the Government are asking women to do! The principle of the scheme is set out in the last paragraph of the Board of Trade circular as follows:—"Any woman who by working helps to release a man, or to equip a man, for fighting, does national war service." An unofficial description of the scheme is: "We desire to form a roll of honour of women who are ready to give their services to the nation."

A roll of honour for women! That is a great idea, and it might even be carried further by giving a medal in meritorious cases, just as a medal is to be given in special circumstances to workmen engaged in the manufacture of the munitions of war. Women have made splendid use of their opportunities up till now, but a greater opportunity awaits them, and there is not the slightest doubt that they will avail themselves of it. Here it might be well to quote the opening passage of the official circular:

> The President of the Board of Trade wishes to call attention to the fact that, in the present emergency, if the full fighting power of the nation is to be put forth on the field of battle, the full working power of the nation must be made available to carry on its essential trades at home. Already in certain important occupations there are not enough men and women to do the work. This shortage will certainly spread to other occupations as more and more men join the fighting forces.
>
> In order to meet the present and future needs of national industry during the war the Government wish to obtain particulars of the women available, with or without previous training, for paid employment. Accordingly they invite all women who are prepared, if needed, to take paid employment of any kind—industrial, agricultural, clerical, etc.—to enter themselves upon the Register of Women for War Service, which is being prepared by the Board of Trade Labour Exchanges.

That is, in its essence, the Government scheme. It has been received with general approval, but Miss Mary Macarthur, secretary of the Women's Trade Union League, who has an intimate knowledge of all questions affecting women's work, raised an important point—the relation to the scheme of 50,000 unemployed women. She has stated:—

> I understand the appeal is made to women not normally wage-earners, and even to women who have not previously been wage-earners. There are now 50,000 unemployed women who are normal wage-earners, and I should like an assurance that the absorption of these women has been considered before new and presumably inexperienced women are introduced.

The Ref
March 21st 1915.

63

THE LADY AT THE ROUND TABLE

WOMEN AND WAR SERVICE.

FOR "HOME DEFENCE"!

AT the beginning of the war the patriotism of [illegible]tish women had an instantaneous expression in [illegible] kinds of work to which they had never before [illegible]tomed. Some men considered these offers with [illegible] albeit with a smile of unbelief.

I remember in particular one man with whom [illegible] on the advisability of training women immediately [illegible] the lifts in the large shops and business buildings. [illegible] my suggestion as a joke.

To-day women, bright, young, smartly uniformed, [illegible] running the lifts in many of the principal London [illegible] have talked with numbers of the women so engaged, [illegible] assure me the work is easy and not uninteresting, [illegible] they like it better than selling ribbon behind a count[illegible]

This is but one of a dozen innovations which the [illegible] brought about within six months. And now the Gov[illegible] has issued an appeal to the women of the Empire to co[illegible] and do National War Service, explaining that every [illegible] who helps to release a man or to equip a man for fig[illegible] renders this kind of service to her country. Women are [illegible] to register at the nearest Labour Exchange, explaining w[illegible] they can do and what they are willing to learn to do. M[illegible] particularly are they asked to offer their work in the mu[illegible]tion factories, and in payment they are offered the ordinary industrial rates.

